

For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

250510

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623.

BURLINGAME
DEC 2 1968
Library

THE NATION

America's Leading Liberal Weekly Since 1865

INDEX TO VOLUME 206 JANUARY to JUNE, 1968

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article
T	Television

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

2-31 Jan.	1	426-455 Apr.	1
34-63 Jan.	8	458-487 Apr.	8
66-95 Jan.	15	490-519 Apr.	15
98-127 Jan.	22	522-551 Apr.	22
130-159 Jan.	29	554-583 Apr.	29
162-191 Feb.	5	586-615 May	6
194-223 Feb.	12	618-647 May	13
226-255 Feb.	19	650-679 May	20
258-287 Feb.	26	682-711 May	27
290-319 Mar.	4	714-743 June	3
322-359 Mar.	11	746-775 June	10
362-391 Mar.	18	778-807 June	17
394-423 Mar.	25	810-839 June	24

A		PAGE
Abbey, Edward
Hippies' contribution, in reply to H. Toch query of Dec. 4, 1967; C		2
Abernathy, Rev. Ralph; carrying on M. L. King's poor people's campaign		621
Abortion; California law inhumane on prospective birth defects from German measles; E		261; see also C, 490
Legal in Japan, outlawed in U.S.		198
Aczel, Tamas
CIA's beneficent role in subsidizing Hungarian exiles' literary review; C		66; see also C, 258, and R. Major letter of Nov. 27, 1967
ADA. See Americans for democratic action
Adolescents; deafness predicted for devotees of amplified music, H. Cimring; C		2
See also Hippies; Youth
Advanced research projects agency (ARPA); sponsors weapons research		504
Advancement school. See North Carolina; Philadelphia
Advertising; oriented toward youth		400
Afrikaans; vehicle of satirical novels of E. Leroux and A. P. Brink. By S. Meisler; S		625
After the killing of Martin Luther King. By L. Lipsitz; P		831
After the march to the Pentagon, October 1, 1966. G. Kovacs; P		739
Aging wife. M. Friedberg; P		710
Agriculture; crop allotments: power behind the cotton. P. Marcuse; S		43
Report of President's national advisory commission on rural poverty details plight of rural poor
Ahmad, Aijaz
Two poems of Pakistan; P		607
Aiken, Senator George D.; speech advocating U.S. foreign policy that would strengthen world community; E		164
Alabama; agriculture department's cotton-crop allotments as power lever		44-45
Albee, Edward. Play Box (Buffalo production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D		420
Albert, Martin L.
Vietnam: the doctors' dilemma in supporting armed forces; S		823

Alexander, Fred; Negro elected to Charlotte, N.C., council. H. Golden; S		788
Alianza federal de mercedes; Spanish-American protest organization in New Mexico 793 ff.
Allen, Jay. Play The prime of Miss Jean Brodie reviewed by H. Clurman; D		186
Alliance for progress; U.S. 1965 intervention in Dominican republic demonstrated demise		238. See also C, 586
American association for the advancement of science (AAAS); meeting virtually ignored Vietnam war; E		101
Study of chemical-biological warfare in Vietnam; E		325
American broadcasting company (ABC); decision not to provide live TV coverage of 1968 political conventions. J. Horn; T		249
American independent party. See Wallace, George C.
American telephone & telegraph Co.; Pacific subsidiary stands to gain by industry-oriented appointments to California public service commission. P. Kerby; S		749
Americans for democratic action (ADA); aging men of principle. R. G. Sherrill; S		261
Humphrey's withdrawal through nonpayment of dues		787
Amery, C.
German steeplechase; Socialist losses and National democratic (neo-Nazi) gains in Baden-Württemberg elections; S		654
Anarchism; in P. Goodman's thought		502
Anderson, Patrick; New York Times magazine article on Defense secretary C. Clifford; E		194
Anderson, Robert; play I never sang for my father reviewed by H. Clurman; D		221
Anderson platoon, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP		94
Andrus, Gordon E.
St. Louis NET affiliate failure to telecast Inside North Vietnam; C		258; see also E, 164
Angeletti, Charles. See Crane, T. R.
Anti-Semitism. See Jews
Anton, Anatole. See Fitzgerald, R.
APA repertory theatre. Production of The cherry orchard reviewed by H. Clurman; D		485
Production of Exit the king reviewed by H. Clurman; D		155
Aplon, Roger
Today decided the question; P		704
Apollo. See Space
Arab nations. See Middle East
Archaic, the. D. Ray; P		509
Architecture. For reviews, see Galantay, E.
Arena stage, Washington, D.C. Production of The great white hope reviewed by J. Novick; D		93
Armament; for Latin America by U.S. and France; E		260
For United Arab Republic by Soviet Union		727
Archer, Dane
New Haven, Conn.: renewal and riots; S		729
Aronson, James
Editing on the Left: memories and convictions from National Guardian days; S		174
Art; Havana cultural congress. H. Yglesias; S		243
In the beginning there was art; Russian modernists, 1917-1923. J. Berger; A		88
For reviews, see Kozloff, M.
As I come home. H. Shapiro; P		61
As I read my good friend's book. L. Turco; P		316
Asia; aid and "squeeze" at all levels of government in many countries. F. L. Starner; S		696

Asian experts discover Vietnam; resolutions on war by Association for Asian studies. M. B. Young; S		507
Japan in Asia's future. W. M. Ball; S		82; see also C, 290
Japanese influence extended		300 ff.
At a dance. D. Ignatow; P		645
Atomic weapons
Canada's acceptance from U.S. as political issue		562
Pointless crash of bomb-carrying B-52 over Greenland; E		162
Putting back the genie; U.S.-Soviet proliferation treaty approved at U.N. By A. Tuckerman; E		810
Rumors of projected use in Vietnam		503, 504
Telegram to President against use in Vietnam answered from Pentagon. H. Mears; C		476
When the bomb in Vietnam?; E		259
Auto workers, united. See Labor—Union
Automobiles; union walkout from ALF-CIO threatened		7-8
Axelbank, Albert
The marchers of Tokyo, against Vietnam war and link with U.S.; S		41; see also C, 290

B		PAGE
Babbitt, Milton. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M		514
Balaguer, President Joaquin. See Dominican republic
Balanchine, George. Ballets Metastasis and Pithopraktia reviewed by H. Clurman; D		221
Baldwin, James; fulfillment of predictions in book The fire next time		628
Ball, W. Macmahon
Japan in Asia's future; S		82; see also C, 290
Ballet. For reviews, see Clurman, H.
Ballets Africains, les. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D		355
Banks and banking; abuses in distribution of credit cards		209
International institutions' reluctance to accumulate dollars		102-103
Barton, Richard Thomas, M.D.
California abortion law's provisions broader than stated in editorial; C		490; see also E, 261
Bedazzled. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP		28
Belfrage, Cedric; former editor of National Guardian		174 ff.
Belle du jour. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP		582
Bellochio, Marco. Film China is near reviewed by R. Hatch; MP		157
Film Fist in his pocket reviewed by R. Hatch; MP		806
Bennett, Paul
The power to make war; P		739
Bentley, Eric
Solidarity with Dr. Spock; C		458; see also 327
Berger, John
Critique of Rodin's sculpture, in Dec. 18, 1967, article, disputed. P. Hollister, Jr.; C		98
In the beginning there was art; modernists in Russia, 1917-1923; A		88
On Che Guevara		304
Bergman, Ingmar. Film Hour of the wolf reviewed by R. Hatch; MP		582
Berkeley, Calif.; the city that went to school; integration program for elementary grades. R. and B. Halpern; S		632; see also Halpern corrections and emendations; C
714; and N. W. Sullivan,		695-696

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Berkshire Eagle (newspaper); role in advocacy of W.E.B. DuBois memorial; E 429; see also C, 522	Brel, Jacques. Recital of songs reviewed by H. Clurman; D 318	Senate's proposal to place state colleges' police under commissioner appointed by governor; E 165
Berlin; free university students' demonstrations. C. Koppel and D. Schultz; S 596	Brewster, Kingman, Jr.; Yale president's plea to Johnson to disavow use of draft as punishment 143	Callaghan, James; home secretary sponsored racial exclusion bill in British Commons 410-411, 412
Berns, Joel M. Country should follow The Nation's prescriptions, as Johnson did; C 586	Brezhnev, Leonid; Soviet leader's Stalinist diatribe against intellectuals 528	Camacho Abad, Marcelino; star-chamber trial of Spanish labor leader; E 525
Bernstein, Peter L. Vietnam and the gold drain; S 430	Bribery. See Corruption	Cambridge, Mass.; Vietnam summer, 1967; young radicals and the fear of power. K. Keniston; S 370
Berberman, Gerald D. The peace corps; a dream betrayed; S 263; see also C, 362 and 618, with Berberman reply	Brief lives. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 92	Camisards; youthful 17th-century French rebels; E 717
Berrigan, Father Dan; with three U.S. fliers freed by North Vietnam 431 ff.	Briggs, Richard I. Count-to-10 rhyme for Johnson on Vietnam war; C 34	Canada; Prime minister Trudeau as man to hold Quebec in confederation. C. W. Gonick; S 560
Berrigan, Father Philip F.; sentence for draft-opposition activities; E 749	Brink, André P.; significance of novels in Afrikaans. S. Meisler; S 625	Cape Town. See South Africa, Republic of
Berry, Faith The capital scene: Washington, like it is; young Negro militants' omnidirectional activities; S 589	Broadcasting. Broadcast oratory: fallacies of equal time. S. Fly; S 824	Capital punishment; by Supreme court ruling, jurors may be opposed to; E 814
Beverly Hills, Calif.; referendum on Vietnam 366	FCC's passivity on criteria for license renewal; E 781	Capote, Truman. Film In cold blood reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 28
Biel, Nicholas Reviews of plays Rosenbergs must not die, the 801	See also Television	Carabinieri, les. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 646
Birch society, John; increasing police membership 344	Brook, Peter. Film Tell me lies reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 285	Carley, David; pro-Johnson Wisconsin Democratic national committeeman 399
Birnbaum, Norman New universities conference, Chicago: the dilemmas of resistance; S 535; see also 756	Brooklyn. See New York City	Carmichael, Stokely; black-power militant not anti-white 210, 212
Black Mountain, Los Altos. By R. Hass; P 738	Brown, Rep. George E., Jr. Praise for article of Dec. 11, 1967, I am tired of your gimmicks. C. H. Meacham; C 62	Carnegie corporation; cosponsorship of Children's television workshop 644
Blumenthal, Richard Orphans of empire: a bad day in Commons; exclusion from Britain of Asian-stock nationals from Kenya; S 410	Brown, Rap; gun-violation sentence brought needed martyrdom; E 749	Carnegie endowment for international peace; officials' memorandum to Johnson urging scaling down of Vietnam war; E 163
Bly, Robert Lies; P 417	Bruce, Lennart I lift a glass; P 677	Carper, Jean The real crime of Dr. Spock; S 327; see also C, 458
Bode, Elroy El Paso dialogue: the rhetoric of revenge by H. Edwards and D. Gregory at black student conference; S 557	Brynych, Zbynek. Film The fifth horseman is fear reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 709	Carroll, Charles F.; North Carolina state education head's failure to support Winston-Salem Advancement school for under-achievers 78, 79
Body becomes a furrow, a. D. Schmitz; P 738	Bryan, William Jennings; influence on H. H. Humphrey 786-787	Cartoons of 1967 from foreign press 10, 14-15
Boeing company; not war profiteer. C. I. Crawford; C 490	Bugging. See Espionage	Casdin, Joseph C. Endorsement of McCarthy 462
Bogart, Leo; critique of pills; E 364	Bullins, Ed. Play The electronic nigger and others reviewed by H. Clurman; D 420	Worcester mayor on growing support for McCarthy; C 522; see also 462
Bogle, James A. Hoosiers for a democratic alternative supports candidates who work for end to Vietnam war; C 346	Buñuel, Luis. Film Belle du jour reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 582	Castro, Premier Fidel. See Cuba
Bondurant, Joan V. "No ordinary light": reflections on non-violence and Gandhi-King martyrdoms; S 592	Burford, William Note on and translations of S. Weil poems 480	Catholic church. Church, state and money for schools. W. L. Roberts; S 664
Boretz, Benjamin Limitations of entertainment in serious modern music; series The new image of sound, at Hunter college, cited; M 513	Burned-out engine on the Southeastern expressway, a. R. Whitman; P 581	Members' support of McCarthy in Massachusetts 463-464
Rockefeller and other foundation money's impact on modern-music groups 802	Burns, Arthur F.; on dangers and costs of defense buildup 71-72, 72-73	Power in French Canada 560 ff.
Reviews of music Babbitt, M. 514	Business Buildup of H. H. Humphrey 784-785	Role in 1954 Guatemalan intervention 290-291
Contemporary chamber players 515	Concentration of power in military-industrial complex. C. McWilliams; S 71	Ceremony of innocence, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 92
Gaburo, K.; Antiphony IV 515	Decision-making metamorphosis in U.S. By M. Crozier; S 690	Chall, Ezra State department's document on Vietcong plans for control probably counterfeit; C 258
Johnston, B.; string quartet 515	Federal subsidies for training poor obviously inadequate; E 621	Champion, Gower; direction of The happy time 188
Martirano, S.; Ballad 515	Japanese development 330 ff.	Chandler, Otis; forward-looking publisher of Los Angeles Times 80-81
Salzman, E.; Verses and cantos 514	Japanese restrictions on U.S. capital 337	Charlie Bubbles. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 318
Weinberg, H.; string quartet 515	Opposition to renegotiation board, little watchdog of the dollar warriors. S. Watzman; S 297	Che. By L. Swaim; P 386
Reviews of recorded music Dvorak symphonies, Stravinsky, Tele-mann, Berg's Wozzeck 157	Butenweiser, Peter; director of Pennsylvania Advancement school for underachievers in Philadelphia 107 ff.	Che Guevara. By S. Moss; P 386
Bosch, Juan; exiled Dominican politician hurts own party 240	Second director of Advancement school for underachievers in Winston-Salem, N.C. 78, 79	Chemical-bacteriological warfare; use in Vietnam; AAAS study; E 325
Bouille, Pierre. Film from novel Planet of the apes reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 356	Bye bye Braverman. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 356	Utah sheep killed by army's experiments with nerve agent; E 588
Bourgeoisie; as disciplinarians in draft-resistance cases; E 749	Byrd, Senator Harry F., Jr.; segregationist use of decentralization in schools; E 748	Chiang Kai-shek. See China, Nationalist
Bowdoin college; faculty members pledge support to students who nonviolently resist Vietnam war; E 461	C Caldwell, Zoe; performance in The prime of Miss Jean Brodie 186	Chicago; battle of in peace council demonstration: a study of law and order. J. L. Sander; S 655
Box. Buffalo production of play reviewed by H. Clurman; D 420	California Abortion law signed by Governor Reagan inhumane; E 261; see also C, 490	Mayor Daley's shoot-to-kill order for arsonists and looters; E 554
Boyle, Kay Praise for D. Swanston on San Francisco state college radicals; C 250; see also 38 and C, 394	Activism vs. Reaganism: the meddlers at Berkeley campus of U. of California. D. Swanston; S 171	New universities conference: the dilemmas of resistance. N. Birnbaum; S 535
Boyle, Kay, et al. Warning and notice to Oakland, Calif., on prosecution of anti-draft demonstrators; S 329	Adverse effects on economy of a Vietnam peace; E 556	Reaction to King murder. F. C. Stern; S 533
Boys in the band, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 580	California maelstrom: the politics of desperation. P. Kerby; S 366	Chicago, university of; liberal reputation not deserved; cf. non-rehiring of Prof. J. Lemisch. By C. Z. Hobson; C 34; see also C, 226
Braden, Thomas W.; former CIA man in no position to be shocked by British spy-defector Philby; E 684	Criminal syndicalism act countered by judicial decision in favor of distributor of revolutionary leaflets; E 493	Children; high value on behavior in P. Goodman philosophy 501-502
Branigin, Governor Roger D.; favorite-son vote in Indiana Democratic presidential primary; stand-in for Humphrey; E 650	Democratic shake-up: the California survival kit; CDC convention and Kennedy entry. P. Kerby; S 444	China; Japanese role in during 20th century 332 ff.
Second in Indiana primary; figures analyzed. K. O'Lessker; S 686	Kennedy in Disneyland; campaigning in state primary. P. Kerby; S 464	China, Communist; differences from Hitler's Germany 408
Braverman, Harry The student vanguard: six days in Paris; S 719	Killing watchdog public service commission by utilities-oriented appointments. P. Kerby; E 749	Japanese disagreement with U.S. policy toward 83-84
Brazil; peace corps in 264 ff.	Mineral King valley wilderness to be commercialized by Walt Disney enterprises; E 260	Mao on revolution; interview with A. Malraux. By R. Stern; E 717
	Peace and freedom party could garner half million protest votes against Nixon-Humphrey choice; E 685	China, Nationalist. Formosa: "solidarity of gloom." M. B. Young; S 294; see also C, 554, with Young reply
	Recall petition against Governor Reagan; E 589	China is near. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 157
	Repercussions of San Francisco state college demonstrations 40-41	Chinoise, la. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 517
	Runs gamut from peace to Wallace in 1968 campaign. P. Kerby; S 143	Christianity; post-Christian era dominant in youthful counter culture 441-442
		Churchill, Sir Winston; protagonist in R. Hochhuth play Soldiers 678
		Cimring, Harry Deafness predicted for young devotees of amplified music; C 2

(January-June, 1968)

Cities, U.S.
J. V. Lindsay and N. A. Rockefeller urge shift in national emphasis on urban crisis from Vietnam; E 587
More is less: the riddle of progress. R. F. Dasmann; S 202
P. Goodman's dream for 498
Tax exemption of foundations and other organizations as factor in financial distress; E 293
Urban renewal used against poor Negroes, as in New Haven 730 ff.
Violence and riots aggravated by authorities' ignorance 820
Citizens crusade against poverty; report on poverty in U.S. and proposes remedies; E 621
Citizens for educational freedom; lobbying for funds for parochial schools. W. L. Roberts; S 664 Civil defense. See United States—Defense, national Civil liberties; California criminal syndicalism act countered by judicial decision in favor of distributor of revolutionary leaflets; E 493
Civil rights. See Negroes—Civil rights
Clara's ole man. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 421
Clark, Senator Joseph S.; friend on H. H. Humphrey 567, 783-784
Clayton, James L.; article cited on effects of cold war on California and Utah; E 556
Cleaver, Eldridge; Negro writer-militant arrested in West Oakland, Calif. 542
Cleveland, Ohio; city's 100-day education of Negro mayor C. Stokes. By A. Z. Silver; S 379
Clifford, Defense secretary Clark; as key man in military-industrial complex, cannot divest himself of old ties; E 228
Preconditions for negotiations with North Vietnam 586
See also United States—Defense, national Clurman, Harold
Awarded Sang prize for critics of fine arts Reviews of ballet 420
Ballets Africains, les 355
Bugaku, Metastaseis, Pithoprakta, The cage, Haydn concerto 221
Joffrey ballet, New York City center 454
Reviews of plays
Box (Buffalo production) 420
Boys in the band, the 580
Brief lives 92
Ceremony of innocence, the 82
Cherry orchard, the (APA repertory production) 485
Clara's ole man 421
Day in the death of Joe Egg, a 247
Electronic Nigger and others, the 420
Ergo 389
Exit the king 155
George M! 581
Grand music hall of Israel, the 317
Hamlet (J. Papp production) 92
Happy time, the 186
How now, Dow Jones 28
I never sang for my father 221
Indian wants the Bronx, the 221
It's called the sugar plum 221
Jacques Brel is alive and well and living in Paris 318
Kongi's harvest 581
Loot 484
Open Theatre skits and songs 355
Plaza suite 317
Portrait of a queen 389
Price, the 281
Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, the 186
Professor Bernhardt (Vienna Burgtheater production in New York) 485
Saint Joan (Lincoln center repertory production) 125
Saturday night 388
Seven descents of Myrtle, the 516
Show-off, the (APA-Phoenix production) 27
Song of the Lusitanian bogey 125
Spofford 27
Staircase 156
Summer of the seventeenth doll (Negro ensemble company production) 356
Tiger at the gates (Lincoln center production) 389
Tom Paine 516
We bombed in New Haven 26
Weekend 454
Your own thing 220
Coffin, Rev. William Sloane; indicted for opposition to draft 99
Cohn-Bendit, Daniel; symbol of French student revolt 815-816
Colitt, Lsslie R.
Our press and Europe's: the mask of objectivity; S 789
Colleges and universities. See Education and individual institutions
Collier, John; vision of late commissioner of Indian affairs. D. McNickle; S 718
Collins, Judy; recordings reviewed by J. Gabree; M 838 Collision course; 11 plays. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 772
Columbia broadcasting system; piracy of Paladino TV series idea from mechanic V. DeCosta. By J. Horn; T 59
Columbia university. Big bust on Morningside Heights; student rebellion. M. Harris; S 757
Campus under siege: why students seize power. L. S. Levine; S 622; see also C, 714
Chaos art; E 619
Landlord of conscience-stricken tenant. E. Merriam; C 650
SDS activities in student revolt 753 ff.
Space given to student insurrection in New York Times contrasted to that for conservation conference; E 653
Student radio station provided model of fairness during week of demonstrations; E 620
Common harvest, a (to John Carter). P. L. Simpson; P 386
Common market; theoretical background of British candidacy for membership 275-276
Communism
Czechoslovakia
Liberalizing revolt led by intellectuals; E 428; 437 ff.
Eastern Europe
Czech intellectuals as nettles against dogmatism. J. Dornberg; S 50 Europe
Superseded by new U.S.-inspired radicalism among youth 751-752
France
Slow to take advantage of student-led revolutionary situation 720-721, 815 ff.
Japan
Orientation toward Soviet Union 331
Middle East
Persecution in Egypt and Syria 198, 200
United States
California party's belated attempt to form united front with peace and freedom party 144-145
Community; P. Goodman's philosophy of. T. Roszak; S 497
Concentration camps; possibility for rioters, etc., in U.S.; E 716
Congress party. See India
Conservation; ecology worsening in U.S.; little publicity for important Challenge for survival conference in New York; E 653
More is less: the riddle of progress in relation to environment. R. F. Dasmann; S 202
Probable failure to prevent Walt Disney enterprises' commercialization of Mineral King valley wilderness, California; E 260
Constantine II, King. See Greece
Conservation; uncompromising stand on issues like Grand Canyon dam 473, 475 Contemporary chamber players. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M 515
Conyers, Rep. John; working for deeper Democratic commitment to Michigan Negroes' problems 342
Cook, Peter, and D. Moore. Film Bedazzled reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 28
Cooper, David
North Carolina kills its dream; politicians' sabotage of Advancement school for underachievers; S 77
Cooper, Senator John Sherman; urged halt to U.S. bombing of North Vietnam as prelude to peace negotiations 132
Cooperman, Stanley
For Martin Luther King; P 831
Valmiki's dance; P 515
COPE. See Council on population and environment
Copper industry; long strike; price raised by management with no objection from administration 7
Security as issue in long strike; E 70
Corruption; aid and "squeeze" in Asia. F. L. Starnier; S 696 Endemic in Vietnam, Thailand, etc.; magnified by war; E 685
Corsi, Gianfranco
Generation up in arms: Berkeley on the Tiber; student revolts in Europe; S 750
Cosmetics industry. Adventures in the skin trade; prosperity and dubious practices. T. Stable; S 16
Cotton; crop allotments by Agriculture department. P. Marcuse; S 43
Council on population and environment (COPE); campaign human proliferation; E 197
Cox, Kenneth; FCC member, with colleague N. Johnson, prods body on passivity concerning broadcast license renewals; E 781
Crane, Mrs. N. L.
Names of Canadian peace groups wanted; C 522
Crane, Theodore R., and C. Angeletti
Data on Jesse Homer Newton requested; C 554
Crane, Douglas
Rhetoric is not enough: Michigan Democrats in disarray; S 340
Crawford, C. I.
Boeing not war profiteer; C 490
Credit cards; the thief in the mailbox. E. K. Shanahan; S 209
Crime. "Crime in the streets" passage in Johnson's state of the Union message elicited fervent response; E 130; 23
In hippie centers 467-468
See also Police
Crisis. C. Moffett; P 245
Cronkite, Walter; TV newsmen's shift to advocacy of Vietnam negotiations 364
Crosland, Anthony; British board of trade president's revisionist arguments on labour party's economic platform 274, 275
Crossman, Richard; cabinet member on British labour party's inheritance of ills 275
Crossword puzzles. F. W. Lewis. See back pages
Crowley, Mart. Play The boys in the band reviewed by H. Clurman; D 580
Crowther, Jack; Los Angeles school superintendent's stand against busing of ghetto children; E 365
Crozier, Michel
America revisited by Frenchman: the new lonely frontier of reason, as in decision making; S 690; see also C, 810
Cryonics; preservation of bodies through freezing in hope of eventual revivification; progress of groups in U.S. By H. Junker; S 504
Cuba. From the Isle of Pines: the new men of Cuba. J. Higgins; S 205
Havana cultural congress, the. H. Yglesias; S 243
Relations with Soviet Union 200, 201
Cudahy, Richard; pro-Johnson Wisconsin Democratic chairman 399
Culture; coverage skimpy by U.S. press 791
Culver, Rep. John; co-winner of The Nation's award for best Congressmen of the year, for anti-HUAC activities; E 34
Curran, Joseph; national maritime union's only president; 1966 election ruled illegal; E 588
Czechoslovakia
Belated de-Stalinization led by intellectuals; moves toward internal independence from Soviet Union. A. Werth; S 526; see also C, 682
Intellectuals as nettles against Communist dogmatism. J. Dornberg; S 50
Intellectuals' rebellion as event of year; E 428
Liberalization encouraged by State department; captured gold reserves should be returned; E 652
This spring in Prague; momentous liberalizing revolt of intellectuals. J. Mucha; S 438; see also E, 428
D
Daley, Mayor Richard J. See Chicago
Daly, John; resignation as director of Voice of America; E 814 Dasmann, Raymond F.
More is less: the riddle of progress; S 202
Davidson, General Phil; intelligence man in Saigon on enemy potential during Tet offensive 230
Davie, Michael; on impotence of Left in U.S. 75
Davis, Michael
In memoriam: M.L.K. (Martin Luther King); P 831
Day in the death of Joe Egg, a. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 247
Dada, surrealism and their heritage. Museum of modern art show reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 706; see also C, 746
Deafness; predicted for young devotees of amplified music. H. Cimring; C 2
Death; hope of cheating through cryonics (freezing). H. Junker; S 504
Death penalty. See Capital punishment
Decaux, Alain. Play The Rosenbergs must not die reviewed by N. Biehl; D 801 Decision making; fundamental new role in U.S. By M. Crozier; S 690; see also C, 810 de Gaulle, President Charles. See France
Delaney, Shelagh. Film Charlie Bubbles reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 318
Dellinger, David; with three U.S. fliers freed by North Vietnam 432 ff.

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Democracy; direct type expressed in polls and mass media 76	Dunn, Nell. Film version of book Up the junction reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 486	Rockefeller's circuitous financing of New York state college expansion 236
Democratic party	Duplessis, Maurice; former leader in French-Canadian politics 561 ff.	Segregationists' use of school decentralization; E 748
California Democratic Council's endorsement of McCarthy complicated by Kennedy entry; foreign-policy plank. P. Kerby; S 444	Durkin, James H. Objection to passage in McConnell article on Negro and white motives for killing; C 663; see also 475	Student vanguard of revolt, the: six days in Paris. H. Braverman; S 719
Commitment to outmoded New Deal-based system 104 ff.	Dutschke, Rudi; leftist West German student leader shot 597 ff.	Students, workers and General de Gaulle; disturbances in France. A. Werth; S 815
Disarray in Michigan. D. Crase; S 340	Duvalier, President François. See Haiti	Students for a democratic society: between reform and revolution. J. Jacobs; S 753
Effect of Johnson withdrawal. T. Lewis; S 494	Dyer, Charles. Play Staircase reviewed by H. Clurman; D 156	"Think tank" universities without students, such as Hudson Institute and RAND corp., losing prestige. H. L. Nieburg; S 629
Effect of R. F. Kennedy's death; memorial of action for McCarthy needed; E 778, 779	Dylan, Bob; song writer's transition from folk protests to surrealism 405	This spring in France: students, workers and General de Gaulle. By A. Werth; S 815
Hopelessly old-fashioned 74 ff.	E	Washington, D.C.: Negro students' militance; burgeoning of free universities. F. Berry; S 589
Humphrey candidacy emphasizes split; E 618	East Village other (periodical); directed toward hippies 569	Young graduates' frequent leadership of university campus movements 400-401
Humphrey forces powerful 788	Eastlake, William	Young rebels, old fears in West Germany; student demonstrations and establishment of "critical" universities. C. Koppel and D. Schultz; S 596
Johnson and McCarthy on ballot in Wisconsin primary 398 ff.	Like a small dead man; lone survivor of ambushed U.S. platoon in Vietnam; S 13	Edwards, Harry; militant's rhetoric of revenge at black student conference, El Paso. E. Bode; S 557
Johnson renomination not assured; importance of Wisconsin primary for McCarthy; E 426	3 purple hearts, 2 turtle doves and an ambush in a flame tree; Vietnam vignette; S 113	Egypt. See United Arab Republic
McCarthy, unlike Humphrey and R. F. Kennedy, could win; E 746	The Vietnam dead; S 269	Ehrlich, Paul R.; biologist; co-chairman of COPE predicts mass starvation in world; E 197
Ohio senatorial primary contest between dove Gilligan and hawk Lausche. By G. I. Maeroff; S 539	Eastman, Margot. See Mann, R.	Eichhorn, Douglas
Open convention hoped for; failure of stop-Kennedy movement; end of balanced ticket urged; E 556	Eberhardt, David; sentenced for anti-draft activities 749	For Coretta King; P 831
Politics of desperation in California. P. Kerby; S 366	Eckstein, Otto; economist foresees continued swollen defense budget after Vietnam; E 684	Eisendrath, Charles R.
Split in Massachusetts; support for McCarthy increasing. W. David Gardner; S 462; see also C, 522	Ecology. See Conservation	The black Hessians; U.S. Negroes in Vietnam; S 146
Time for R. F. Kennedy to assume leadership; E 98	Economics; as traditional keystone of U.S. political groupings. G. McConnell; S 471	Eisenhower, Dwight D.; 1954 falling-dominoes announcement on Indo-China 334
Desmond, James	Ecuador; indictment of peace corps by volunteers 264, 267-268	Eisenhower, Milton S.; chairman of Commission on violence 812
Waiting for Rocky: trials of non-candidate N. A. Rockefeller; S 234	Edison, John	Eisner, Robert
Detroit; integrated auction of loot recovered after 1967 riot; E 326	Name-calling in R. G. Sherrill article on Humphrey, C 650; see also 564	Income surtax to help pay for Vietnam not likely to help future taxpayers; C 162; see also E, 36, citing Eisner thesis
Lessons of 1967 riot 554	Education	Elections
Negroes' political militance 342	Activism vs. Reaganism: the meddlers at Berkeley campus of U. of California. D. Swanston; S 171	ABC's decision not to provide live TV coverage of conventions. J. Horn; T 249
Police department's secret tests of anti-riot weaponry; E 196	Affected by hyper-rationalist society in U.S.; further frustration of Negroes 693-694	Baden-Württemberg state, West Germany: Socialist losses and neo-Nazi gains. C. Amery; S 654
De Vries, Peter. Play Spofford , based on novel Reuben, Reuben, reviewed by H. Clurman; D 27	Advancement school, part II: taking risks with the setup in Philadelphia. F. Gray; S 107	Broadcast oratory: fallacies of equal time. S. Fly; S 824
Diamond, Norman	Berkeley, Calif., integration program for elementary schools. R. and B. Halpern; S 632; see also Halpern corrections and emendations; C 714; and N. W. Sullivan, 695-696	Counsel of other puzzled citizens needed. R. B. MacLeod; C 322
Guatemala: why they shoot Americans; S 166	Big bust on Morningside Heights; Columbia U. student revolt. M. Harris; S 757	Danger of moratorium on criticism of Johnson; E 586
Dinh, Tran Van	Church, state and money for schools. W. L. Roberts; S 664	Down the primary stretch with Democratic presidential contenders: From Indiana. K. O'Lessker; S 686. to Oregon. A. Netboy; S 687
Thieu and Ky: the rivalry of puppets; S 136	Black student conference held at U. of Texas at El Paso. E. Bode; S 557	Great cleavage in 1968 campaign; conflicts within families as well as parties; E 459
Dirksen, Senator Edward M.; Dirksen: the President's chameleon. E. S. Gilbreth; S 168	California Democratic council platform on needs for change 445	How suburbia votes. J. Ziskund II; S 826
Disney enterprises; plans to commercialize Mineral King valley wilderness in California; E 260	California senate's proposal to place state colleges' police under commissioner appointed by governor; E 165	Indiana and Ohio primary results bode ill for Humphrey and the Johnson consensus; E 650
Dissent; and politics; E 492	Campus under siege (Columbia): why students seize power. L. S. Levine; S 622; see also C, 714	India's political scramble; end of Congress party domination. V. P. Nanda; S 178
Dissect cabaret. Reviewed by R. Hatch; D 517	C.C.N.Y.'s program for pre-baccalaureate ghetto dwellers. L. Kriegel; S 270	Johnson decision not to run followed logic of politics; E 491
Doctors. See Medicine	Chaos at Columbia university; E 619	Johnson withdrawal advocated by Senator Morton; E 324
Dominican republic; fuse in Caribbean; President Balaguer's key position. H. J. Wiarda; S 238; see also C, 586	Curtailment of research in event of Vietnam peace; E 556	Johnson withdrawal indicated by Vietnam stalemate; E 395
Peace corps volunteers' role 265; see also C, 618 and 636	Draft as punishment: trial by Hershey. By P. W. Martin; S 139	Johnson's problem: the image is the issue. T. Lewis; S 134
Threats of renewed insurrection; E 36	Ferment in Negro colleges after King assassination 530-531	Liberal resurgence in Texas threatens Johnson's control of state; E 196
Dornberg, John	French student revolt "out of the blue"; E 714	McCarthy Democratic primary victory in New Hampshire; E 394
The nettles of Prague; Czech intelligentsia's effectiveness against Communist dogmatism; S 50	Generation up in arms: Berkeley on the Tiber; student revolts in Europe. G. Corisini; S 750	McCarthy primary victory in Oregon; national new constituency vs. consensus politics; E 746
Dotrice, Roy. Performance in Brief lives reviewed by H. Clurman; D 92	Ghetto schools? Close 'em! N. W. Sullivan; S 694	McCarthy support urged on dissenting Democrats and Peace and Freedom members; E 226; see also C, 362
Dreher, Carl	Gulf between academic community and police; E 198	Memorial of political action needed for R. F. Kennedy; E 779
Praise for Society for social responsibility in science; C 426; see also C, 290	Inadequate funds for Vietnam veterans 723-724	Michigan Democrats in disarray. D. Crase; S 340
Dresh, Mrs. Lee	Negro woman's plea for further schooling. H. Smalls; S 665, with L. Hamalian comment	Misuse of TV. J. Horn; T 358
Texas needs enlightenment by The Nation ; C 194; see also E, 38	New universities conference, Chicago: the dilemmas of resistance. N. Birnbaum; S 535	Need for choice in 1968 on Vietnam issue; E 67
Drugs	New York state university at Albany faculty group, Teachers committee for draft counseling, as embarrassment to administration; E 293	Negroes running in North Carolina. H. Golden; S 788
Counter culture, the, part III: capsules of salvation. T. Roszak; S 466	No busing for Los Angeles ghetto children; E 365	New politics requires four able presidential and vice-presidential nominees; E 556
Opium exported by Laos 697	North Carolina kills its dream; sabotage of Winston-Salem's Advancement school for underachievers. D. Cooper; S 77	No longer a sick campaign following Johnson exit. T. Lewis; S 494
Part of U.S. youth's revolt against system 693-694	P. Goodman's idea of free universities bearing fruit 499	Ohio Democratic senatorial primary: dove Gilligan vs. hawk Lausche. By G. I. Maeroff; S 539
Role in religion of the counter culture 440 ff.	Projected Children's television workshop for pre-schoolers. J. Horn; T 644	Peace politics: calculus for '68. E. Kenworthy; S 46; see also C, 130
See also Cosmetics		Pre-primary winds in Oregon; E 525
Drukman, Mason
Requiem for the great society; S 627
Drury, D. A.
L. S. Levine article, Why students seize power, insufficiently concerned with quality of dissent; C 714; see also 622
Dubcek, Alexander; new Czech leader insistent on internal liberalization but adheres to Warsaw pact 527, 528
DuBois, W.E.B.; memorial to late Negro leader urged despite rightists' objections; E 429; see also C, 522
Duncan, Donald; pacifist veteran of green berets 725-726
Duncan, Robert; rival to W. Morse for Democratic senatorial nomination in Oregon 690
Dunlap, Jane (pseud.); account of psychedelic experiences 471

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Realignment not foreseen in 1968 despite nw tide of discontent with New Deal- based system. E. Schneier; S 104		Sponsorship of San Francisco TV program Newspaper of the air 377	Gestalt therapy; as expounded by P. Good- man 499 ff.
Road from Nebraska primary; reasons for The Nation's support of McCarthy, who could share ticket with Kennedy; E 682		Foreign aid; in Dominican republic. H. J. Wiarda; S 238; see also C, 586	Ghost story of a New Hampshire graveyard. D. Gilbert; P 578
Rockefeller and Humphrey bids for presi- dency; E 618		Misuse through corruption in Asia. F. L. Starnes; S 696	Ghost story of a New Hampshire graveyard; P 578
Rockefeller's blockbuster decision to with- draw; E 428		Formosa. See China, Nationalist	Gilbreth, Edward S. 168
Significance of Romney withdrawal; E 322		Fortune (periodical); article shows war as U.S. institution; E 747	Dirksen: the Presidents' chameleon; S 168
Time for N. A. Rockefeller and R. F. Ken- nedy to assume leadership in respective parties; E 98		Foster, Paul. Play Tom Paine reviewed by H. Clurman; D 516	Gillers, Stephen Legal absurdity of Supreme Court ruling on penalty for draft-card burning; C 778
Unfairness in South Vietnam, 1967 139		Foundations; subsidy of modern-music groups. B. Boretz; M 802	Gilligan, John J.; anti-Vietnam contender for Ohio senatorial nomination. G. I. Maeroff; S 538
Waiting for Rockefeller: trials of a non- candidate. J. Desmond; S 234		Tax exemption as factor in U.S. cities; financial distress; E 293	Victor in Ohio primary; E 650
What now following Johnson withdrawal?; E 493		France Arms for Latin America 260	Gill, Donald C. Revolt in Taiwan unlikely; C 554; see also 294
What works for McCarthy in Massachu- setts. W. David Gardner; S 462; see also C, 522		Precipitated British devaluation and gold crisis for U.S. By P. L. Bernstein; S 430	Ginsberg, Allen Development of style and content 439-441
Wisconsin next presidential primary stop. J. P. Hunter; S 398		Present society contrasted with American. M. Crozier; S 690	Poem Howl announced war of generations 402, 405, 502
Electronic Nigger and others, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 420		Reasons for student-worker revolt "out of the blue"; E 714	Ginsburg, David; executive director of Ker- ner commission 306 ff.
El-Fatah; anti-Israel terrorists 727, 729		Student vanguard, the: six days in Paris. H. Braverman; S 719	Giraudeau, Jean. Play Tiger at the gates (Lincoln center repertory theater produc- tion) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 389
Ellis, Havelock; experiments with hallucino- genic drugs 466		This spring in France: students, workers and General de Gaulle. By A. Werth; S 815	Gitlin, Irving; tribute to late radio and TV producer. J. Horn; T 60
El Paso, Texas; rhetoric of revenge at black student conference. E. Bode; S 557		Young Camisards' revolt of 17th century; parallel with present. R. Stern; E 717	Gleason, Jimmy; restaurant workers' reform- ist ousted 116, 125
Endecott and the red cross. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 710		Franco, Francisco. See Spain	Glimpse of e. e. cummings, a. D. Ignatow; P 573
Ergo. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 389		Frankel, Charles; attributes resignation as assistant secretary of state to administra- tion's Vietnam policy; E 165	Godard, Jean-Luc. Film La Chinoise reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 517
Ervin, Senator Sam; impregnable segrega- tionist conservative from North Carolina 374		Frantz, Thomas T. Peace corps activities defended; C 618; see also 263 and C, 636	Film Les carabiniers reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 646
Espionage; dirty business, whether by a Phil- by or CIA; E 684		Freedom information service Plea for funds for Mississippi newsletter ; C 426	Going home. M. Rumaker; P 182
International bugging, as revealed in Pueb- lo incident; E 292		French, David S. H. Toch article of Dec. 4, 1967, unfair to hippies; C 2	Gold; drain on and Vietnam. P. L. Bernstein; S 430
Estrin, Marc; leader in American playground, Washington, D.C. "guerrilla" theatre 592		Friedberg, Martha Aging wife; P 710	Importation by Laos 697-698
Ettinger, Robert C. W.; publicist of cryonics movement 504, 505, 506		Friedenberg, Edgar Z. "Legitimate violence" of U.S. police; S 822	Goldberg, Arthur J.; exit as ambassador to U.N. By A. Tuckerman; E 620
Europe. Eastern Europe: Moscow's wayward satellites. A. Werth; S 526; see also C, 682		From a November journal. R. Roseliep; P 59	Goldman, Michael; succeeded by J. Logan as poetry editor of The Nation 183
Student revots. G. Corsini; S 750		Fulbright, Senator J. William; on H. H. Humphrey 566	Golden, Harry Campaign of R. Hawkins, Negro dentist, for North Carolina Democratic gubernar- torial nomination; S 788
European economic community (EEC). See Common market		On U.S. war economy 72	Discontinuing Carolina Israelite , whose un- expired subscriptions will be fulfilled by The Nation ; to contribute to latter 365
Evjue, William J.; congratulations on 50th anniversary of Madison, Wis., Capital Times ; E 6			Laws as eradicators of prejudice; S 506
Exit the king. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 155			North Carolina political situation discour- aged former Governor Sanford from chal- lenging Senator Ervin; S 374
F			North Carolina poor whites' boycott of in- tegrated welfare and poverty programs; S 668
False scorpion, the. D. Galler; P 352			Tribute to M. L. King; S 572
Famine; threatened by world overpopulation; E 197			Goldwater, Barry; 1964 coalition modified by Nixon in 1968; E 715
Fast deployment logistic ships (FDL); Sen- ate vote for; E 717			Overwhelmed in suburbs in 1964 828
Ferency, Zoltan; fired as Michigan Democratic chairman for advocating substitute for John- son 340 ff.			Gomulka, Wladyslaw; Polish leader's use of "Zionist" issue 497
Ferrara, Fred; restaurant workers' presi- dent's contracts betray membership. B. Hall; S 114; see also Ferrara letter, 345, and Hall reply; and E, 557			Gonick, C. W. Trudeau of Canada: prime minister as a man to hold Quebec in confederation; S 560
Ferry, W. H. Logic of segregation for attainment of Negroes' goals; C 19, with editors' reply; see also C, 194, and Nov. 27, 1967, editorial, Grasping at chaos			Gonzalez, Rep. Henry B.; for expansion of renegotiation board 297, 299, 300
Fichandler, Mrs. Zelda; patroness of Arena stage, Washington, D.C. 93			Goodman, Paul; philosopher-novelist's influ- ence with young; critique of community- centered thought. T. Roszak; S 497
Fifth horseman is fear, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 709			Goodman, Sandy Back from Vietnam: the invisible veterans; S 723; see also C, 778
Films. See Motion pictures			Goodwin, Richard N.; among dropouts from Johnson administration on issue of Viet- nam; E 363
Finney, Albert. Film Charlie Bubbles re- viewed by R. Hatch; MP 318			Gottlieb, Adolph. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 315
Fishing industry; Japanese leadership; E 780			Graduate, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 93
Fist in his pocket. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 806			Gramsci; Italian Communist on U.S. bour- geoisie's self-criticism 752
Fitzgerald, C. P. New Zealand conference: peace, power and politics in Asia; urged new approach; S 600			Grand music hall of Israel, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 317
Fitzgerald, Richard, and A. Anton Objections to Dec. 18, 1967, and Jan. 8, 1968, articles on San Francisco state col- lege radicals; C 226; see also 38 and C, 394			Grauman, Laurence Demurrer on Dec. 11, 1967, article, Goals of dissent. P. Siekevitz; C 2
Flacks, Richard; keynote speech at new uni- versities conference 536			Gray, Farnum Advancement school, part II: taking risks with the setup in Philadelphia; S 107
Fly, Sally Broadcast oratory: fallacies of equal time; S 824			Great Britain Commons' exclusion from Britain of Asian- stock nationals from Kenya. R. Blumen- thal; S 410
For Coretta King. By D. Eichhorn; P 831			Devaluation forced by gold speculation. P. L. Bernstein; S 430
For Martin Luther King. By S. Cooperman; P 831			Effect on Japan of withdrawal from Far East 336-337
Ford foundation; cosponsorship of Children's television workshop 644			Intellectuals' lack of political influence 361
Grant to New Haven anti-poverty agency 731			Labour party's crisis of theory. R. Williams; S 274
			Press compared with that of U.S. 791

PAGE

Romantic art in, 1760-1860; Philadelphia museum show reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 549

198-199

Target of Stalin's pro-Israel policy

651

627

Ugly racism revealed in issue of Kenya Asians; E

93

627

Great society; requiem for. M. Drukman; S

93

627

Great white hope, the. Reviewed by J. Novick; D

93

407; see also C, 522

Greece; 1947 situation as analogous to Vietnam. A. J. Mayer; S

8

663

On the eve of civil war: Constantine and the colonels. R. C. Macridis; S

663

778

Potential Vietnam; action needed by free world. J. P. Henderson; C

778

380

Terror in. J. Kinney; C

380

557

Green, Richard; head of Cleveland urban renewal

557

555

Greene, Felix; Inside North Vietnam telecast by NET; E

555

557

Gregory, Dick; militance at black student conference, El Paso. E. Bode; S

557

555

On riots, violence, and moral pollution

555

344

Gross, Kenneth G.

344

344

Cops and people: the off-duty gun; S

344

344

Grosser, Maurice

344

60

Reviews of art

60

290

Taranto museum, Greek and Roman treasures

290

166

Guatemala; lesson of U.S. 1954 intervention: violence and continuing social injustice; missionary priests' testimony; E

166

28

Why they shoot Americans. N. Diamond; S

28

207-208

Guess who's coming to dinner. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP

207-208

304

Guevara, Ernesto Che; inspiration to young Cubans

304

386

J. Berger on 386

69 and 196

Three poems on

69 and 196

344

Guns; boom in among rightist groups and police departments, as in Miami and Detroit; E

344

522

Cops and people: the off-duty gun. K. G. Gross; S

522

813

Gun-control law proposed as first memorial to Dr. King; E

813

813

Propaganda against regulation on Capitol hill; possible effect of Kennedy assassination; E

813

171

H

171

241

Haessler, Lucy

241

241

R. G. Sherrill ghost writer for Humphrey?; S

241

241

S

241

241

Haiti; prison compound under President Duvalier. By F. B. Kent; S

241

30

Hall, Burton

30

30

Restaurant workers' president F. Ferrara's bad contracts as the thumb in labor's soup; S

30

30

S

30

30 with Hall reply; and E, 557

30

30

Hall, Donald

30

30

Waters; P

30

364

Halle, Louis G.; dropout from Johnson administration on issue of Vietnam

364

362; see also E, 226, and 369

Halpern, Francis R.

362; see also E, 226, and 369

714

Halpern, Ray and Betty

714

714

Integration in Berkeley elementary schools: the city that went to school; S

714

714 see also Halpern corrections and emendations; C

714

182

Hamalian, Leo. See Smalls, H.

182

182

Hamlet (J. Papp production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D

182

186

Hampton Bays. By S. Gavronsky; P

186

186

Happy time, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D

186

738

Harlem. See New York city

738

738

Harris, Marvin

738

738

Big bust on Morningside Heights; Columbia U. student rebellion; S

738

738

Harris, Michael

738

738

The seven o'clock supermen: TV's first real paper, San Francisco program Newspaper of the air; T

738

377

Hass, Paul H.

377

378

Contributions solicited for Madison, Wis., referendum on Vietnam; C

378

738

Hass, Robert

738

738

Black Mountain, Los Altos; P

738

738

Hatch, Robert

738

94

Reviews of motion pictures

94

28

Anderson platoon, the 28

582

Bedazzled

582

582

Belle du jour

582

582

Bye bye Braverman

582

582

Carabinieri, les

582

582

Charlie Bubbles

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

582

582

China is near 582

582

Chinoise, la

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Victory in 1967 war failed to shake enemies' regimes 110 ff.	Praise for nonproliferation treaty with Soviet Union at U.N. 810	Leader in Indiana primary; figures analyzed. K. O'Lessker; S 686
Italy; student revolts. G. Corsini; S 750	Propaganda appearance on TV 358	Memorial of action in politics needed; E 779
It's called the sugar plum. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 221	Refusal to enter Massachusetts primary offended many students 462	Missed filing time for Wisconsin primary 399
J	Relations with Humphrey 785 ff.	Movement to stop nomination itself stopped by Democratic governors; E 556
Jacobs, James	Requiem for great society program. M. Drukman; S 627	National mood of despair following assassination; E 812
Students for a democratic society (SDS): between reform and revolution; S 753	State of the Union message inadequate and unresponsive to "a certain restlessness" in country; E 130	Oregon primary campaign 688 ff.
Jacques Brel is alive and well and living in Paris (song recital). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 318	Still impervious to harsh truths on Vietnam; E 195	Poll of Rochester, N.Y., chamber of commerce on halt to bombing of North Vietnam 132
Jacobs, Paul; possible Peace and freedom party candidate for Senate 368	Supported on Vietnam by AFL-CIO; presence at convention 6 ff.	Potential support in Massachusetts 463
James, William; experiments with hallucinogenic drugs 466	Thoughts on possible re-election; E 226	Road from Nebraska primary victory; could share ticket with McCarthy; E 682
Japan	Trip to southeast Asia and Australia showed him as quintessential Texan; E 38; see also C, 194	Time to assume national leadership in Democratic party; E 98
Abortion legal 198	Troubles in Texas; E 196	TV expenditures in primary campaigns 825
Emergence economically and politically; Vietnam war as factor and problem; E 68	Vagueness on use of draft as punishment 143	Well publicized in U.S. press 789
Fifty-year flirtation: our illusory affair with Japan. W. LaFaber; S 330	Victim of own and advisers' mythology on Vietnam war; E 227	Kent, Francis B.
Japan in Asia's future. W. M. Ball; S 82; see also C, 290	Withdrawal from presidential race robs critics of major campaign issue; E 682	Haiti: prison compound under President Duvalier; S 241
Student marchers against Vietnam war and link with U.S. By A. Axelbank; S 41; see also C, 290	Johnson, Nicholas. See Cox, Kenneth	Kenworthy, Eldon
Technological leadership in many fields; E 780	Johnston, Ben; string quartet. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M 515	Peace politics: calculus for '69; S 46; see also C, 130
Jarring, Gunnar; U.N. peacemaker's problems compounded by Israeli reprisal raid against Jordan 458	Jones, Kirby	Kenya: Asian-stock British subjects excluded by house of Commons. R. Blumenthal; S 410; see also E, 651
Jews; anti-Semitism among Negroes overstressed; bombing of Jews' homes in Jackson, Miss., by white racists; E 5	Peace corps activities in Dominican republic defended; C 618, with G. D. Berreman reply; see also 265, 267-268	Kerby, Phil
Negro "anti-Semitism": facts and fallacies. G. T. Marx; S 11	Jones, LeRoi; severe sentence of Negro playwright for role in 1967 Newark rioting; E 100	California maelstrom: the politics of desperation; S 366
Poland: anti-Semitism as usual. S. L. Sharp; S 495	Jordan, Ronald; troubled Negro veteran of Vietnam 723, 725	Democratic shake-up: the California survival kit; S 444
Joe Egg. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 247	Jordan; King Hussein received warmly in Moscow 201	From peace to Wallace: California runs the gamut in 1968 campaign; S 143
Joffrey ballet, New York City center. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 454	Reprisal raid against by Israel; responsibility for terrorists. A. Tuckerman; E 458; see also C, 554	Kennedy in Disneyland; campaigning for California primary; S 464
John Birch society. See Birch society, John	Second year of June war with Israel. S. Wolpert; S 726	Los Angeles Times: most likely to succeed among U.S. papers; S 80
Johnson, Jack; Negro heavyweight champion portrayed in play The great white hope 93	Unrealistic policies in wake of 1967 defeat by Israel 110 ff.	Watchdog California public utilities commission killed by utilities-oriented appointments; E 749
Johnson, President Lyndon B.	Junker, Howard	Kerner commission (President's advisory commission on civil disorders); inadequate recommendations to TV industry on amelioration of racial tension. J. Horn; T 390
Apparent insulation from right information on prime problems such as Vietnam and civil disorders; E 523	Death cheaters: not gone but frozen; activities of cryonics groups; S 504	LBJ's riot commission: the fact-finding charade. S. Ross; S 306
Appeal for withdrawal from presidential race made by Senator Morton; E 324	Juries. See Capital punishment	Report poses question of which war to fight; Johnson's discomfiture over conclusions; E 362
California Democrats' desperate appeals to for end to Vietnam war 366 ff.	K	Kerouac, Jack; novelist as improvisatory spokesman of Zen and Beats 440
Called Vietcong Tet offensive "complete failure" 230	Kahn, Herman. See Hudson institute	Kesey, Ken; novelist and psychedelic proselytizer 468
Count-to-10 rhyme on Vietnam war. R. I. Briggs; C 34	Kapp, Leon; judge's severe sentence of L. Jones for participation in 1967 Newark rioting; E 100	Kessler, Milton
Debasing of presidency; E 131	Karth, Representative Joseph E.; bill to limit mailing of unsolicited credit cards 210	Letter; P 278
Decision not to run followed logic of politics; E 491	Kass, Jerome. Play Saturday night reviewed by H. Clurman; D 388	Keynes, John Maynard; on solution of economic problem 474, 476
Dependence on Senator Dirksen 168 ff.	Keeping the light out. D. Lawder; P 309	Kienholz, Ed. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 29
Discomfiture over Kerner report's findings; E 362	Keith, A. M.; 1966 Minnesota gubernatorial candidate not accompanied by H. H. Humphrey on campaign tour. Mrs. B. J. Pickett; C 746; see also 567	King, Rev. Martin Luther, Jr.
Dominican intervention in 1965 brought wide disenchantment with administration	Kelly, George. Play The show-off (APA-Phoenix production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 27	Conflicting views on by H. Golden and J. S. Thurmond. By H. Golden; S 572
Dropouts from administration on Vietnam issue; E 363	Keniston, Kenneth	Died amid wreckage of great society program 627 ff.
Faced with double stalemate, should forgo candidacy; E 395	Last summer in Cambridge, Mass.: young radicals and the fear of power; S 370	Dream for U.S. Negroes has not materialized 211
Flight of intellectuals from administration 301	Kennedy, Senator Edward M.; call for new look at Vietnam war 259	Four poets on; P 831
Followed The Nation's advice to withdraw. J. M. Berns; C 586	Nonparticipation in Massachusetts primary 462, 463	Harlem's reaction to murder. B. Kremen; S 531
Humphrey's albatross; consensus as victim in Indiana and Ohio primaries; E 650	Place for as Vice Presidential candidate on McCarthy ticket; E 779	Like Gandhi, martyr of nonviolence. J. V. Bondurant; S 592
Inconsistency on violence 819	Report on civilian casualties in South Vietnam; E 4	Los Angeles calm following murder, thanks to Negro leaders' plans; E 557
LBJ's riot commission (Lerner commission); the fact-finding charade. S. Ross; S 306	Report on corruption in South Vietnam; E 196; E, 258	Memphis, scene of murder, is also America. P. Watters; S 529
Leadership should be challenged by E. F. Kennedy; E 98	Kennedy, President John F.; motivations analyzed by P. Goodman 500	Nation proposes gun-control law as first memorial; E 522
Maximum-security visit to Puerto Rico of fenced islanders; E 428	Relations with Senator Dirksen 170	On possibility of ghetto concentration camps 716
Moment of crisis for; renomination not certain; E 426	Kennedy, Senator Robert F.	Plea for massive federal aid to cities; plans for nonviolent crusade to Washington 308
Much support slipping to Kennedy and McCarthy; E 459	Ahead of McCarthy in Indiana primary; E 650	Relates poor people's march with Kerner report's findings 363
Must be denied second term for goal of change in U.S. Vietnam policy. E. Kenworthy; S 46; see also C, 130	Decision to try for Democratic presidential nomination; should not enter primaries; E 395	Tribute to murdered civil-rights leader; E 490
Name to appear on Oregon primary ballot 688, 689	Dogged by fate; wanted to secure President Kennedy's good name by defying consequences of administration; E 778	Urged defeat of Johnson at CDC convention 445
Near-moratorium on criticism after political withdrawal breached by McCarthy; E 586	Effect of Johnson withdrawal on campaign 494, 495	Kinney, John
New Hampshire supporters' strategy boomeranged; E 394	Entry into California primary brings Democratic shake-up in state. P. Kerby; S 444	Terror in Greece; C 778
Offhand attitude on corruption in Vietnam; E 685	Factors favoring presidential nomination; E 427	Kirk, Grayson. See Columbia university
Ohio politics after withdrawal. G. I. Maeroff; S 538	Good hater and arm twister applying pressure for support of candidacy; E 459	Kirstein, Lincoln
On Wisconsin primary ballot along with McCarthy 398 ff.	Hints of competition for Democratic presidential nomination 368	Praise for R. Hatch review of film War and peace; C 682; see also 645
"Personal" presidency disregarded new politics; E 493	Johnson's platitudinous tribute to; E 779	Kistiakowsky, George B.; resignation from Vietnam barrier project 503
Platitudinous tribute to R. F. Kennedy shows need for change; E 779	Kennedy in Disneyland; campaigning for California primary. P. Kerby; S 464	Scientist as dropout from administration on issue of Vietnam; E 363
Politics of violence exploited 290		Klare, Michael T.

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Stunning New Hampshire primary victory; E 394; E, 426	Race and self: tolerance in militancy; Negro civil-rights militants not apt to be anti-white; S 210	Mississippi newsletter (periodical); plea for funds. Freedom information service; C 426
Support by peace groups and dissenting Democrats urged; E 226; see also C, 362	Marxism; humanized by young new Left in U.S. 404-405	Mitterrand, François; French left-coalition leader put on defensive by de Gaulle 817, 818
Supported by Democratic faction in Michigan 340 ff.	Maryknoll fathers; role in 1954 Guatemalan intervention; missionary priests' condemnation of social injustice; E 290	Mnacko, Ladislav; Czech writer's defection to Israel over government's policies 51
Supported by R. N. Goodwin 364	Masaryk, Thomas R.; long silence on founder broken in Czechoslovakia 438-439	Moffett, Cleveland 245
Third in Indian primary; figures analyzed. K. O'Lesser; S 686	Massachusetts; factors working for McCarthy candidacy. W. David Gardner; S 462; see also C, 522	Mondale, Senator Walter F.; on credit-card abuses 210
What works for him in Massachusetts. W. David Gardner; S 462	Should erect memorial to W.E.B. DuBois despite rightists' objections; E 429; see also C, 522	Monde, Le (Newspaper); compared with best U.S. papers 790
Wisconsin primary contest against Johnson. J. P. Hunter; S 398	Meacham, Charles H. 62	On spring's events in France 816, 817-818
McCarthy, Jack; labor "consultant's" dubious activities 114 ff., 662	Praise for Rep. G. E. Brown's article of Dec. 11, 1967, I am tired of your gimmicks; C 62	Monheimer, Marc; chairman of Berkeley, Calif., master plan committee for elementary-school integration 633, 635
Mack, Carl; chairman of tracking subcommittee in Berkeley, Calif., master plan for elementary-school integration 634, 635	Meany, George. See Labor-Union	Moore, Dudley. Film 30 is a dangerous age, Cynthia, reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 422
McClellan, Senator John L.; subcommittee on investigations' probing of restaurant and J. McCarthy's National consultants association 114 ff., 125	Meat inspection; credit for tough bill to Public broadcasting laboratory and journalist N. Kotz; E 2; see also Kotz article of Sept. 18, 1967	Moore, Dudley. See also Cook, P.
McCloy, John J.; plea for reappraisal of U.S. policies, with Europe restored to position of paramount interest; E 164	Mears, Helen 823	Mora, Jose A.; retiring OAS secretary-general's administrative troubles; E 36
McConnell, Grant 164	Telegram to President not to use nuclear weapons in Vietnam answered from Pentagon; C 476	Morris, Joe Alex, Jr. 110; see also C, 426
An end to barter: new politics of conviction; S 471; see also C, 663	Medicine; humane doctors: inhumane law in California on abortion; E 261; see also C, 490	Morse, Senator Wayne; fight for renomination 689-690
McGovern, Senator George; courage on Vietnam has paid off in popularity; E 394	Potential contribution to public-health programs of defense-oriented electronics 556	Opposed by Oregon AFL-CIO leaders in bid for re-election; support from other unions 525
McHugh, Simon F., Jr.; husband of former Johnson secretary appointed to do-nothing Subversive activities control board 169	Surgical show biz in heart transplants; E 100	Morton, Senator Thruston B.; decision not to seek re-election as national tragedy; E 323
Macklin, Paul J. 169	Vietnam: the doctors' dilemma in support of armed services. M. L. Albert; S 823	On precarious state of Republican party 428
Self-fulfilling prophecies of U.S. think tanks; C 810; see also 691 ff.	Meisler, Stanley 823	Plea to Johnson not to seek re-election; E 324
MacLeod, Robert B. 322	Letter from Cape Town: telling it in Afrikaans; novels of E. Leroux and A. P. Brink; S 625	Moss, Stanley 386
Counsel of other puzzled citizens needed on U.S. presidential election; C 322	Memorandum, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; D 709	Che Guevara; P 386
McLuhan, Marshall; intellectual hero of modern age 694	Memphis, Tenn.; city of M. L. King's murder is also America. P. Watters; S 529	Mostel, Zero; performance in film The producer 485
McNair, Governor Robert E.; whitewashing of South Carolina troopers' shooting of Negro college students in Orangeburg; E 397	Menkus, Belden 529	Mothers of invention; recordings reviewed by J. Gabree; M 837
McNamara, Robert S.; characteristic of new systems men transforming U.S. society 692	Praise for H. Toch article on hippies of Dec. 4, 1967; W. Herberg not orthodox; C 2	Motion pictures; Czech intellectuals' weapon against Communist dogmatism 50
Valedictory talk elicited no response from impassive Secretary Rusk; E 228	Merriam, Eve 2	For reviews, see Hatch, R.
McNickle, D'Arcy 718	Problem of tenant of apartment owned by Columbia university, which instigates police brutality toward students; C 650	Mucha, Jiri 437; see also E, 428
John Collier's vision for U.S. Indians; S 718	Mexican Americans; California Democratic council platform on needs 445	Mumford, Lewis; on The Myth of the Machine 443
Macridis, Roy C. 8	Land war in New Mexico, led by R. L. Tijerina. By C. Knowlton; S 792	Munich, 1938; not valid analogy with Vietnam rationale; Greece of 1947 preferable. A. J. Mayer; S 407; see also C, 522
On the eve of civil war in Greece: Constantine and the colonels; S 8	Mayer, Arno J. 792	Munro, Lieut. Comdr. Ernest; U.S. naval adviser in Vietnam assassinated 166, 167
McWilliams, Carey 8	Vietnam analogy: Greece of 1947, not Munich; S 407; see also C, 522	Murdoch, Iris; on moral and political judgments 74
Protest, power and the future of politics in U.S.; S 71; see also C, 194; 752	Meyer, Howard N. 714; see also 622	Murray, Michele 483
Madison, James; on politics as reflection of economics 472, 474	Hope for democratization of Columbia board of trustees; C 714; see also 622	Murrow, Edward R.; 1959 talk on TV and politics; T 222
Madison, Wis.; funds for Vietnam referendum solicited. P. H. Hass; C 378	Miami, Fla.; epidemic of "law and order" in U.S. inspired by police chief W. E. Headley's war on crime. G. Lardner, Jr.; S 231	Museums. For reviews of shows, see Kozloff, M.
Madison, Wis., Capital Times (newspaper); congratulations on 50th anniversary; E 6	Headley's gun-and-dogs solution to crime in Negro district; E 69	Music; amateurism of New York Times criticism. B. Boretz; M 283
Maeroff, Gene I. 6	Michigan; Democrats in disarray. D. Crase; S 340	Development of pop. J. Gabree; M 836
Ohio: politics after Johnson withdrawal; S 538	Middle East; Arab nations' aftermath of six-day war: the strategy of daydreams. J. A. Morris, Jr.; S 110	Rockefeller foundation's patronage of modern-music groups. B. Boretz; M 802
Magic; of counter culture 442-443	Second year of June war. S. Wolpert; S 726	For reviews, see Boretz, B.; Gabree, J.
Mahan, Admiral Alfred Thayer; early reliance on Japan to regenerate Asia 352	Soviet machinations in; support of Nasser. A. Werth; S 198
Mailer, Norman. Film Wild 90 reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 190	Miller, Arthur; on world in revolution; no place for consensus President; E 717	N
Major, Robert 190	Play The price reviewed by H. Clurman; D 281	Canada, Ved P. 178
Reply to letter of Nov. 27, 1967, on CIA and Hungarian literary review. T. Aczel; C 66; see also C, 258	Miller, Lawrence K. 522	India's political scramble; decline of Congress party; S 178
Makavejev, Dusan. Film Love story reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 286	Berkshire Eagle not prime mover for DuBois memorial; C 522	Napalm; should be banned by international law. H. D. Rosenberg, M.D.; C 426; see also 111
Malraux, André; 1965 interview with Mao 717	Mills, C. Wright; influence on young of book Causes of World War III 402	Narcotics. See Drugs
Manes, Hugh; possible Peace and freedom party candidate for Senate 368	Milner, Esther 402	Nasser, President Gamal Abdel. See United Arab Republic
Mann, Roger, and M. Eastman 674	Editorial Scientists as citizens inaccurate on Society for social responsibility in science group's commitment; C 290; see also 101 and C, 426	Nathan, Leonard 450
Infiltration of plainclothes police among peace demonstrators; probable provocateurs; C 34	Milwaukee, Wis.; mayoralty race 399	Snow lodge; P 450
Mannin, Ethel; on need to reject violence 594	Mineral King valley, California; Walt Disney enterprises' plan to commercialize wilderness area; E 260	Nation, The 34
Mao Tse-tung; on revolution in interview with A. Malraux. By R. Stern; E 717	Minneapolis; business leaders' buildup of H. H. Humphrey 784-785	Choices for best Congressmen of year; E 183
Marcus, Morton 674	Minneapolis Tribune (newspaper); story on CIA-backed murder campaign against Vietcong leaders; E 133	J. Logan new poetry editor 183
Serenade to my derelicts; P 674	Mississippi; agriculture department's cotton-crop allotments as power lever 44	Other leaders should follow advice, as Johnson did in withdrawing. J. M. Berns; C 586
Marcuse, Herbert; Freudian Marxism's appeal to young 405, 407, 750 ff., 470	White racists' bombings of Jackson Jews' homes; E 5	Reasons for supporting E. McCarthy for presidency; E 682
On permissiveness as aid to repression 470	Would benefit from Fast deployment logistic ships contract; E 717	Revealed restaurant workers' corruption long before big papers; typical instance; E 557; see also 114 and C, 345
Marcuse, Peter 43		To fulfill unexpired subscriptions of Carolina Israelite 365
Crop allotments: power behind the cotton; S 43		National Guardian (periodical); ex-editor's memories and convictions. J. Aronson; S 174
Marks, Leonard; powerful USIA director; role in J. Daly's resignation from Voice of America; E 814		National maritime union. See Labor-Union
Martin, Peter W. 139		National rifle association; chief opponent of gun-control legislation 522
The draft as punishment: trial by Hershey; S 139		Nebraska; Kennedy primary victory; E 682
Martirano, Salvatore; Ballad. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M 515		Negro ensemble company. Production of Kogi's harvest reviewed by H. Clurman; D 581
Marx, Gary T. 11		Production of Song of the Lusitanian bogey reviewed by H. Clurman; D 125
Negro "Anti-Semitism": facts and fallacies; S 11		Production of Summer of the seventeenth doll reviewed by H. Clurman; D 356

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Negroes	Nettl, J. P.	Novick, Julius
Among "colored" targets of British work-	Are intellectuals obsolete?; S 300;	Reviews of plays
ing-class racism; E 651	see also C, 394	Great white hope, the 93
Anti-Semitism overstressed; should abjure	New Deal; built coalition governing U.S. since racism; E 5	1932 104 ff.
Benefiting from North Carolina welfare	Ideas inadequate for U.S. of 1960's 71,	O programs boycotted by poor whites. H. Golden; S 668	74-75, 75-76
Black Hessians in Vietnam. C. R. Eisen-	Michigan Democrats' heritage 341 ff.	Oakland, Calif.; prosecution of anti-draft
drath; S 146	New Hampshire; McCarthy victory in Demo-	demonstrators protested. K. Boyle et al.;
Black students hardly molested during Co-	cratic primary; E 394; E, 426	S 329
lumbia U. uprising 762-763	New Mexico. Land war; Spanish Americans'	O'Brien, Conor Cruise; speaker at Peace, California Democratic council platform on	rebellion led by R. L. Tijerina. By C.	power and politics conference held at Wel-needs 445	Knowlton; S 792	lington, N.Z., foretold Johnson withdrawal
Civil rights	New Haven, Conn.; renewal and riots. D.	O'Dwyer, Paul; call for cease-fire in Vietnam
Berkeley, Calif., integration program for	Archer; S 729	and resignation of Secretary Rusk 587 elementary grades. R. and B. Halpern;	New image of sound, the; Hunter college	Ohio; politics after Johnson withdrawal. G. I.
S 632; see also Halpern cor-	series. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M 802	Macroff; S 538
rections and emendations; C 714	New Left. See Liberals	Victory in Democratic senatorial primary of
Largely ignored by AFL-CIO; R. Wil-	New politics conference, Chicago, 1967: atti-	dove J. J. Gilligan over hawk F. J.
kins speech at convention 7-8	tude of Vietnam summer workers toward 372-373	Lausche; E 650
Law's rapid and beneficial effects. H.	Split on Vietnam; many groups not rep-	Ohnesorg, Benno; West German student's
Golden; S 506	resented 106-107	death during clash with police inspired new
Logic of attainment through segregation.	New York city	flame-ups 597 ff.
W. H. Ferry; C 19, with editors'	Fracas over school decentralization; E 748	O'Lessker, Karl reply; see also C, 194, and Nov. 27,	Linear City, Brooklyn. Reviewed by E.	Down the primary stretch: analysis of In-
1967, editorial, Grasping at chaos	Galantay; S 217	diana results; S 686
Martin Luther King; tribute to murdered	Night walk in Harlem after King murder.	Olympic games; militant opposition to Negro leader; E 490	B. Kremen; S 531	participation at black student conference, El
Memphis background of King murder. P.	Pre-baccalaureate program for students from	Paso 557, 558
Watters; S 529	ghettos. L. Kriegl; S 270	O'Neil, Lawrence; connections with Columbia
Militants not apt to be anti-white. G. T.	Shift of many responsibilities to state under	U. and Institute for defense analysis 760
Marx; S 210	Rockefeller 27	Open Theatre. Program of skits and songs
Not encouraged by state of the Union	New York state; decade of Rockefeller's gov-	reviewed by H. Clurman; D 355 message; E 130	ernorship. J. L. Wilson; S 235	Opium; exported by Laos 697
Protest, power and the future of U.S.	State university at Albany faculty group,	Orangeburg, S.C.; afterthoughts on February politics. C. McWilliams; S 71;	Teachers committee for draft counseling,	killing of Negro college students; S 397 see also C, 194	embarrasses administration; E 293	Orbach, Harold L.
Repression by gun advocated by rightists	New York Times (newspaper); amateurism	Stalin statue no longer in Prague, despite and police departments; E 69	of music criticism. B. Boretz; M 283	A. Werth statement; C 682; see
Validity of nonviolent strategy analyzed	Columns favored Columbia student insur-	also 526 following King assassination. J. V.	rection over important conservation con-
durant; S 592	ference; E 653	Oregon
Counters in game of U.S. society 822	Mask of objectivity 789 ff.	March 22 primary as moment of decision for Disadvantaged by decision-making revolution	New Zealand. Peace, power and politics in	N. A. Rockefeller 234-235
in U.S. society 690 ff.	Asia; Wellington conference urged new re-	McCarthy primary victory; E 746
Discrimination against by Agriculture de-	regional approach. C. P. Fitzgerald; S 600	National attention focused on Democratic partment in cotton-crop allotments. P.	Newark, N.J.; lessons of 1967 riot 555	presidential primary; state's political back-
Marcuse; S 43	Newton, Jesse Homer; data on requested.	ground; Senator Morse's primary fight.
Exclusion from decision making foreseen in	T. R. Crane and C. Angeletti; C 554	A. Netboy; S 687
1968 election 105, 106-107	Nichols, Mike. Film The graduate reviewed	Political winds in before primary; E 525
Fact-finding charade on riots by Kerner	by R. Hatch; MP 94	Primary as crisis for McCarthy and Ken-commission. S. Ross; S 306	Nichols, Peter. Play A day in the death of	neddy 427, 428
Factor in Michigan Democrats' disarray 341 ff.	Joe Egg reviewed by H. Clurman; D 247	State penitentiary riot caused by ghetto
Ghetto schools? Close 'em! N. W. Sulli-	Nieburg, H. L.	conditions; E 429
van; S 694	Auditing a think tank: the profit and loss	Organization of American states (OAS);
In C.C.N.Y. pre-baccalaureate program 270 ff.	of Herman Kahn; General accounting of-	financial chaos and political divisions; E 36
Indiana primary votes for Kennedy 686	fice's rejection of Hudson institute re-	Orton, Joe. Play Loot reviewed by H. Clur-
Leaders' kept Los Angeles calm following	ports; S 629	man; D 484
King murder; E 557	1976; survival to U.S. bicentennial demands	Ostling, John
McCarthy must win vote 588	critical look at misused technology; E 66	Six o'clock news; P 738
Militant element in "new" Nixon coalition;	Nixon, Richard M.
E 715	Abhorrent as presidential candidate; remark	P
Negro "anti-Semitism": facts and fallacies.	on body counts cited; E 325	Pacific telephone & telegraph co. See American
W. T. Marx; S 11	Affected by Romney withdrawal 323, 398,	telephone & telegraph co.
New Haven, Conn.: renewal and riots. D.	399	Pakistan, two poems of. A. Ahmad; P 607
Archer; S 729	Appalling candidacy; E 618	Papp, Joseph. Production of Hamlet reviewed
New politics and 472 ff.	Complete demagogue, as on Vietnam state-	by H. Clurman; D 92
North Carolina aspirants for office. H.	ments in New Hampshire campaign; E 396	Staging of The memorandum 709
Golden; S 788	Distrust of; E 98	Parks, Van Dyke; record Song cycle reviewed
Not part of TV-programming public; Ker-	Johnson's choice as opponent 324	by J. Gabree; M 837
ner commission's inadequate recommen-	Loser image remains despite Rockefeller	Parone, Edward; director of Collision course.
dations for medium. J. Horn; T 390	withdrawal; E 428	772
Not strongly anti-war or pro-McCarthy in	"New" coalition: liberals, black militants,	Pasolli, Robert
California 369	new South; E 715	Reviews of plays
Reactions to King murder in Harlem and	Oregon primary campaign 689	Collision course (11 plays at Caf� au
Chicago 531 ff.	Probable Republican nominee; practitioner	go go) 772
Rhetoric of revenge by H. Edwards and D.	of old consensus politics; E 746	Endcott and the red cross 710
Gregory at black student conference, El	Ritualistic overvaluation by Republicans 135	Passell, Peter
Paso. E. Bode; S 557	Supported by Los Angeles mayor Yorty 465	Golden hemorrhage: dollar drain of Viet-
SDS activities among 755, 756	Nonviolence; M. L. King as martyr 20 years	nam; S 102
Target of Miami and other police depart-	after Gandhi. By J. V. Bondurant; S 592	Patman, Representative Wright; inquiry into ments' epidemic of "law and order." G.	Norman, Henry R.	credit-card abuses 209-210
Lardner, Jr.; S 231	Peace corps as scapegoat of international	Peace and pacifism
Took Johnson's great society seriously 628	politics; C 362; see also 263 and	Anti-Vietnam demonstrators always include
Vietnam veterans back in U.S. 723, 725	C, 636	youthful practitioners of Zen and Hindu-
Violence and 819 ff.	North Atlantic treaty organization (NATO);	ism 439, 443
Violence at San Francisco state college.	Britain's burden 276	Apolitization of "anti-movements" 73 ff.
D. Swanston; S 38; see also C,	Instrument of coercion in Greece 8, 9-10	Battle of Chicago: a study of law and order
224, 250, 394	North Carolina; campaign of R. Hawkins,	in police conduct at Peace council demon-
Wanton killing of Orangeburg, S.C., stu-	Negro dentist, for Democratic gubernatorial	stration. J. L. Sander; S 655
dents by state troopers; E 397	nomination. H. Golden; S 788	Canadian groups' names wanted for con-
Washington, D.C.: protest and underground	Conservative segregationist Senator Ervin	certed action. Mrs. N. L. Crane; C 522 groups. F. Berry; S 589	not challenged by former Governor Sar-	Carnegie endowment officials' plea for seal-
White segregationists' use of school decen-	ford. By H. Golden; S 374	ing down of Vietnam war reflects U.S.
tralization; E 748	Kills dream of Advancement school for under-	establishment's disaffection; E 163
Woman's plea for further schooling. H.	achievers in Winston-Salem. D. Cooper;	Doctors' groups opposed to Vietnam war 823-824
Smalls; S 665, with L. Hamalian	S 77	Draft-avoidance counseling by New York
comment	Poor whites' boycott of integrated welfare	state university at Albany faculty group;
Nehru, Jawaharlal; on nonviolence and mar-	and poverty programs; S 668	E 293
tyrdom of Gandhi 592, 593	North Dakota; senate advocated withdrawal	Draft-resistance sentences, as of Father
Nelson, Jack; Los Angeles Times reporter's	from Korea in 1951. H. Hosmer; C 84	Berrigan and others; E 749
summation of killing of Negro students in	Northrup, Edward S.; judge's harsh sentences	Draft resisters at Bowdoin college receive
Orangeburg, S.C.; E 397	of anti-draft demonstrators; E 749	pledge of support from faculty group; E. 461
Nelson, Robert F.; president of cryonics so-	Novogrod, R. J.	Elderly carpers in such groups as SANE 402
ciety of California 505	Praise for C. McWilliams article on Pro-	Emissaries' frustration by State depart-test, power and the future of politics;	ment's insistence on military transporta-
	C 194; see also 71	tion for three U.S. fliers freed by North Vietnam. H. Zinn; S 431

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Escalation of dissent along with that of Vietnam war; E 492	Burned-out engine on the Southeast expressway, a. R. Whitman 581	Poverty 621
Experiment with advocated. J. E. Gaustad; C 346	Che. By L. Swaim 386	In U.S. documented by Citizens crusade against poverty and by President's national commission on rural poverty; poor people's campaign vindicated; E 621
Hoosiers for a democratic alternative supports candidates who work to end Vietnam war. J. A. Bogle; C 346	Che Guevara. By S. Moss 386	M. L. King's plans for poor people's march on Washington 308, 363, 529 ff.
Hopes for cause rise in stocks; prediction of effects on U.S. economy; E 555	Common harvest, a (to John Carter). P. L. Simpson 386	New Haven, Conn. D. Archer; S 729
Japanese student demonstrators. A. Axelbank; S 41; see also C, 290	Crisis. C. Moffett 245	Poor whites' boycott of integrated programs in North Carolina. H. Golden; S 668
Large-scale anti-draft movement led by Dr. B. Spock and others. J. Carper; S 327; see also C, 458	False scorpion, the. D. Galler 352	Requiem for Johnson's war on M. Drukman; S 627
New danger for movement in moratorium on criticism of Johnson during negotiations; E 586	For Coretta King. By D. Eichhorn 831	Solution to problem seen as possible in U.S.; Keynes cited 474-475
New tide of national politics in U.S. By E. Schneier; S 104	For Martin Luther King. By S. Cooperman 831	War on in U.S. impossible while Vietnam war continues; E 363
Peace, power and politics in Asia conference, held in Wellington, urged new regional approach. C. P. Fitzgerald; S 600	From a November journal. R. Roseliep 59	Powell, Enoch; British racist backed by much of working class; E 651
Peace and freedom party members should support McCarthy; E 226; see also C, 362	Ghost story of a New Hampshire graveyard. D. Gilbert 578	Power, political; and future of U.S. politics. C. McWilliams; S 71; see also C, 194
Peace and freedom party on California ballot 143 ff.	Glimpse of e. e. cummings, a. By D. Ignatow 573	Power to make war, the. P. Bennett; P 739
Peace and freedom party's drop in registration; can still gain many protest votes; E 685	Going home. M. Rumaker 182	Powers, Francis Gary; U-2 pilot of 1960 alive and prosperous; plane's "destruct" switch would probably have destroyed him too; E 684
Potential peace and freedom party candidates for California Senate seat; members wooed by McCarthy forces 368, 369	Hampton Bays. By S. Gavronsky 182	Prague. See Czechoslovakia
Spock, Cohn, and others indicted for opposition to draft; E 99	Ho Chi Minh selections, from book Prison diary 606	President's advisory commission on civil disorders. See Kerner commission
Student anti-war demonstrators liable to draft, by instruction of Selective service system director Hershey. By P. W. Martin; S 139	I lift a glass. L. Bruce 677	President's national advisory commission on rural poverty; report on plight of rural poor; E 621
Support sought for RESIST, anti-draft group. P. Lauter; C 66	In memoriam: M. L. K. (Martin Luther King). M. Davis 831	Press, U.S. 2
Vietnam summer, 1967, in Cambridge, Mass.: young radicals and the fear of power. K. Keniston; S 370	Keeping the light out. D. Lawder 309	Art criticism, as displayed in critiques of Dada, surrealism and their heritage show. M. Kozloff; A 706
Violent demonstrations instigated by plainclothes police? R. Mann and M. Eastman; S 34	Letter. M. Kessler 278	Choric in nature; great powers of erosion of fact and opinion. R. Stern; E 493
Vietnam veterans in minority; D. Duncan as exception 725-726	Lies. R. Bly 417	Compared with Europe's the mask of objectivity. L. R. Colitt; S 789
Washington, D.C., activities of dissident young subculture 589 ff.	Power to make war, the. P. Bennett 739	Largely silent on need for tough meat inspection; E 2
Peace corps; dream betrayed. G. D. Berremann; S 263; see also C, 362 and 618	Reason a mountain never changes, the. R. Rohr 774	Los Angeles Times: most likely to succeed among U.S. newspapers. P. Kerby; S 80
In Dominican republic 239; see also C, 586 and 618	Rue sans joie, la (to the memory of Bernard B. Fall). By R. Wilson, Jr. 738	News performance compared with TV's 376
P'eng Ming-min; Formosan political scientist jailed for statement on Formosan independence 295-296	Rumor. L. Locke 802	Often leaves small journals like The Nation to initiate investigations of corruption, as in restaurant workers' union; E 557; see also 114 and C, 345
Pennsylvania; Advancement school for underachievers in Philadelphia. F. Gay; S 107	Sedentaries, the. A. Hollo 798	Pictures and lessons to remember on Vietnam war; E 229
Pensions; milking of funds by unions. I. and J. T. Younger; S 662	Serenade to my derelicts. M. Marcus 674	Publicizes trifles but ignores subjects like renewal of defense pact with Spain; E 460
Pepper, Thomas 569	Shower, the. M. Murray 483	Shock of reality provided by Tet offensive in Vietnam and Pueblo seizure by North Korea; E 194
Underground press: growing rich on the hippie; S 569	Six o'clock news. J. Ostling 738	Underground hippie periodicals 467, 469, 591
Percy, Senator Charles H.; favorite-son candidacy from Illinois at Republican convention not supported by Senator Dirksen 170-171	Snow lodge. L. Nathan 450	Price, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 281
Pew, Thomas W., Jr. 230	Stepping out. C. Stolf 182	Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 186
Saigon from a rooftop during Tet offensive; S 230	Steward, the. D. Ray 22	Prison diary (selections). Ho Chi Minh; P 606
Philadelphia; Advancement school, part II: taking risks with the setup. F. Gray; S 107	Today decided the question. R. Aplon 704	Prisons; as ghettos encouraging riots, as in Oregon; E 429
Philby, Kim; British spy-defector hardly worse than top CIA men; E 684	Two poems of Pakistan. A. Ahmad 607	Producer, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 485
Phoenix (ship); no port in South Vietnam for Quaker mercy ketch. G. Lakey; S 338	Ugly man, the. V. Rutsala 182	Professor Bernhardt (Vienna Burgtheater production in New York). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 485
Phonograph records. For reviews, see Boretz, B. 569	Valmiki's dance. S. Cooperman 515	Progressive party; supported by National Guardian in 1948 and 1952 176
Picassos, Pablo; painting Guernica compared with J. Rosenquist's F-111. M. Kozloff; A 579	Venise sauvée (fragments). S. Weil 480	Propaganda; politicians on TV programs. J. Horn; T 358
Pickett, Mrs. B. J. 579	Vietnam protests 737	Protest movements; and future of U.S. politics. C. McWilliams; S 71; see also C, 194
Misinformation in R. G. Sherrill article on Humphrey; C 746; see also 567	Walls of snow, the. P. Rose 352	Psychiatry; gestalt therapy as expounded by P. Goodman 499 ff.
Planet of the apes. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 356	War, the: marking time. S. Plumly 739	Psychology; misuse in rebuffs, as on violence 821
Plays. For reviews, see Clurman, H.; Novick, J. 317	Waters. By D. Hall 30	Psych-out. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 518
Plaza suite. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 317	Whiskey Creek bridge. W. P. Root 352	Public broadcasting laboratory; series on meat inspection helped passage of tough bill; E 2
Plumb, J. H.; U.S. environmentalists' plans reveal lack of political ideas 75	Poetry. J. Logan new poetry editor of The Nation 183	Public utilities; California public service commission weakened by industry-oriented appointments. P. Kerby; E 749
Plumly, Stanley 739	Poland, Jefferson; San Francisco state college student suspended for sex poem 39	Pueblo (ship); reasons for seizure; E 292
Pluralism; as political shibboleth 473	Poland; anti-Semitism as usual. S. L. Sharp; S 495	Seizure by North Korea while gathering intelligence; by-product of Vietnam war; E 162
Poems 831	Anti-Soviet ferment of intellectuals. A. Werth; S 526	Seizure provided first shock of reality for U.S. press on nation's power situation; E 194
After the killing of Martin Luther King. By L. Lipsitz 831	Police 723 ff.	Puerto Ricans; in C.C.N.Y. pre-baccalaureate program 270 ff.
After the march to the Pentagon, October 1, 1966. G. Kovacs 739	Brutality in Chicago peace council demonstration. J. L. Sander; S 655	Prosperous residents in U.S. still ghetto-bound 696
Aging wife. M. Friedberg 710	Cops and people: the off-duty gun. K. G. Gross; S 344	Puerto Rico; islanders offended by Johnson's self-confinement to air base on visit; E 428
Archaic, the. D. Ray 509	Epidemic of "law and order," mainly against Negroes, as in Miami. By G. Lardner, Jr.; S 231	Putnam, George; Los Angeles TV reporter's inflammatory opinions show need for FCC to strengthen fairness doctrine; E 781
As I come home. H. Shapiro 61	Ignorant use of excessive force in riots 820
As I read my good friend's book. L. Turco 316	Increasing reliance on guns to repress ghetto disturbances; E 69; E, 196
At a dance. D. Ignatow 645	"Legitimate violence" of in U.S. By E. Z. Friedenberg; S 822
Black Mountain, Los Altos. R. Hass 738	No job provision for disabled Vietnam returnees 723 ff.
Body becomes a furrow, a. D. Schmitz 738	Plainclothesmen's arrest of peace demonstrators; probable instigation of violence in movement. R. Mann and M. Eastman; C 34
	Rough treatment of Columbia U. student rebels 763
	Savagery toward French students 815
	Separation from academic community; E 198
	Vs. Paris students. H. Braverman; S 719
	Politics 471
	End to barter, an: new politics of conviction in U.S. By G. McConnell; S 471
	Inseparable from dissent; E 492
	New constituency of new politics understood by McCarthy; E 746
	New style seen in 1968 presidential campaign; E 556
	See also Elections
	Polls; importance inflated; seeming accuracy deceptive; E 364
	Pompidou, Premier Georges; role in coping with French disturbances 817, 818
	Poor cow. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 249
	Poor people's campaign. See Poverty
	Population; in U.S. now 206 million; COPE's demonstration that increase is harmful; E 197
	Less is more: the riddle of progress. R. F. Dasmann; S 202
	Portrait of a queen. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 389
	Posters; exhibition of at Museum of modern art reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 188
		Quebec. See Canada

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
R
Radar; tin ear of war often faulty. J. Robertson; S	764	Rockefeller, Governor Nelson A.
Radio; Columbia university student station as model of fairness during week of demonstrations; E	620	Awakes in belated bid for presidential nomination; E	812
See also Broadcasting		Blockbuster decision not to seek presidential nomination; E	428
Rafferty, Max; California superintendent of schools to challenge Senator Kuchel in Republican primary	368	Decade as governor of New York. J. L. Wilson; S	235
Railroads; Japanese leadership; E	780	Leader of moderate Republicans following Romney withdrawal; E	322
RAND corporation; exemplar of "think tanks" used for Defense problem solving	630 ff.	New bid for presidency good for Republican party; E	618
Rauh, Joseph L.; moving spirit in ADA and McCarthy supporter	262-263	Presidential build-up; E	227
Ray, David		Should get off fence and enter presidential race; E	524
The archaic; P	509	Spending plan for cities	588
The steward; P	22	Time to assume national Republican leadership; E	98
Reagan, Governor Ronald; recall petition against; E	589	Waiting for Rocky: trials of a non-candidate. J. Desmond; S	234
Reason a mountain never changes, the. R. Rohr; P	774	Rockefeller foundation; impact of subsidies on modern-music groups. B. Boretz; M	802
Recorded music. For reviews, see Boretz, B.; Gabree, J.		Rodin, Auguste; sculpture defended against strictures in J. Berger article of Dec. 18, 1967. P. Hollister, Jr.; C	98
Religion; instigator of savage politics	475	Rogers, Taliaferro, Kostitsky and Lamb; architects of Linear City, Brooklyn	217
T. Leary's League for spiritual discovery	468-469	Rohr, Robert
Zen, Hinduism, etc. among counter culture's youth	439 ff.	The reason a mountain never changes; P	774
Republican party		Romanticism; youthful counter culture's ties with	406
Failure to function as opposition	76, 104-105	Romney, Governor George; significance of withdrawal from presidential contest; E	322, 398
Fate of Johnson image as key to success in 1968	135	Sponsorship for Republican presidential nomination ties N. A. Rockefeller's hands	234-235
Likely negotiators of Vietnam peace. E. Kenworthy; S	46; see also C, 130	Roosevelt, President Theodore; Asian policies and relations with Japan	352
"New" Nixon coalition; E	715	Root, William Pitt
Open convention possible; E	556	Whiskey Creek bridge; P	352
Partner in wrong-goal coalition government since 1960; E	67; 74 ff.	Rose, Phyllis
Rockefeller's new bid for presidency provides meaningful opposition to Nixon; E	618	The walls of snow; P	352
Significance of Rockefeller withdrawal; E	428	Roseliep, Raymond
Significance of Romney withdrawal; E	322	From a November journal; P	59
Time for N. A. Rockefeller to assume leadership; E	98	Rosenberg, Horace D., M.D.
Waiting for Rocky. Trials of a non-candidate. J. Desmond; S	234	Napalm should be banned by international law; C	426; see also 111
Why not Lindsay if Rockefeller doesn't make bid for presidency; E	524	Rosenbergs must not die, the. Reviewed by N. Biel; D	801
Research and development; goals prostituted by government-backed "think tanks" like Hudson institute. H. L. Nieburg; S	629	Rosenquist, James. Painting F-111 reviewed by M. Kozloff; A	578
War orientation; consequences for of a Vietnam peace; E	555	Ross, Ronald; Minneapolis Tribune story on CIA-backed murder campaign against Vietcon leaders; E	133
RESIST; support sought for draft-resistance group. P. Lauter; C	66	Ross, Sherwood
Widespread growth cited by P. Lauter	329	LBJ's riot commission (Kerner commission); the fact-finding charade; S	306
Restaurants. See Labor-Union		Rostow, Walt W.; Johnson adviser as intellectual	301
Reston, James; proposed government of national union should be rejected; E	67	Roszak, Theodore
Reuther, Walter; factors favoring auto workers' president's break with AFL-CIO and to Kennedy	427	The counter culture, part I: youth and the great refusal; S	400
Final break with G. Meany and AFL-CIO; leads withdrawal of auto workers. B. J. Widick; S	782	The counter culture, part II: politics of the nervous system; S	439
Revolution; situation in France, Czechoslovakia, West Germany, China; E	714 and 717	The counter culture, part III: capsules of salvation; S	466
Ribman, Ronald. Play The ceremony of innocence reviewed by H. Clurman; D	92	The counter culture, part IV: the future as community in P. Goodman's writings; S	497
Riegle, Rep. Donald W., Jr.; co-winner of The Nation's best Congressman of the year award for initiative on Vietnam; E	34	Rowden, Douglas; brother of two soldiers killed in Vietnam won draft deferment; E	366
Rifkin, Joshua; recordings reviewed by J. Gabree; M	838	Ruben, B.
Rigg, Col. Robert; article on use of army to suppress riots; E	197	Praise for Tuckerman editorial on Arab-Israeli dispute; C	554; see also E, 458
Riots		Rue sans joie, la (to the memory of Bernard B. Fall). By R. Wilson, Jr.; P	738
Aggravated by police ignorance, as in Los Angeles	820	Rumaker, Michael
Chicago mayor's shoot-to-kill order for arsonists and looters; E	554	Going home; P	182
National guard and Negroes	148	Rumor, L. Locke; P	802
New Haven, Conn. D. Archer; S	729	Runge, Col. Yevgeny Y.; New York Times accounts of defection to U.S. favored CIA	789-790
Role of army in suppression described in article by Col. R. Rigg; E	197	Rusk, Secretary Dean; continuing public inactivity, as at McNamara valedictory TV program; E	228
See also Kerner commission		Evasive on Vietnam with Senate interrogators	396
Rivers, Rep. L. Mendel; leader of hard-liners against draft resisters	328, 329	Russell, Senator Richard B.; sponsored harsh amendments to draft law	328, 329
Roads; damage to U.S. environment	202	Rutgers university; modern-music group concerts subsidized by Rockefeller foundation. B. Boretz; M	804
Robbe-Grillet, Alain. Film Trans-Europe-express reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	742	Rutsala, Vern
Roberts, Wallace L.		The ugly man; P	182
Church, state and money for schools; S	664
Robertson, Jack		S
Sonar and radar: tin ears of war often faulty; 1964 Tonkin Gulf incident cited; S	764	Sackler, Howard. Play The great white hope reviewed by J. Novick; D	93
Roche, John P.; resignation of White House intellectuals-in-residence from ADA	262	Saint Joan. Lincoln center repertory production reviewed by H. Clurman; D	125
		Salzman, Eric; director of series The new image of sound, at Hunter college, and composer of Verses and cantos. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M	514
		Sanford, Terry; as governor of North Carolina, established Advancement school for underachievers in Winston-Salem	77-78
		San Francisco. San Francisco state: how to wreck a campus through violent demonstrations. D. Swanston; S	38; see also C, 226, 250, 394
		San Francisco state college professor L. Wolf on trial for sponsoring "happening" TV featuring unscheduled nudity; E	198
		TV channel KQED's program Newspaper of the air. M. Harris; S	377
		Sanford, Terry; praise for progressive former governor of North Carolina. H. Golden; S	374
		Sang prize; for critics of fine arts; awarded to H. Clurman	420
		Sarit Thanarat; late Thai boss's regime based on corruption	697
		Sato, Premier Eisaku. See Japan
		Saturday night. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	388
		Satyagraha; Gandhian technique of nonviolence	594
		Saudi Arabia; new prestige in Arab world following 1967 Arab-Israeli war	112
		Schlesinger, Arthur, Jr.; neutral between Humphrey and McCarthy	812
		Schmitz, Dennis
		A body becomes a furrow; P	738
		Schneider, Edward
		Munich analogy with Vietnam dismissed too quickly by A. J. Mayer; C	522; see also 407
		The new tide of national politics in U.S.; S	104
		Schnitzler, Arthur. Play Professor Bernhardt (Vienna Burgtheater production in New York) reviewed by H. Clurman; D	485
		Schoendorfer, Pierre. Film The Anderson platoon reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	94
		Schools. See Education
		Schrade, Paul; California UAW director for Kennedy	460
		Schrafft's; restaurant chain's advantageous contract with union	114 ff.
		Schreiber, Emanuel
		Japanese student protesters' effectiveness exaggerated by A. Axelbank; C	290; see also 41
		Schultz, Dagmar. See Koppel, C.
		Science; AAAS study of chemical-biological warfare in Vietnam; E	325; see also E, 588
		As superstition	443
		Scientists as citizens; disputed role in war-oriented society; E	101; see also C, 290 and 426
		Science for the Pentagon: the secret thinkers. M. T. Klare; S	503
		SDS. See Students for a democratic society
		Sedentaries, the. A. Hollo; P	798
		Selective service system. See United States—Defense, national Seller, W. A.
		Praise for W. M. Ball article on Japan; C	290; see also 82
		Serenade to my derelicts. M. Marcus; P	674
		Seven descents of Myrtle, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	516
		Shanahan, Edward K.
		Credit cards: the thief in the mailbox; S	209
		Shapiro, Harvey
		As I come home; P	61
		Sharp, Samuel L.
		Poland: anti-Semitism as usual; S	495
		Sheep; killed by gas from army's Utah tests of chemical-bacteriological nerve agent; E	588
		Sherrill, Robert G.
		Americans for democratic action: the aging men of principle; S	261
		Hubert Humphrey: the illusion of change; S	783
		Hubert Humphrey: speaking in tongues; S	564; see also C, 650 and 746
		Shower, the. M. Murray; P	483
		Shaw, George Bernard. Play Saint Joan (Lincoln center repertory production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D	125
		Shedd, Mark R.; Philadelphia school superintendent invited in Advancement school as agent for change	107
		Shower, John
		Objections to Dec. 18, 1967, article on San Francisco state college radicals. R. Fitzgerald and A. Anton; C	226; see also C, 394
		Show-off, the (APA-Phoenix production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	27
		Shulman, Max. Musical How now, Dow Jones, reviewed by H. Clurman; D	28
		Shumlin, Herman. Play Spofford, adapted from P. De Vries novel Reuben, Reuben, reviewed by H. Clurman; D	27
		Siegel, Armand
		War-resistance movement outside politics needed; C	130; see also 46

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Siekevitz, Philip		Impassive Rusk on camera at McNamara TV valedictory; E	228	Small viewer response to U.S. troops' atrocities in Vietnam; E	5; see also C, 162
Demurrer on L. Grauman article Goals of dissent, Dec. 11, 1967; C	2	Revolutionary test: dreams of young in many countries; parallel with Camisards of 17th-century France; E	717	Tribute to late producer I. Gitlin. By J. Horn; T	60
Silver, Adele Zeidman		Steward, the D. Ray; P	22	See also Broadcasting
Cleveland's 100 days: the education of Negro mayor Carl Stokes; S	379	Stock market; unwarranted peace boom; E	555	Tell me lies. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	285
Simon, Neil. Play Plaza suite reviewed by H. Clurman; D	317	Stokes, Mayor Carl. See Cleveland, Ohio		Texas; Johnson as quintessential son of, as on flamboyant world trip; E	38; see also C, 194
Simonson, Gilbert; California Packinghouse leader for Kennedy	460	Stoloff, Carolyn		Johnson's troubles in; E	196
Simpson, Jerry; disabled Vietnam veteran's fight for New York city police job	723, 724-725	Stepping out; P	182	Thailand; corruption magnified by U.S. military presence; E	685
Simpson, Peter L.		Storrow, J. J., Jr.		Corruption under Sarit regime and now	697, 700
A common harvest (to John Carter); P	386	Unexpired subscriptions of Carolina Israelite to be fulfilled by The Nation ; prospective contributions by H. Golden; S	365	Mercenary "ally" of U.S. in Vietnam war; E	37
Sinclair, Upton; aged reformer present at signing of wholesome meat act; E	2	Strikes. See Labor—Union		U.S. penetration resented; E	326
Sirota, Leo		Strong, Anna Louise; Soviet charge of espionage refuted by National Guardian	175	Theatre; American playground, experimental "guerrilla" group in Washington, D.C.	592
A. Werth disputed on Israeli "aggression" against Syria; C	378, with Werth reply	Students for a democratic society (SDS); activities at San Francisco state college	39	For reviews of plays, see Clurman, H.; Hatch, R.; Pasoli, R.; Biel, N.
Six o'clock news. J. Ostling; P	738	SDS: between reform and revolution. J. Jacobs; S	753	Thieu, President Nguyen Van; rivalry with other U.S. puppet, Vice President Ky, in South Vietnam. T. V. Dinh; S	136
Slominski, Antoni; Jewish writer target of Polish regime	497	Suburbs; how suburbia votes. J. Zikmund II; S	826	30 is a dangerous age, Cynthia. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	422
Smalls, Harrisene		Suez canal; continued closing for political reasons	111	Thomsen, Knud Leif. Film Venom reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	156
Negro woman's plea to L. Hamalian of City college for further schooling; S	665, with Hamalian comment	Sullivan, Neil W.; Berkeley, Calif., superintendent of schools amid plan for integrating elementary grades	633, 694	Thurmond, Senator J. Strom; called the murdered M. L. King an agitator in debate with H. Golden	572
Smith, Desmond		Ghetto schools? Close 'em!; S	694	Thying, Lieut. Col., in charge of counterinsurgency operation in Guatemala	166, 167
Journalism on the air: the seven o'clock supermen; T	375	Summer of the seventeenth doll (Negro ensemble company production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	356	Tiger at the gates (Lincoln center repertory theater production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	389
On maneuvers with the Red army; S	658	Summerskill, John; San Francisco state president on defensive in racist turmoil	39-40; see also C, 250	Tijerina, Reyes Lopez; leader of Spanish-American land war in New Mexico	793 ff.
Snow lodge. L. Nathan; P	450	Surrealism. See Dada		Time (periodical); promotion of psychedelic experience	470
Socialism; crisis of theory in Great Britain. R. Williams; S	274	Suslov, M. A.; Stalinist ideological chief of Soviet politburo	528	Toch, Hans
Japanese orientation toward China	331	Swaim, Lawrence	386	Article of Dec. 4, 1967, Anatomy of a hangup: last word on the hippies, praised and condemned; C	2; see also 403
Sociology; challenge to intellectual	302 ff.	Che; P		Today decided the question. R. Aplon; P	704
Soka Gakkai; political successes of Japanese religious sect	331-332	Swanson, David		Tokyo. See Japan
Soldiers. Reviewed by R. Hatch; D	678	Activism vs. Reaganism: the meddlers at Berkeley campus of U. of California; S	171	Tolstoy, Leo. Film of novel War and peace reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	645; see also C, 682
Sonar; tin ear of war often faulty; 1964 Tonkin Gulf incident cited. J. Robertson; S	764	San Francisco state: how to wreck a campus through violent demonstrations; S	38; see also C, 226, 250, 394	Tom Paine. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	516
Song of the Lusitanian bogey. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	125	Sweet, Marie Phelps; instructed husband to have her body frozen	505-506	Tonkin Gulf; sonar faulty in 1964 naval incident. J. Robertson; S	764
South, U.S.; Agriculture department's cotton-crop allotments as power lever. P. Marcuse; S	43	Syria; relations with Egypt and Soviet Union; "attacked" by Israel in April, 1967. A. Werth; S	198; see also C, 378, with Werth reply	Trans-Europ-express. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	742
In "new" Nixon coalition; E	715	Unrealistic policies in wake of 1967 defeat by Israel	110 ff.	Transportation; Japanese leadership; E	780
States' power in 1968 conventions	105			Travel; Johnson administration's requested curbs on outside western hemisphere	103-104
South Africa, Republic of. Letter from Cape Town: telling it in Afrikaans; novels of E. Leroux and A. P. Brink. By S. Meisler; S	625			Trudeau, Prime minister Pierre Elliott. See Canada
South Carolina. See Orangeburg, S.C.				Truman, David; Columbia U. vice-president's activities during student revolt	757 ff.
Soyinka, Wole				Trusis, Aivars S.
Play Kongi's harvest reviewed by H. Clurman; D	581			Agreement with W. H. Ferry on segregation; C	194; see also C, 19
Space; threatened cuts in NASA funds; W. Von Braun's disingenuous plea; E	653			Tuckerman, Anne
Spain; intellectual freedom penalized, as in star-chamber trial of labor leader M. Camacho; U.S. defense pact should not be renewed; E	525			Once more, with blood; Israeli reprisal raid on Jordan followed by inconclusive U.N. resolution; E	458; see also C, 554
Renewal of unpublicized defense pact should be on Senate agenda; E	460			Putting back the genie; U.S.-Soviet non-proliferation treaty approved at U.N.; E	810
Spanish Americans; New Mexican land war. C. Knowlton; S	792			Stirrings in the elephant grass; tentative negotiation feelers on Vietnam to and in U.N.; E	3
Spies. See Espionage				Turco, Lewis
Spivak, Lawrence E.				As I read my good friend's book; P	316
Exceptions to J. Horn's account of Meet the press TV program; C, with editors' reply, 458 and 476; see also 358				Twentieth century fund; foundation's voluntary payment to New York city in lieu of taxes; E	293
Spock, Dr. Benjamin; conspiracy indictment for opposition to draft; E	99			Two poems of Pakistan. A. Ahmad; P	697
Real crime in anti-draft counseling. J. Carper; S	327; see also C, 458			2001. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	742
Spofford. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	27			Tyler, Gus; ILGWU vice president opposed to pro-McCarthy ADA resolution	263
Springer, Axel; West German press magnate, target of student demonstrations	597, 599
Stabile, Toni
Adventures in the skin trade; prosperous cosmetics industry's dubious practices; S	16
Staircase. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	156
Stalin, Joseph V.; machinations in Middle East	198-199
Stalinism; new freedom from in Czechoslovakia and ferment in Poland; continuing dominance over Soviet writers. A. Werth; S	526; see also C, 682
Starnier, Frances L.
Aid and "squeeze" in Asia; corruption in all levels of government; S	696
Stassen, Harold E.; contender in Wisconsin Republican presidential primary	399
Steel industry; tension preceding wage-contract negotiations	7
Stennis, Senator John C.; backer of Fast deployment logistics ship contract	717
Stepping out. C. Stoloff; P	182
Stern, Frederick C.
Eleven hours in Chicago following King murder; S	533
Stern, Richard
The chorus and Miss McCarthy; choric nature of U.S. press erodes opinions; E	493

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
With United Arab republic: Russia on the Nile. A. Werth; S 198; see also C, 378, with Werth reply	Renegotiation board of treasury department, little watchdog of the dollar warriors. S. Watzman; S 297	With Thailand; missiles in exchange for mercenaries in Vietnam; E 37
Held equivalent of Hitler Germany by U.S. cold-war policymakers 408-409	Science for the Pentagon: the secret thinkers. M. T. Klare; S 503	With Thailand; penetration resented; E 326
In the beginning there was art; modernists of 1917-1923. J. Berger; A 88	Secretary-designate C. Clifford, key man in military-industrial complex, cannot divest himself of old ties; E 228	General accounting office
Intellectuals' status 300 ff.	Services' attractions for Negroes 147-148	Rejection of Hudson institute reports on civil-defense problems. H. L. Nieburg; S 629
Nonproliferation treaty with U.S. approved at U.N. By A. Tuckerman; E 658	Sheep killed by nerve agent in army's Utah chemical-bacteriological experiments; E 588	Health, education and welfare department
On maneuvers with the Red army. D. Smith; S 658	Sonar and radar; tin ears of war often faulty; 1964 Tonkin Gulf incident cited. J. Robertsoj; S 764	Cosponsorship of Children's television workshop 644
United Arab Republic. Russia on the Nile; background of Soviet backing of Nasser vs. Israel. A. Werth; S 198; see also C, 378, with Werth reply	Spock-Coffin indictment for opposition to draft; E 99	Food and drug administration's accommodation with cosmetics industry. T. Stabile; S 16
Second year of June war with Israel. S. Wolpert; S 726	Time for budget cutting; post-Vietnam limits imperative for national economy; E 684	Information agency
Unrealistic policies in wake of 1967 defeat by Israel 110 ff.	Tradition of docility to draft broken by Dr. Spock and others indicted for conspiracy. J. Carper; S 327	Resignation of J. Daly as director of Voice of America; E 814
United automobile workers. See Labor—Union	Economics	Interior department
United Nations	Economist R. Eisner's reasons for opposing increase in income tax; E 36; see also Eisner letter; C, 162	Furthering commercialization of Mineral King valley wilderness in California 260
Exit Arthur Goldberg as ambassador. A. Tuckerman; E 620	Gigantic defense expenditures counterproductive and must be limited; E 684	Justice department
Inconclusive resolution following Israeli reprisal raid against Jordan. A. Tuckerman; E 558; see also C, 554	Golden hemorrhage: dollar drain of Vietnam. P. Passell; S 102	Calls threat of detention camps academic; E 716
Peacekeeping efforts since June, 1967, war 727-728	Projected consequences of Vietnam peace; E 555	Effective prosecution of voting-registration cases in South 506
Strengthening advocated by ex-ambassador C. Yost 195	Vietnam and the gold drain. P. L. Bernstein; S 430	Indictment of Dr. B. Spock and others for conspiracy in anti-draft counseling. J. Carper; S 327. See also C, 458
Tentative negotiation feelers on Vietnam. A. Tuckerman; E 3	Executive branch	Modified Hershey directive on drafting of student demonstrators 140
UNESCO gift coupons not tainted with moral imperialism. G. Koski; C 362; see also 263	Increase in power vis-à-vis Congress 72	Labor department
United States	Presidency debased by Johnson; E 131	Programs for Vietnam veterans 724 ff.
Agency for international development (AID) See Foreign aid	Federal communications commission	National aeronautics and space administration (NASA)
Agriculture department	Prodded by members Cox and Johnson on passivity on criteria for license renewals; E 781	Space director W. Von Braun's disingenuous plea for increased appropriations; E 652
Crop allotments: power behind the cotton. P. Marcuse; S 43	Should strengthen fairness doctrine for broadcasts; E 781	Presidency
Central intelligence agency	Foreign policy	A. Miller on: no place for consensus figure in revolutionary world; E 717
Beneficent connection with Hungarian exiles' literary review. T. Azzel; C 66; see also C, 258, and R. Major letter of Nov. 27, 1967	Bipartisan consensus as cause of U.S. moral rot 74 ff.	Johnson's debasing of; E 131
Columbia U.'s connections with 759	Crossroads of decision: neo-imperialism or co-operation; E 164	Overinsulation of; E 523
Favored in New York Times accounts of Y. Y. Runge's defection 789-790	Establishment's disaffection over Vietnam, as evidenced by statements by Carnegie endowment officials and J. J. McCloy; E 164	Society
Murder campaign against Vietcong leaders; E 133	H. H. Humphrey's changing stands on 568-569	America revisited: now lonely frontier of reason, as in decision making. M. Crozier; S 690; see also C, 810
Should share budget cuts; dirty business exemplified by switch probably designed to destroy U-2 pilot along with plane; E 684	On southeast Asia declared bankrupt at peace, power and politics conference in Wellington, N.Z. By C. P. Fitzgerald; S 600	Counter culture, the, part I: youth and the great refusal. T. Roszak; S 400
Congress	Peace corps as attention-diverter from unpalatable aspects 265	Counter culture, the, part II: politics of the nervous system. T. Roszak; S 439
Best members of 1967, according to The Nation ; E 34	Pervasive influence of Munich analogy. A. J. Mayer; S 407; see also C, 522	Cycles of influence on European youth 750 ff.
Bills to regulate pension funds 662-663	Promoted in Latin America through supplying of arms; E 260	Intellectuals' irrelevance 300 ff.
Breakup of log jam on Vietnam; E 258	Recruitment of mercenary "allies" in Southeast Asia for Vietnam war; E 37	New politics of conviction. G. McConnell; S 471
Dirksen, the Presidents' chameleon, dominates Senate 168	Revision urged in California Democratic council platform 445	Protest, power and the future of politics. C. McWilliams; S 71; see also C, 194
Disaffection in Senate on Vietnam policy; Rusk interrogated; E 196	Unsuccessful in Latin America; OAS's troubles; E 36	Rapid deterioration demands critical look at misused technology if 1976 bicentennial is to be celebrated; E 66
Dropouts on Vietnam 364	Foreign relations	"Sick Society"; Johnson-appointed Commission on violence; mood of despair following assassination of R. F. Kennedy; E 812
Erosion of powers 72-73	With Canada; acceptance of nuclear weapons as issue 562, 563-564	Violence in 819 ff.
Gun-control law would be fitting first memorial to Dr. King; E 522	With China (Nationalist). M. B. Young; S 294; see also C, 554	State department
Pueblo seizure brings rabid reaction; E 162	With Czechoslovakia; belated encouragement of liberals; captured gold reserves should be returned; E 652	Assistant secretary C. Frankel's resignation because of Vietnam policy; E 165
Senate code of ethics as farce of year; E 461	With Dominican republic since 1965 intervention. H. J. Wiarda; S 238. See also C, 586	Belated unfreezing of Czech policy; E 652
Defense, national	With Greece; problem of recognizing military junta. R. C. Macridis; S 8	Captured document of Vietcong plans for governmental control probably counterfeited. E. Chall; C 258
Anti-draft activities in Washington, D.C. 591-592	With Guatemala; why Americans furthering counterinsurgency operations are shot. N. Diamond; S 166	Insistence that three U.S. fliers freed by North Vietnam return via military plane. H. Zinn; S 431
Army contrasted to Soviet. D. Smith; S 658	With Guatemala since 1954 intervention; violence and social injustice endemic; E 290	Restrictions on participation in Havana cultural congress 243 ff.
Army's role in suppressing riots described in article by Col. R. Rigg; E 197	With Japan; fifty-year flirtation with W. LaFeber; S 330	Subversive activities control board
Civil-defense reports of Hudson institute rejected by General accounting office. H. L. Nieburg; S 629	With Japan; influence of Vietnam war; E 68; 82 ff.	Do-nothing agency saved by Senator Dirksen 169
Concentration of power in U.S. military-industrial complex. C. McWilliams; S 71	With Japan; student marchers against A. Axelbank; S 41; see also C, 290	Supreme court
Department reorganized by civilian McNamara 692	With South Korea; "mercenaries" to Vietnam; E 37	Legal absurdity of ruling on penalty for draft-card burning. J. Kinney; C 778
The draft as punishment: trial by Hershey. By P. W. Martin; S 139	With Soviet Union; nonproliferation treaty approved at U.N. A. Tuckerman; E 810	Ruling that jurors in capital-punishment cases need not be excused because opposed to death penalty; E 814
Draft counseling by New York state university at Albany faculty group; E 293	With Spain; defense pact should not be renewed with arbitrary dictatorship; E 525	Transportation department
Draft-resistance sentences, as in Berrigan case; E 749	With Spain; issue of defense-pact renewal should be on Senate agenda; E 461	Role in socializing Bureau of public roads, as in planned Linear City, Brooklyn. E. Galantay; S 217
Enormous budget's effects on economy; predicted consequences of Vietnam peace; E 555		Treasury department
Fast deployment logistics ships contract voted by Senate; E 717		Measures to prop dollar internationally 102 ff.
Hawkish background of C. Clifford, new secretary; E 194		Renegotiation board, little watchdog of the dollar warriors. S. Watzman; S 297
National board for the promotion of rifle practice to decide its policy on gun-control legislation 523		Unruh, Jesse M.; California Democratic politician embarrassed by San Francisco state college demonstrations 40
National guard and Negroes; use in riots October, 1967, demonstration against Pentagon 439		Chief supporter of R. F. Kennedy in California 444
		Hints of R. F. Kennedy try for presidential nomination 367-368
		Kennedy campaign director in California 465
		Up the junction. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 486
		Urban renewal. See Cities, U.S.

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
V		Johnson trip to; E	38	Possible provocation by administration among young dissenters. P. Siekevitz; C	18
Vaculik, Ludvik; Czech writer's opposition to Communist dogmatism	50 ff.	Johnson's insulation from unpleasant truths; E	523	Presidential commission on, headed by M. S. Eisenhower; E	812
Valmiki's dance. S. Cooperman; P	515	Johnson's withdrawal blunts wars as election issue; E	682	U.S. pre-eminence; lesson of Guatemala; E	290
Van Norden, Russ Le Croix; elderly proponent of cryonics	505-506	Kerner report demonstrates impossibility of waging war on poverty at same time; E	362	What violence is. N. Garver; S	819
Vanik, Rep. Charles A.; cosponsor of bill to strengthen renegotiation board	299, 300	Like a small dead man; lone survivor of ambushed U.S. platoon. W. Eastlake. S	13	See also Nonviolence
Vaughn, Jack Hood; peace corps head's article in Saturday Review discounted Vietnam war as factor in deterioration	264 ff.	Madison, Wis., referendum on war. P. H. Hass; C	378	Virginia; plans for population growth in Fairfax county	202-203
Venise sauvée (fragments). S. Weil; P	480	Massachusetts anti-war sentiment works for McCarthy	462 ff.	Voice of America; resignation of director J. Daly; E	814
Venom. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	156	New tide of opposition to war in U.S. By E. Schaefer; S	104	Von Braun, Wernher; faulty economic arguments in plea for NASA funds; E	652
Veterans; of Vietnam war contrasted with others. S. Goodman; S	723; see also C, 773	Nixon on war and body counts; E	325	Voting; beneficial effect of laws for Negroes. H. Golden; S	506
Vidal, Gore. Play Weekend reviewed by H. Clurman; D	454	Nixon's demagoguery on war; E	396
Vienna Burgtheater. New York production of play Professor Bernhardi reviewed by H. Clurman; D	485	No port for mercy ketch Phoenix . G. Lahey; S	338	W
Vietnam		Old arguments on war in Johnson's renunciation speech; E	491	Walker, Deward E., Jr.; sole author of report on American Indians cited in Dec. 25, 1967, editorial	130
AFL-CIO convention's support of war. B. J. Widick; S	6	Peace, power and politics conference. Wellington, N.Z., on. C. P. Fitzgerald; S	600	Wallace, George C.; challenge in 1968 presidential race makes Nixon nomination senseless	98
AFL-CIO's official backing of war as factor in withdrawal of auto workers; B. J. Widick; S	782	Peace boom on Wall street; consequence of peace for U.S. economy predicted; E	555	On California presidential ballot	143-144
Americans for democratic action on war	262	Peace politics for '68 in U.S. By E. Kenworthy; S	46; see also C, 130	Strong position as spoiler	323, 324, 370
Analogy for rationale of U.S. policy seen in Greece of 1947 rather than Munich of 1938. A. J. Mayer; S	407; see also C, 522	Pentagon's search for scientific solutions for war	503-504	Unlikely to throw presidential election into House of Representatives	135
Asian-country "mercenaries" on U.S. side; E	37	Petty enforced military route home for three Americans freed by North. H. Zinn; Poems against war	738	Wallace, Henry A.; relations with H. H. Humphrey	567-568
Black Hessians; U.S. Negro troops in war. C. R. Eisendhrath; S	146	Pressures mounting on U.S. to cease bombing; E	132	Walls of snow, the. P. Rose; P	352
Bowdoin college faculty group pledges support to student draft resisters; E	461	Prolonged war creates incidents such as Pueblo seizure; E	162	War; and scientists' role as citizens; E	101
Breakup of log jam in war within U.S.; E	258	Saigon from a rooftop during Tet offensive. T. W. Pew, Jr.; S	230	As institution in U.S.; Fortune article cited; E	747
California Democratic Council platform on ending war	445	Scientists and; E	101	War, the: marking time. S. Plumly; P	739
California Democrats' politics of desperation on war issue. P. Kerby; S	366	SDS opposition to war	753 ff.	War and peace. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	645; see also C, 682
Captured Vietcong document on plans for control of government probably counterfeited. E. Chalk; C	258	Shock of reality for U.S. press in Tet offensive; E	194	Warsaw pact; Czech adherence to despite moves toward internal liberalization	527, 528
Chemical-bacteriological warfare by U.S. studied by AAAS; E	325	Site of negotiations and limited bombing as material for dispute; McCarthy rejects moratorium on criticism of Johnson; E	586	Washington, D.C. The capital scene: Washington, like it is; young Negro militants' omnidirectional activities. F. Berry; S	589
Choice on war needed in 1968 U.S. election; E	67	Stalemate on war makes Johnson withdrawal from presidential race logical; E	395	Lessons of April riot	554
CIA-backed murder campaign against Vietcong leaders; E	133	Stirrings in the elephant grass; tentative negotiation feelers, as to U.N. By A. Tuckerman; E	3	Washington free press (periodical); hippie forum	591, 592
Corruption endemic; magnified by war; E	685	Strike of Saigon electrical workers broken by South Vietnamese army; E	132	Waters. By D. Hall; P	30
Corruption in South	698-700	Thieu and Ky: the rivalry of puppets. T. V. Dinh; S	136	Watkins report; on foreign ownership in Canada	564
Count-to-10 rhyme for Johnson on war. R. I. Briggs; C	34	3 purple hearts, 2 turtle doves and an ambush in a flame tree. W. Eastlake; S	113	Watters, Pat
Crossroads of decision for U.S. foreign policy; E	164	Tonkin Gulf naval incident, 1964; sonar faculty. J. Robertson; S	764	Memphis is also America; city of M. L. King's murder; S	529
Crucial manifestation of violence in U.S.; E	812; 819	Tremendous civilian casualties in south described in E. M. Kennedy report; E	4	Watts, Alan; psychedelic experiments	466
Disaffection on war policies in U.S. Senate; Rusk interrogated; E	396	U.S. establishment disaffected on war; Carnegie endowment officials, plea for scaling down; E	163	Watzman, Sanford
Discovered by Association for Asian studies; group's resolutions on war. M. B. Young; S	507	U.S. terror tactics defended by veterans B. and J. Libby; E	101	Little watchdog of the dollar warriors; renegotiation board; S	297
Divisive effects of war in U.S.	472 ff.	Vietnam dead, the. W. Eastlake; S	269	We bombed in New Haven. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	26
Doctors' dilemma in supporting armed services. M. L. Albert; S	823	War and U.S. income surtax; ineffectiveness argues; E	36; see also C, 162	Webber, Col. John, Jr.; assassination of U.S. military chief in Guatemala	166, 167
Draft-avoidance counseling by New York state university at Albany faculty group; E	293	War as factor in decline of Peace corps	264 ff.; see also C, 362 and 618	Weekend. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	454
Eisenhower's falling-dominoes theory	334	War as factor in Japan's emergence and problem in foreign policy; E	68	Weil, Simone
Escalation of dissent on war in U.S.; E	492	War as institution in U.S.; E	747	Venise sauvée (fragments); P	480
F. Greene's Inside North Vietnam telecast by NET in U.S.; E	164; see also C, 258	War as proper target for intensified attack by presidential challenger E. McCarthy; E	5	Weinberg, Harry; string quartet. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M	515
Failure of U.S. forces ascribed by Gen. E. C. Wheeler to U.S. anti-war sentiment; E	35	War brought lack of confidence in U.S. political system	76-77	Weisberg, Arthur; director of modern-music group at Rutgers university	804
Failure of U.S. military intelligence; E	292	War hopeless because not supported by Americans and South Vietnamese; E	324	Weiss, Peter. Play Song of the Lusitanian bogey reviewed by H. Clurman; D	125
Few protests to TV stations over U.S. atrocities; E	5; see also C, 162	War causes dropouts from Johnson administration; E	363	Welt, Die (newspaper); compared with U.S. papers	790
Frustration on war breeds apolitization in U.S.	72 ff.	War pictures to remember on U.S. TV and in press, as of monk's self-immolation and shooting of Vietcong suspect by police chief; E	229	Werth, Alexander
Gold drain and war. P. L. Bernstein; S	430	War profits of U.S. concerns reviewed by inadequate renegotiation board. S. Watzman; S	297	Eastern Europe: Moscow's wayward satellites; S	525; see also C, 682
Golden hemorrhage; dollar drain of war in U.S. By P. Pasell; S	102	War wrecked great society program. M. Drukman; S	627	Russia on the Nile; background of Soviet backing of Nasser; S	198; see also C, 378, with Werth reply
Harsh military facts may finally penetrate Johnson administration; E	195	War's influence on Japanese foreign policy. W. M. Ball; S	82	This spring in France: students, workers and General de Gaulle; S	815
Hoosiers for a democratic alternative group supports anti-war candidates in Indiana and U.S. By J. A. Bogle; C	346	What now in direction of negotiation of conflict, following Johnson withdrawal from presidential race; E	492	Werthimer, Jerrold L.
Invisible veterans of war in U.S. By S. Goodman; S	723; see also C, 778	When will U.S. atomic weapons be used; E	259	Praise for Nation articles on San Francisco state college radicals; C	394; see also 38 and C, 226
Issue in Ohio Democratic senatorial primary. G. I. Maeroff; S	538	Village Voice (periodical); successful formula for underground press	570-571	Westmoreland, General William C.; overoptimistic predictions and evaluations of U.S. commander in Vietnam; E	195; E, 258; E, 293
Issue in Wisconsin primary	398 ff.	Violence		Wheeler, General Earle G.; chairman of joint chiefs of staff's alibi for U.S. military failure in Vietnam; E	35
Japanese student demonstrations against war. A. Axelbank; S	41; see also C, 290	"Legitimate violence" of U.S. police. E. Z. Friedenberg; S	822	Disclaims need for atomic weapons in Vietnam	260
Japan's economic benefits from war	331			Opposed to negotiation of Vietnam war	139
Johnson as victim of own mythology on war; E	227			Whiskey Creek bridge. W. P. Root; P	352
Johnson not to be believed on war; E	131			White, E. B.; on blame for America's social ills	67
				Whitman, Ruth
				A burned-out engine on the Southeastern expressway; P	581
				Wiarda, Howard J.
				The Dominican fuse; President Balaguer's key position; S	238. See also C, 586
				Widick, B. J.
				Labor at Bal Harbour convention: Meany's wooden soldiers' lack of dynamism and support of Vietnam war; S	6

	PAGE
Walter Reuther breaks his chains; withdrawal of auto workers from AFL-CIO; S	782
Wild in the streets. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	805
Wild 90. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP	190
Wilkins, Roy; NAACP president's militant speech at AFL-CIO convention	7
Wilkinson, Conrad
AID and politics in Dominican republic; C	586; see also 238
Williams, Raymond
Letter from London: socialism's (Labour party's) crisis of theory; S	274
Williams, Tennessee. Play The seven descents of Myrtle reviewed by H. Clurman; D	516
Wilson, Jerome L.
Rockefeller decade as governor of New York; S	235
Wilson, Robley, Jr.
Rue sans joie, la (to the memory of Bernard B. Fall); P	738
Wilson, President Woodrow; influence on H. H. Humphrey	686
Windmiller, Marshall; criticisms of peace corps	265, 266, 267
Objections to statements on San Francisco state college radicals in Dec. 18, 1967, article. R. Fitzgerald and A. Anton; C	226; see also C, 394
Windt, Ted; El Paso professor on need for love between races	559, 560
Winston-Salem. See North Carolina
Wisconsin; next presidential primary stop. J. P. Hunter; S	398
Primary's importance for Johnson and McCarthy; E	426
Wolf, Leonard; San Francisco state college professor on trial for sponsoring "happening" featuring unscheduled nudity; E	198
Wolpert, Stanley
Second year of the June war in Middle East; S	726
World war II; brought concentration of power in U.S.	71
Worsthorne, Peregrine; British journalist as dropout on Vietnam issue	364
Writers and writing; Czech nettles against Communist dogmatism. J. Dornberg; S	50
Stalinism of professional union in Russia, liberalism in Czechoslovakia and Poland. This spring in Prague; liberalizing revolt. J. Mucha; S	437; see also E, 428
Y
Yarborough, Don; liberal probable next governor of Texas; E	196
Yglesias, Helen
Havana cultural congress, the; S	243
Yorty, Sam; Los Angeles mayor as divisive factor in California Democratic politics. Not to seek nomination for senator; pro-Nixon sympathies	465
Yost, Charles; book advocates strengthening of U.N.	195
Young, Marilyn Blatt
The Asian experts discover Vietnam; resolutions of Association for Asian studies; S	507
Formosa: "solidarity of gloom"; S	294; see also C, 554, with Young reply Younger, Irving and Judith T.
Service charges for what?; milking of pension funds by unions; S	662
Your own thing. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D	220
Youth
The counter culture, part I: youth and the great refusal. T. Roszak; S	400
Counter culture, the, part II: politics of the nervous system. T. Roszak; S	439
Endemic revolts; parallel with 17th-century Camisards in France. R. Stern; E	717
Generation up in arms: Berkeley on the Tiber; student revolts in Europe. G. Corisini; S	750
Hippie public of underground press	569 ff.
Mass revolt against system in U.S. 691, 693-694
New universities conference, Chicago: the dilemmas of resistance. N. Birnbaum; S	535
P. Goodman's influence on	498 ff.
Political independence in U.S.; E	556
Z
Zappa, Frank; recordings reviewed by J. Gabree; M	837
Zen Buddhism; popularization in U.S. by Ginsberg, Kerouac, et al.	440-441
Zikmund, Joseph II
How suburbia votes; S	826
Zinn, Howard
The petty route for three American prisoners freed by North Vietnam; military transport forced; S	431

BOOK REVIEWS
Books are indexed under author and title and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:
B	Book review
R	Reviewer
C	Correspondence

	PAGE
A
Accessories after the fact: the Warren commission, the authorities and the report. S. Meagher; B	277
Again Korea. W. Burchett; B	605
Ahmad, Eqbal; R	149
Aiken, Conrad
Thee: a poem; B	453. See also C, 778
Alamein to Zem Zem. By K. Douglas; B	576
Alechem, Sholem. My father, Sholem Alechem. By M. Waife-Goldberg; B	833
Allen, James S.
Dubious inferences in T. Nelson review of DuBois autobiography; C	810. See also 574
America, Russia, and the cold war. W. LaFeber; B	508
American symphony orchestra, the. H. Swoboda (ed.); B	184
American writer and the great depression, the. H. Swados; B	213. See also correction, 290
Anderson, Edith; R	310. See also correction, 378
Aptheker, Herbert
Notes on historical accuracy of W. Styron's The confessions of Nat Turner, with Styron reply	543. See also C, 650, 663
Architecture. Three books on reviewed	797
Armies of the night, the: history as a novel, the novel as history. N. Mailer; B	701
Artificial traveler, the. W. Fine; B	676
Artist type, the. B. Glanville; B	676
Aryanization of the Jewish state, the. M. Selzer; B	771
Asher, Rosalie S.
Chessman not convicted murderer; C	476. See also 349
Asian drama: an inquiry into the poverty of nations. G. Myrdal; B	603
Autobiography of W. E. B. DuBois; B	574
B
Back roads to the far towns. Oku-no-hosomichi. By M. Basho; B	610
Bacon, Edmund N.
Design of cities; B	797
Baldwin, James
Tell me how long the train's been gone; B	769
Barthelme, Donald
Unspeakable practices, unnatural acts; B	703
Basho, Matsuo
Back roads to the far towns. Oku-no-hosomichi; B	610
The narrow road to the deep north and other travel sketches; B	610
Baxandall, Lee
W. Styron unfair in reply to H. Aptheker on Nat Turner; C	663. See also 543
Bedient, Calvin; R	670, 703
Behan, Brendan: man and showman. R. Jeffs; B	642
Ben Sue, the village of. J. Schell; B	55
Bendiner, Elmer; R	483
Bentley, Eric
Correction to E. Anderson review of F. Ewen's Bertolt Brecht; C	378; see also 310
Berek, Peter; R	478
Berry, Wendell
A place on earth; B	448
Bertolt Brecht, his life, his art, and his times. F. Ewen; B	310; see also C, 378
Big victory, great task. General Vo Nguyen Giap; B	608
Bill of rites, a, a bill of wrongs, a bill of goods. W. Morris; B	478
Black protest: history, documents, analyses. 1619 to the present. J. Grant; B	740
Blackburn, Sara; R	185, 314, 644, 675, 800
Blade of night. D. Carpenter; B	644
Bloodworth, Dennis
Chinese looking glass; B	24
Bly, Robert. Acceptance speech for The light around the body at National book awards	413
Article on Pablo Neruda	414
The light around the body; B	418
Bodkin. By B. Midwood; B	644
Book marks; brief reviews
Soviet Union), 185, 314, 484, 12, 613 (on China), 644, 675, 737 (Negro in American history), 800	57, 124 (on)
Booth, Charles
Charles Booth on the city: physical pattern and social structure. Edited by H. W. Pfautz; B	641
Charles Booth's London. Edited by A. Fried and R. M. Elman; B	641
Bradford, Richard
Red sky at morning; B	801
Brandeis university
12 photographers of the American social landscape; B	766
Brecht, Bertolt, his art, his life, and his times. F. Ewen; B	310; see also C, 378
Brendan Behan; man and showman. R. Jeffs; B	642
Bridge and the abyss, the (on M. Gorky). B. D. Wolfe; B	382
Bright, John; R	640
Bronowski, J.; R	381
Brossard, Chandler; R	353, 734
Article The ritual of originality	575
The Spanish scene; B	674
Brown, Edward J.; R	86
Bulgakov, Mikhail
The master and Margarita (two translations); B	117
Burchett, Wilfred
Again Korea; B	605
Burdens of race, the. G. Osofsky; B	740
Burgess, Anthony; R	309
C
Carpenter, Don
Blade of night; B	644
Cassill, R. V.
La vie passionnée of Bodney Buckthorne; B	800
Caught in that music. S. Epstein; B	59
Chaliapin: an autobiography as told to Maxim Gorky. Edited by N. Froud and J. Hanley; B	704
Change of skin, a. C. Fuentes; B	483
Charles, Gerda. Essay Our literary Anglo-Jewish cousins	477
Charles Booth on the city: physical pattern and social structure. Edited by H. W. Pfautz; B	641
Charles Booth's London. Edited by A. Fried and R. M. Elman; B	614
Cheuse, Alan; R	57
China: Three books by and about Chinese women reviewed	602
China, Communist. Brief reviews of books on	613
China looks at the world. F. Geoffroy-Dechaume; B	21
Chinese looking glass. Dr. Bloodworth; B	24
Chinese mind, the. C. A. Moore, ed.; B	24
Chou en-lai: China's gray eminence. Hsu Kai-yü; B	608
Christoffel, Tom; R	736
Chukovskaya, Lydia
The deserted house; B	121
Claiborne, Robert; R	830
Clark, Walter Van Tilburg
Protest over R. Eberhart's review of C. Aiken's Thee; C	778. See also 453
Cleaver, Eldridge
Soul on ice; B	638; see also quotation, 542
Clecak, Peter; R	733
Clurman, Harold; R	56
Cobb, Charlie
Furrows; B	547
Cobbinah-Essem, P. K.
Praise for J. Meyer article Spokesmen for the blacks, December 4, 1967; C	98
Cocksure, M. Richler; B	451
Cold war; two books on reviewed	508
Cold war as history, the. L. J. Halle; B	53
Coles, Robert; R	348
Collected essays. V. Woolf; B	153
Collected poems. K. Douglas. Edited by J. Waller et al.; B	576
Communications. First freedom, the. B. W. Rucker; B	835
Compton, Neil; R	246
Concept of ideology, the: and other essays. G. Lichtheim; B	22
Confessions of Nat Turner, the, by W. Styron. Exchange between H. Aptheker and author on book's historical accuracy	543. See also C, 650 and 663
Constance de Markievicz: in the cause of Ireland. J. Van Voris; B	20
Containment and revolution. D. Horowitz (ed.); B	53
Continuing journey, a. A. MacLeish; B	676
Cook, Fred J.; R	277

</

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Kozol, Jonathan		Motion pictures. Private screenings. J. Simon; B	387	Pruitt, Ida
Praise for J. Meyer article Spokesmen for the blacks, December 4, 1967; C	98	Mowat, Farley		A daughter of Han, from story by Ning Lao T'ai-tai; B	602
L		The polar passion: the quest for the North Pole; B	770	Puzzleheaded girl, the: four novellas. C. Stead; B	21
Lacy, Allen; R	829	My father, Sholem Aleichem. By M. Waife-Goldberg; B	833	Q
LaFeber, Walter		My silent war. K. Philby; B	669	Quarles, Benjamin. See Fishel, L. H., Jr.
America, Russia, and the cold war; B	508	Myers, Oliver T.; R	351	R
Le Corbusier		Myrdal, Gunnar		Radiant city, the. Le Corbusier; B	797
Radiant city, the; B	797	Asian drama: an inquiry into the poverty of nations; B	603	Railroads. To hell in a day coach: an exasperated look at American railroads. P. Lyon; B	799
Lamott, Kenneth; R	604	N		Raphael, Chester M. See Higgins, Mary
La Tourette. By A. Henze; B	797	Narrow road to the deep north, the, and other travel sketches. M. Basho; B	610	Read, Piers Paul
Last great cause, the: the intellectuals and the Spanish civil war. S. Weintraub; B	834	Nation, The		Game in heaven with Tussy Marx; B	57
Learning. How children learn. J. Holt; B	353	Book marks; brief reviews	57, 124	Red sky at morning. R. Bradford; B	801
Leavitt, Jack; R	313	(on Soviet Union), 185, 314, 484, 5.2, 613 (on China), 644, 675, 737 (Negro in American history), 800		Reed, Ishmael
LeClezio, J. M. G.		National book awards ceremonies, with R. Bly's acceptance speech	413	The free-lance pallbearers; B	186.
The flood; B	513	Negro in American history; five books on briefly reviewed	737	See also 575
Lengyel, Jozsef		Negro American, the: a documentary history. L. H. Fishel, Jr., and B. Quarles; B	739	Reich spaks of Freud. M. Higgins and C. M. Raphael (eds.); B	510
From beginning to end; B	512	Nelson, Truman; R	574. See also C, 810 and 834	Revolution in the revolution? Armed struggle and political struggle in Latin America. R. Debray; B	149
Lenihan, Liam; R	512	Nelson, Truman		Rexroth, Kenneth; R	610, 673
Lerner, Anita M.; R	347	The right to revolution; B	541	Rexroth, Kenneth
Levin, Dan; R	382	Neruda, Pablo; essay on by R. Bly	414	The heart's garden/the garden's heart; B	548
Lewis W. Hine and the American social conscience. J. M. Gutman; B	766	Neugeboren, Jay		Richler, Mordecai; R	180
Lichtheim, George		Listen Ruben Fontanez; B	644	Richler, Mordecai
The concept of ideology: and other essays; B	22	New Year's Eve/1929. J. T. Farrell; B	733	Cocksure; B	451
Lifton, Robert Jay		New York City. Author N. Silver's commentary on S. Zoll's review in December 25, 1967, Nation	252	Right to revolution, the. T. Nelson; B	541
Death in life: survivors of Hiroshima; B	604	Nietzsche, Friedrich		Rise and decline of the cold war, the. P. Seabury; B	508
Light around the body, the. R. Bly; B	418	Four books (translated and edited by W. Kaufmann)	479	Roazen, Paul; R	510
Listen Ruben Fontanez. By J. Neugeboren; B	644	Nin, Anais, the diary of. G. Stuhlmann (ed.); B	311	Rosenthal, Irving
Long, Robert Emmet; R	769	Ning Lao T'ai-tai		Sheeper; B	314
Lost New York. Author N. Silver's commentary on S. Zoll's review in December 25, 1967, Nation	252	A daughter of Han (as told to I. Pruitt); B	602	Roszak, Theodore; R	671
Love and other stories. Y. Olesha; B	86	No laughing matter. A. Wilson; B	512	Roszak, Theodore (ed.)
Love to Vietnam. E. Morris; B	801	O		The dissenting academy; B	246
Lyon, Peter		Oates, Joyce Carol		Rothstein, Raphael; R	771
To hell in a day coach: an exasperated look at American railroads; B	799	A garden of earthly delights; B	448	Rucker, Bryce W.
Lyons, Nathan (ed.)		O'Brien, Conor Cruise. See Frye, N.		The first freedom (mass communications); B	835
Toward a social landscape. B. Davidson et al.; B	766	O'Brien, Edna		Russian revolution, 1917. Related books on reviewed. January 15 and 22 issues
Lytton Strachey: Vol. I, The unknown years (1880-1910). Vol. II, The years of achievement (1910-1932). M. Holroyd; B	670	Girls in their married bliss; B	512	S
M		O'Brien, Flann		Sale, Richard B.; R	832
MacFadden, Patrick; R	214	The third policeman; B	181	Salzman, Jack, and B. Wallenstein (eds.)
Macklin, F. A.; R	387	O'Connell, Shaun; R	154. See also C, 322	Years of protest: a collection of American writings of the 1930's; B	213
MacLeish, Archibald		Of love and dust. E. J. Gaines; B	185	Sánchez, George I.
A continuing journey; B	676	Olesha, Yuri		Forgotten people; B	482
Mailer, Norman		Envy and other works; B	86	Objections to C. Brossard's review of How children learn, by J. Holt; C. with editors' reply, 490. See also 353
The armies of the night: history as a novel, the novel as history; B	701	Love and other stories; B	86	Schell, Jonathan
Making it. N. Podhoretz; B	180	One very hot day. D. Halberstam; B	512	The village of Ben Suc. By J. Schell; B
Man who cried I am, the. J. A. Williams; B	154. See also C, 322	Onwards. N. Hentoff; B	801	55. See also correction, 258
Markiewicz, Constance de: in the cause of Ireland. J. Van Voris; B	20	Orchestras. Two books on reviewed	184	Schiller, Herbert I.; R	835
Master and Margarita, the. M. Bulgakov; B	117	Originality, the ritual of (in current literature). Article by C. Brossard	575	Schoenberg, Harold C.
Mathews, Jane De Hart		Ortego, Philip Darraugh; R	482	The great conductors; B	184
The Federal theatre: 1935-1939; B	56	Osofsky, Gilbert		Schutz, William C.
Mayfield, Julian; R	541, 638	The burden of race; B	740	Joy: expanding human awareness; B	830
Meagher, Sylvia		Our Lord Don Quixote: the life of Don Quixote and Sancho, with related essays. M. de Unamuno; B	829	Scott, Helen G. See Truffaut, F.
Accessories after the fact: the Warren commission, the authorities and the report; B	277	P		Seabury, Paul
Meltzer, Milton		Pasternak, Boris		The rise and decline of the cold war; B	508
In their own words: a history of the American Negro. 3 vols.; B	740	The poems of Doctor Zhivago; B	118	Sei Shonagon
Memories of a Chinese grand-daughter. S. and R. Gelder; B	602	Sister my life; B	118	The pillow book of Sei Shonagon. Edited by I. Morris; B	612
Memoirs: the post-war years, 1945-1954. I. Ehrenburg; B	121	Paul, Sherman; R	676	Selected writings. J. Supervielle; B	384
Meyer, Howard N.; R	737	Pavestiedt, Eleanor (ed.)		Selzer, Michael
Meyer, June. Praise for December 4, 1967, article Spokesmen for the blacks. J. Kozol and P. K. Cobbinab-Essem; C	98	Paxton Quigley's had the course. S. H. Yafa; B	484	The Aryanization of the Jewish state; B	771
Midwood, Barton		People in glass houses. S. Hazzard; B	59	Seven years with Gorky. By I. Shkapa; B	382
Bodkin; B	644	Perkins, Dwight H.; R	603	Sheeper. By I. Rosenthal; B	314
Miller, Alan L. See Kitagawa, Joseph M.		Pfautz, Harold W. (ed.)		Sherrill, Robert J.
Miller, Roy Andrew; R	612	Charles Booth on the city: physical pattern and social structure; B	641	Gothic politics in the Deep South: stars of the new Confederacy; B	482
Mirsky, Jonathan; R	55, 608. See also correction, 258	Philby, Kim		Shkapa, Ilya
Moore, Brian		My silent war; B	669	Seven years with Gorky; B	382
I am Mary Dunne; B	832	Pillow book of Sei Shonagon, the. Edited by I. Morris; B	612	Shulman, Irving
Moore, Charles A. (ed.)		Place on earth, a. W. Berry; B	448	Valentino; B	313
The Chinese mind; B	24	Podhoretz, Norman		Silver, Nathan; R	797
Morality of scholarship, the. N. Frye, S. Hampshire, and C. C. O'Brien; B	246	Making it; B	180	Silver, Nathan
Morris, Edita		Poems of Doctor Zhivago, the. B. Pasternak; B	118	Friendly dissuasion; commentary on S. Zoll's review of book Lost New York, in December 25, 1967, Nation	252
Love to Vietnam; B	801	Polar passion, the: the quest for the North Pole. F. Mowat; B	770	Private screenings; B	387
Morris, Van (ed.)		Pratt, William C.; R	216	Sister my life. B. Pasternak; B	118
The pillow book of Sei Shonagon; B	612	Private screenings. J. Simon; B	387	Six seconds in Dallas (Kennedy assassination). J. Thompson; B	277
Morris, Wright				Slavitt, David
A bill of rites, a bill of wrongs, a bill of goods; B	478			Feel free; B	676
Mortal flower, a. Han Suyin; B	602			Socialism, the decline of in America, 1912-1925. J. Weinstein; B	216
				Sophomore, the. B. Spacks; B	484
				Soul on ice. E. Cleaver; B	638. See also quotation, 542

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Spacks, Barry The sophomore; B 484	Triumph, the. J. K. Galbraith; B 640	Weil, Irving Gorky; B 382
Spanish civil war. Last great cause, the: the intellectuals and the Spanish civil war. S. Weintraub; B 834	Troyat, Henri Tolstoy; B 347	Weinstein, James The decline of socialism in America, 1912-1925; B 216
Spanish scene, the. C. Brossard; B 674	Truffaut, François (with H. G. Scott) Hitchcock; B 313	Weintraub, Stanley The last great cause: the intellectuals and the Spanish civil war; B 834
Spock, Dr. Benjamin, and M. Zimmerman Dr. Spock on Vietnam (quotation) 602	Tunc, By L. Durrell; B 673	Werth, Alexander; R 669
Stead, Christina The puzzleheaded girl: four novellas; B 21	Turnbull, Andrew Thomas Wolfe; B 446	Weston, John Hail, hero!; B 484
Stegner, Pete The edge; B 314	12 photographers of the American social landscape. Brandeis university; B 766	White, M. E. In the balance; B 314
Stern, Daniel; R 311		Whitman, Gren; R 547
Sterne, Richard Clarke; R 448	U	Williams, John A. The man who cried I am; B 154.
Stone, I. F. In a time of torment; B 214	Unamuno, Miguel de Our Lord Don Quixote: the life of Don Quixote and Sancho, with related essays; B 829	See also C, 322
Stone, Robert A hall of mirrors; B 452	Unfinished revolution, the: Russia 1917-1967. I. Deutscher; B 85	Wilson, Angus No laughing matter; B 512
Strachey, Lytton: Vol. I, The unknown years (1880-1910). Vol. II, The years of achievement (1910-1932). M. Holroyd; B 670	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Books published in connection with 50th anniversary of Bolshevik revolution. January 15 and 22 issues	Wolf, H. R.; R 834
Stuhlmann, Gunther (ed.) The diary of Anais Nin; B 311	Updike, John Couples; B 637	Wolfe, Bertram D. The bridge and the abyss (on M. Gorky); B 382
Styron, William. See Aptheker, H.	Unspeakable practices, unnatural acts. D. Barthelme; B 703	Wolfe, Thomas. By A. Turnbull; B 446
Sullivan, Kevin; R 181		Woolf, Virginia Collected essays; B 153
Supervielle, Jules Selected writings; B 384		World War I and the American novel. S. Cooperman; B 834
Superworm. G. Deaux; B 675		Writers and partisans: ■ history of literary radicalism in America. J. B. Gilbert; B 834
Swados, Harvey The American writer and the great depression; B 213. See also correction, 290	V
Swoboda, Henry (ed.) The American symphony orchestra; B 184	Vale of laughter, the. P. De Vries; B 59	Y
	Valentino. By I. Shulman; B 313	Yafa, Stephen H. Paxton Quigley's had the course; B 484
T	Van Voris, Jacqueline Constance de Markievicz: in the cause of Ireland; B 20	Yang, Key P.; R 605
Talbot, Daniel; R 674	Vie passionnée of Rodney Buckthorne, La. R. V. Cassill; B 800	Years of protest: a collection of American writings of the 1930's. Edited by J. Salzman (with B. Wallenstein); B 213
Tell me how long the train's been gone. J. Baldwin; B 769	Vietnam. Books on briefly reviewed Big victory, great task. General Vo Nguyen Giap; B 608	Yglesias, Helen; R 121
Thayer, George The farther shores of politics; B 349. See also C, 476	I protest!; pictorial record of Khesanh fighting (quotation from D. D. Duncan's introduction) 611	Yglesias, Helen The Havana cultural congress; essay 243
Thee: a poem. C. Aiken; B 453. See also C, 778	Village of Ben Suc, the. J. Schell; B 55. See also correction, 258	Yglesias, José; R 637
Third policeman, the. F. O'Brien; B 181		In the fist of the revolution: life in a Cuban country town (quotation) 702
This Sunday. J. Donoso; B 351	W	Young, Marilyn Blatt; R 602
Thomas Wolfe. By A. Turnbull; B 446	Waife-Goldberg, Marie My father, Sholem Aleichem; B 833
Thompson, Josiah Six seconds in Dallas (Kennedy assassination); B 277	Wallenstein, Barry. See Salzman, J.	Z
Thorburn, David; R 452	Waller, John, et al. (eds.) Collected poems. K. Douglas; B 576	Zabriskie, George; R 799
To hell in a day coach: an exasperated look at American railroads. P. Lyon; B 799	Warren report. Two books on reviewed 277	Zamyatin, Yevgeny The dragon; B 120
Tolstoy. By H. Troyat; B 347	W.A.S.P., the. J. Horwitz; B 186	Zimmerman, Mitchell. See Spock, Dr. Benjamin
Toward a democratic Left: a radical program for a new majority. M. Harrington; B 736	Watson, James D. The double helix; B 381	Zoll, Stephen. Author N. Silver's commentary on review of book Lost New York , in December 25, 1967, Nation 252
Toward a social landscape: B. Davidson et al. Edited by N. Lyons; B 766		Zweig, Paul; R 384, 418
Trachtenberg, Alan; R 701, 766

LIKE A SMALL DEAD MAN WILLIAM EASTLAKE

THE NATION

JANUARY 1, 1968 35 cents

JAN 3 1968

Constantine and the Colonels

ON THE EVE OF CIVIL WAR

ROY C. MACRIDIS

Labor at Bal Harbour

Meany's Wooden Soldiers

B. J. WIDICK

Poisons and Cosmetics

Adventures in the Skin Trade

TONI STABILE

THE CHINESE SIDE OF THE LOOKING GLASS

C. P. FITZGERALD

FREDERICK H. GARDNER on Christina Stead

EDWARD T. GARGAN on George Lichtheim

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
CA 94010

LETTERS

the hippies

Hackensack, N. J.

DEAR SIR: The Hans Toch analysis of hippies ["Anatomy of a Hangup: Last Word on the Hippies," The Nation, Dec. 4] is excellent, as perceptive a word on the subject as has yet appeared. In some measure, you might say that the hippies are a creation of the news media. The best thing for them might be to be ignored.

One minor point: Will Herberg is not orthodox—either Christian or Jewish. He is an existential Conservative Jew who teaches in the graduate theological faculty of Methodist Drew University, which is nearly as ecumenical as you can get.

Belden Menkus

Lincoln University, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Hans Toch's querulous article on the hippies is the "last word" on nothing but his own hangups, a pattern familiar to readers of recent efforts by hippie-baiters Al Capp and Steve Canyon. Relying exclusively on such sources as the San Francisco Chronicle and the Atlantic Monthly—he has apparently never met a hippie—Mr. Toch offers only an embarrassing caricature of misguided adolescents unable to deal with the puberty crisis. . . . Mr. Toch finally gives the game away in his indictment of the hippies as socially irresponsible, by which he means simply that they are not fighters against injustice. . . . That some Americans are seeking their souls—and being (if imperfectly) gentle, nonviolent and loving about it—calls for something more than supercilious prose.

David S. French

Tucson, Ariz.

DEAR SIR: Professor Toch asks: What have the hippies contributed to society? The answer is that they have at least contributed a little color, a little gaiety and humor, a little greater sense of freedom, to our dreary, ugly and murderous industrial culture. . . . Have professors of psychology, with their salaries of $10,000 or $15,000 a year, contributed as much? Half as much? Anything at all?

Edward Abbey

St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: I found Hans Toch's article very enlightening and convincing and I am therefore somewhat pained that he uses me as a whipping boy for a point of view which I do not espouse. My comparison of the hippies to saints and mystics, which he cites, was intended precisely to suggest that, like religious movements, hippiedom lives on an idealistic rhetoric which often does not bear close scrutiny. It was also meant to suggest that there are reactionary strains in the hippie ethos. Both of these are points which Professor Toch himself makes.

James Hitchcock

hear this

Hollywood, Calif.

DEAR SIR: A medical authority attending a recent noise-abatement conference warned the youth of today that they face a total loss of hearing by the age of 40 if they persist in listening to highly amplified rock-and-roll music.

It is predicted that the youth will turn a deaf ear to the advice of their medical elders.

Harry Cimring

insult or violence?

New York City

DEAR SIR: I wish to register a demurrer over one point in Laurence Grauman's otherwise rational article on the irra-

(Continued on page 19)

EDITORIALS

The Jungle Revisited

It was a charming gesture for President Johnson to invite Upton Sinclair to come to Washington to witness the signing of the Wholesome Meat Act. Now 89 years old, Mr. Sinclair lent his presence in a wheel chair, attended by a nurse, and by his daughter and son-in-law. It was also generous of Mr. Johnson to give credit to the journalists who exposed the filthy conditions in meat plants that the new law is designed to correct. To be sure, a critical observer might have taken some of the jubilation out of the occasion by noting that Mr. Sinclair had exposed conditions in the Chicago stockyards in 1906—when President Theodore Roosevelt likewise congratulated him on his achievement—yet for sixty years thereafter a large section of the American public had eaten tainted meat, just as if The Jungle had never been written.

We are glad to note (although it did not get mentioned in the stories) that among the reporters invited to the ceremony was Nick Kotz of the Cowles publications, who more than any other single journalist is responsible for the fact that we are finally protected by a first-rate federal meat inspection law. Mr. Kotz wrote in all some fifty pieces for his paper—the Des Moines Register and the Minneapolis Tribune—on the meat-inspection situation. The first appeared on July 16, when Kotz focused attention on some still secret reports of the Department of Agriculture. From there on the going was tough. The Administration was in favor of a non-bill—a weak measure that would serve to allay public uneasiness by providing some aid to those states that wanted to improve inspection, but without making it mandatory that they do so or imposing any other requirement upon them.

The break came on November 12, when Public Broadcasting Laboratory devoted the first of three programs to the need for nation-wide meat inspection. It was a graphic series which showed what broadcasting can accomplish when it fastens on a flagrant public abuse. In the week following, the three networks jumped into the act and from there on the prospect for an effective bill steadily improved.

In contrast, with the exception of the Cowles publications and a few others, the printed media were silent. The big circulation magazines—Life, Look, Saturday Evening Post, with space to fill every week or every other week—did not seem to realize that a vital issue was at stake. The indifference of the women's magazines was particularly deplorable. Most of these are monthlies, but they could have bestirred themselves to insert something on a subject so vital to housewives. Among the news weeklies, Time's first item on the subject was in its November 23 issue; at about the same time Newsweek ran a brief take-out. But the fact is that with the exception of an article by Ralph Nader in The New Republic and Nick Kotz's piece in The Nation ("Meat Inspection: The New Jungle," September 18) the magazines gave a minimum of help.

It is an instructive record if for no other reason than that it shows what a powerful instrumentality Public Broadcasting Laboratory can be if it elects in the future, as it did in this instance, to plunge into a crucial subject with such thoroughness and vigor that the rest of the industry is impelled to follow its lead. It is also instructive because it shows that even without active Administration backing, a major piece of consumer legislation can be pushed to enactment in a six-month period—something of a record—once attention is focused on the issue.

As for Mr. Kotz, he is a prime candidate for a Pulitzer Prize. The great muckraking journalists of another era, their work long since done but never finished, would find in him a worthy successor.

Stirrings in the Elephant Grass

While the year-end holidays are bringing very little interruption of the bombing and fighting in North and South Vietnam, certain undercurrents are making their way in the morass of diplomatic approaches seeking an end to the war. These soundings have been especially noticeable at the United Nations, although the "great Vietnam debate" in the Security Council, which had been requested in the Mansfield resolution, has failed to materialize.

The United States delegation was faced with the need to "add something new" to its unsuccessful attempt of January, 1966, to bring the question of Vietnam to the Council. An announcement of cessation of the bombings, recommended by an increasing number of UN member states in speeches before the General Assembly, would of course have provided a dramatic opening. Without it, members of the Security Council—at least the necessary number of them for a positive vote—are simply not willing to heed the U.S. Senate's call for a meeting of the Geneva Conference on Indo-China on American terms.

Ambassador Goldberg and President Johnson have resisted up to now the temptation to make political capital out of calling a meeting of the UN Security Council on Vietnam and being rebuffed. Instead, they have introduced a new element by letting it be known that they would not oppose—and might even welcome—an invitation from the Security Council to the National Liberation Front to attend the Council sessions, together with representatives of Saigon and Hanoi.

Washington has nothing to lose from such a formula. It is practically certain that Hanoi would refuse to come and that the NLF would follow suit. The responsibility for the failure of an attempt at discussion would, once more, be placed at their door. At the same time, there are signs that Washington, in contradiction to its own proclaimed doctrine, is experimenting with the idea that the Vietcong may not, after all, be entirely the creature of Hanoi, and that the war is more likely to end with a regrouping of political forces in the South than a surrender of the North under the bombings. President Johnson's suggestion of talks between Saigon and the Front, which seems to have come as a shock to General Thieu, seems a clear indication of this attempted shift.

A confirmation of these soundings is to be found not only in the reported arrest by Saigon authorities of NLF representatives on their way to meet American

THE NATION/January 1, 1968

IN THIS ISSUE

January 1, 1968

EDITORIALS

2

ARTICLES

- 6 Labor at Bal Harbour:
Meany's Wooden Soldiers

B. J. Widick

- 8 Constantine and the Colonels:
On the Eve of Civil War

Roy C. Macridis

- 11 Facts and Fallacies:
Negro "Anti-Semitism"

Gary T. Marx

- 13 Like a Small Dead Man

William Eastlake

- 14 Some Cartoons of 1967

- 16 Poisons & Cosmetics:
Adventures in the Skin Trade

Toni Stabile

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 20 Cool, Courageous and an Excellent Shot

Sean Cronin

- 21 The Puzzleheaded Critics

Frederick H. Gardner

- 22 No Right To Be Wrong

Edward T. Gargan

- 22 The Steward (poem)

David Ray

- 24 Through China's Looking Glass

C. P. Fitzgerald

- 26 Theatre

Harold Clurman

- 28 Films

Robert Hatch

- 29 Art

Max Kozloff

- 30 Waters (poem)

Donald Hall

- 31 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, MICHAEL GOLDMAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 206
No. 1

officials but even more in the strident denunciations by the South Vietnamese observer at the UN of any invitation to, or contact with, the Front.

As to the Front itself, its actions are no less ambiguous, not to say ambivalent. First there was the inquiry to U Thant about the possibility for an NLF delegation to come to New York "to be around the United Nations." This was later denied by the NLF, but U Thant had predicted its denial, and his honesty is beyond question. (Besides, he would have no interest whatsoever in making up such a tale.) The story of the Vietcong's approach was also discounted by Communist and other countries friendly to the NLF, who claimed they had not been informed. The State Department, which had leaked the story, raised the technicality that this inquiry did not represent a request for a visa and countered with the possibility of a Security Council invitation. The whole incident was temporarily closed by an announcement from Saigon that it would not attend any meeting at which the Vietcong was represented as such.

Some weeks later, the Rumanian delegation (Foreign Minister Cornelius Manescu is President of the current session of the General Assembly) pulled the neat coup of having the NLF political program brought to the attention of the 123 UN members through a United Nations document, transmitted by the Secretary General at the Rumanians' request. The South Vietnamese observer screamed in outrage, while the U.S. delegation remained outwardly unconcerned. The USSR thought it strange and rather alarming that Rumania, which has left the Soviet orbit as far as international relations are concerned, had been chosen as an intermediary by the Vietcong. It was noted coincidentally that Averill Harriman had recently been in Bucharest.

Up to now, these signs do not appear to add up to anything, and leave observers puzzled. They may blow away with the next seasonal wind, the next escalation by the military, a rebuke from Hanoi. It is more likely, though, that feelers will increase with the coming of 1968, a year of soul searching and vote getting in the United States.

ANNE TUCKERMAN

Hearts and Minds in Vietnam

In the long annals of hypocrisy nothing can exceed, nothing can remotely equal, the pretense that we seek the allegiance of the ordinary people of Vietnam. No doubt we should be glad to have it, but as for doing anything to deserve it—either we don't care enough or we believe that if we win militarily the peasants will forget what we did to them in the course of winning. Among the few members of Congress who have shown some humanity in this matter are Rep. William F. Ryan, Sen. Thruston Morton and—especially—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy. The full story of the ordeal of civilians in North and South Vietnam has not been told, and probably never will be known in all its horror. That even part of the story has been revealed to the public is due largely to Senator Kennedy's efforts.

The civilian toll in North Vietnam is treated as a not entirely unwelcome accompaniment of the bombing. It may put additional pressure on Hanoi to come to the conference table for "productive" negotiations; in any case, can we help it if people live in the vicinity of the targets we find it expedient to bomb? In South Vietnam we face a more awkward problem. There we are the rulers, either directly or through the governments we have successively installed. There we have reporters, whose stories appear in leading newspapers and are inserted in the Congressional Record.

South Vietnamese civilians number some 14.5 million. Last May, Sen. Edward Kennedy, after visiting South Vietnam with staff members of the Senate subcommittee on Refugees and Escapees, concluded that civilian war casualties were running at the rate of about 100,000 a year. This was double the Administration estimate, which continued to circulate until last September, when a report from a group of doctors who toured South Vietnam with U.S. Government approval somewhat raised the 50,000 figure, but estimated that casualties would not run as high as 75,000 in 1967. The team recommended that American medical aid be increased from the current $58 million a year, which is slightly below the military cost to the U.S. per day. Now, in the Congressional Record (Senate, December 12, page 18454), Senator Kennedy says that "a more precise estimate" would be 150,000 civilian casualties a year. The figure of 24,000 civilian deaths a year, given out from Saigon appears to him too low.

"Because of the difficulty in getting the wounded to hospitals," Kennedy writes, "many civilian casualties die before treatment can be given. For example, there are virtually no burn cases reaching hospitals exceeding 20-percent bodily injuries, which indicates that the more severely burned die before treatment." Whether injuries are inflicted by the Vietcong, the South Vietnamese government army, or the Americans, it takes an injured civilian twenty-four to thirty-six hours to get to a hospital—if he gets there at all. "Is it any wonder," Kennedy asks, "that there are few serious burn cases reaching hospitals, or that serious head, chest, or artery injuries among civilians often result in death because of failure to obtain the emergency treatment required to save lives? Is it any wonder that the rate of amputations among South Vietnamese civilians . . . is high, far higher than the rate of United States and South Vietnamese military casualties?"

The contrast in this respect is instructive. If one accepts the figure of 24,000 civilian deaths in 1967, it will exceed by some 5,000 the total of American and South Vietnamese deaths in combat. For the military wounded there is at least the mitigating factor, such as it is, of prompt, expert medical attention. But the civilians die in sheds, in hospital corridors, or in the open countryside and, says Kennedy, not one of the provincial or major hospitals servicing civilians "meets even the barest minimum of sanitation or other support conditions necessary to carry out simple medical practices."

One version of the scriptural injunction appropriate to the season reads "Peace on earth to men of good will"—for they are the only ones who deserve it. By this criterion, what is our status in Vietnam, and how do we dare to celebrate Christmas?

A Prevalence of Scapegoats

Of recent months there has been a new flurry of discussion about Negro anti-Semitism. The charge is stale, but each time it is raised it should be re-examined. On this occasion the discussion seems to have been precipitated by the statements of a few Negro militants who have expressed sympathy for the Arabs. Speaking recently in Los Angeles Jacques Torczyner, president of the Zionist Organization of America, charged that "anti-Semitism among Negroes is widespread, and it is up to the Negro leaders to stop it," and then went on to say that sympathy for the civil rights movement is "waning" among "rights-conscious Jews," many of whom are now "disillusioned." Of course there is anti-Semitism among Negroes; there always has been. But the question is, are Negroes any more anti-Semitic than whites? If they are not, then little point is served by focusing attention on Negro anti-Semitism (see article by Gary Marx, p. 11).

Writing in the Los Angeles Times from Jackson, Miss., Jack Nelson reports on the kind of anti-Semitism that should concern the entire nation, and it is not Negro anti-Semitism. The small Jewish community in Jackson, which dates from the pre-Civil War period, now "lives in terror, its rabbi under constant police protection." There have been at least three recent bombings, one of which shattered the residence of Rabbi Perry Nussbaum (there have been similar bombings lately in Florida).

Instead of Negro homes being bombed, the KKK element has now focused its attention on Jewish homes and the homes of non-Jewish whites. Judge Harold Cox included, who are held responsible for the convictions in the conspiracy case that arose out of the Neshoba County murder of three civil rights workers in 1964, two of whom were Jews, one a Negro. Jews, of course, are thought of as being partisans of civil rights and so they are, for the most part. But Rabbi Nussbaum says that not more than five of the 150 Jewish families in Jackson have promoted civil rights and that these have been just "moderately active." Mr. Nelson's conclusion—and it seems a sound one—is that "the Jewish community is finally feeling direct effects of what has long been a strong undercurrent of anti-Semitism in the rivers of racism that run through the state." It is this racism that should concern Jews and non-Jews; Negroes are so directly, and continuously, its victims that they do not need to be warned against it. Indeed it is worth noting, as Dr. Marx points out, that the more Negroes are actively involved in the civil rights movement, the more vigorous is their opposition to all forms of racism. There was never greater need than now for all partisans of civil rights—Negroes, non-Jews and Jews—to make common cause against those "rivers of racism."

Problem of Sanitation

Has America become dehumanized or has television, overwhelmingly preoccupied with entertainment fantasy and marketing propaganda, lost its power to communicate reality? The questions arise from the almost imperceptible audience reaction to a recent telecast of American soldiers piling human corpses like cordwood; dumping, hurling and airlifting, by helicopter and cargo net, the Vietnamese dead. The scene, on Walter Cronkite's C.B.S. evening news, was described by correspondent Robert Schakne as a problem of sanitation for U.S. troops. C.B.S. reported only a slight rise in the phone calls that evening; in an audience of millions, perhaps 100 protested the shocking scene. There was similar feebleness of response several months ago to a report from Don Webster, also on C.B.S., that American soldiers were cutting off the ears of the enemy dead for souvenirs.

The excellent reporting of such ghastly scenes is not telecast without great agonizing by responsible newsmen at the networks. Do such scenes accurately reflect American participation in the war? Do they aid the enemy? Are they anti-war propaganda? Does not any accurate reporting of war constitute anti-war propaganda? These are some of the questions TV newsmen ask themselves daily.

But when the scenes are shown, silence ensues. And this raises the more basic issues of whether the audience is morally numb or the medium is invalid (morally irrelevant by association). If these questions had commercial value, the networks and their patrons, the advertisers, would have had them researched to the point of uncovering the opinions of upper middle-class citizens of Hungarian extraction in New Brunswick, N.J. But the issue is purely one of social ethics, and that sells no soap.

James T. Aubrey, former president of the C.B.S. television network, once remarked to Fred W. Friendly, former news president of C.B.S.: "All I'm trying to do is save the company money." To which Mr. Friendly replied: "All I'm trying to do is save the company." If television would address itself to some of the problems raised by the news coverage of this war, it could perform a service more valuable than saving companies. It might help to save the nation.

McCarthy: Critic or Challenger?

The talk about Eugene McCarthy being in somewhat the same position as Henry Wallace in 1948 is journalism at its worst. The two situations could hardly be more different. McCarthy has carefully steered clear of the third-party trap. Wallace was doing pretty well as long as he confined his protests within the Democratic Party.

The cold war was just getting under way in 1948 and the people had no idea what they were letting themselves in for. The Vietnamese War, one of the offshoots of the cold war, is a bloody, execrable conflict supported by few and detested by many. It has split the Democratic Party far more seriously than it was split in 1948.

As soon as Wallace announced his third-party candidacy, the dead cats began to fly. McCarthy is immune to dead cats. His candidacy has been greeted respectfully, and it is hard to see how he can be manhandled. There may be an attempt to identify him with the lunatic fringe of the peace movement, but that is implausible on his record, and even on his physiognomy. The press and the politicians are leery about attacking the peace movement per se—it contains too many VIPs and is attracting more, and it already enjoys widespread ■ heterogeneous popular support.

But if McCarthy is spared the pitfalls that toppled Wallace, that is not to say that no other hazards loom in his path. In point of fact, he has not got off to a good start, in the sense that his candidacy has failed to take advantage of the opportunities the political situation offers. McCarthy's decision to enter the lists was in itself ■ good augury and just what was needed. It broke the ice. A challenge was finally offered and others may take it up. By all indications there will be favorite-son candidacies—Hartke in Indiana, Young in Ohio, perhaps Gov. Philip Hoff in Vermont, among other possibilities. But McCarthy's personal performance has been tepid.

His style may be good enough, although an occasional jab is always welcomed by the voters, but the content so far has been too diffuse and too mild. The people on whom he must count for the core of his support want the war stopped. McCarthy must come up with a realistic and credible program for stopping it. He may call for a cessation of bombing in the North, but that in itself is not enough: it might even result in a further escalation of the war, if "meaningful" negotiations did not result. Coupled with de-escalation in the South, it would be more promising, but a fairly comprehensive program must be offered—something perhaps on the order of the one proposed by Paul Martin, Canada's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Then there is the priorities issue—McCarthy can, if he will, do murderous execution on the guns-and-butter-fallacy, quoting Dr. Arthur Burns, for instance: "The resources that we devote to national defense are not available for making consumer goods or for adding to the stock of industrial equipment or for public uses in the sphere of education, health, or urban development." McCarthy can point out that Vietnam is not national defense at all, but a senseless aggression on the part of the U.S., based on the John Foster Dulles fantasy of extirpating communism the world over. McCarthy can slug away at the travesty of a government that we support in South Vietnam. The other day, General Shoup called the Vietnamese generals "that bunch of crooks"; it is an accurate characterization of them as a group, and the sort of language the voters understand.

In brief, McCarthy should broaden and intensify his attack on the war, and do it now.

The Capital Times

To William J. Evjue, editor-publisher, Miles McMillin, executive publisher, George Stephenson, executive editor, Harry D. Sage, associate editor, Cedric Parker, managing editor, Elliott Maraniss, city editor and the staff of The Capital Times of Madison, Wis., go The Nation's congratulations on the paper's Golden Anniversary Edition and the occasion it celebrates. Mr. Evjue, who at 85 still presides over the paper he founded in 1917, would agree with Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., that "to live is to function. That is all there is in living."

With characteristic directness, he says that he founded the paper on a policy of public interest as against private interests. It was a good policy in 1917, it is a good policy in 1967. Few newspapers have more consistently, courageously and intelligently sought to protect the public interest. True to its progressive tradition, The Capital Times has just launched, in cooperation with the American Newspaper Guild, Local 64, a thirty-month apprenticeship training program for young reporters—as far as we know the only program of its kind to be sponsored by an American newspaper.

The residents of Madison are fortunate to be served by such an excellent paper. But they too are to be congratulated. For if it is true that newspapers get the support they deserve, it is also true that communities deserve the newspapers they support.

LABOR AT BAL HARBOUR

MEANY'S WOODEN SOLDIERS

B. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick is the author of Labor To-day: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States (Houghton Mifflin). He teaches at Columbia and Wayne State Universities.

Bal Harbour, Fla.

The most significant decision of the 1,200 delegates to the seventh convention of the AFL-CIO was to stand pat behind the dominant personality and policies of their president, George Meany—not giving an inch in concession to the program of Walter P. Reuther and the United Auto Workers for revitalizing the American trade union movement in many directions.

Little, if any, concern was shown for the probability that the UAW will go its own way, and the AFL-CIO thus lose its largest single union, 1.3 million members. War prosperity has raised many union enrollments; the Teachers Union and other white-collar unions are growing; total revenue of the trade unions in dues and assessments is more than three-quarters of a billion dollars annually. In this narrow context Meany could tell the delegates gathered in the plush Americana Hotel that "The trade union movement is a more vital, more vigorous and more effective force for progress today than ever before in its history." At a time of momentous social unrest in the nation the unions are increasingly isolated from most sections of society, and it is easy to understand why Reuther has declared that the federation has become the "comfortable, complacent, custodian of the status quo." There were only a dozen or so Negroes among the delegates; the leadership is mostly late middle age, and the top leadership at around the 70-year age level. To suggest that this institution is more dynamic than the industrial union movement of the 1930s is truly to live in one's own closed society.

The realities of American life did break through on occasion at Bal Harbour, to suggest the stormy days ahead. For 150 days, 60,000 copper miners have been on strike, and even with twenty-one unions directly involved, the AFL-CIO has been unable to put pressure on the Johnson Administration or on the industry to end this walkout with a victory. Coalition bargaining under the direction of the Steelworkers has left the industry unmoved. It has been allowed to raise copper prices, according to Joseph P. Molony, Steelworkers union official, by more than $400 a ton without a word of condemnation from the Administration. The unions accepted the idea of a fact-finding board; it was turned down by the industry.

The dilemma of the unions—and the strain in the alliance between George Meany and President Johnson—was revealed in the closing remarks of Molony: "Now some years ago, you will remember in a situation not unlike the one we find ourselves, President Truman, God bless him, did not flinch from seizing the steel industry, and running up the American flag over their plants and mines, although later on the Supreme Court overruled him. President Kennedy knew what to do when the steel industry attempted to gouge the nation by raising the price of steel by $5 a ton. And I remind you, not $400 a ton, and he brought the steel industry to its senses in a hurry." What did the unions get from President Johnson? A plea for wage restraint. The AFL-CIO unions here raised some $500,000 in contributions for the copper strikers, and the unions are paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars in strike benefits—the weakness is in failure of the White House to act, and nobody had the courage or the will to say so at this convention.

As a prelude to the 1968 steel industry negotiations involving more than 800,000 unionists, the copper strike situation is scarcely a happy omen. I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers, added to the tensions in his union when he proposed binding arbitration of unresolved issues in the forthcoming negotiations, and the union's executive board rejected it. In another year of inflation, skilled trades shortages and war tensions, unionism as usual on the collective bargaining front is headed for real trouble.

In contrast to a speech by A. Philip Randolph, praising the labor movement and denouncing Black Power as a modern form of demagogic "Garveyism," the delegates heard Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, give a detailed account of the failure of specific trade unions to open jobs for Negroes, and tell why the NAACP was suing both unions and management to break down the color bars. It was the kind of speech that AFL-CIO apologists used to denounce when made by Herbert Hill, labor secretary of the NAACP, but the evidence that labor is dragging its feet is now so overwhelming that Wilkins received no rebuttal. He said, "Indeed the 1960 census showed only 2,191 Negro apprentices in all the trades throughout the country. That figure was one more than had been recorded in the 1950 census ten years before." With some 250,000 apprentices in the nation, the efforts of the Workers Defense League in New York City have achieved very little.

President Meany told Wilkins he did not resent the report, and said that labor must meet the challenge; then he repeated the standard argument of the building trades: "However, you will not change conditions overnight. We keep trying. And in ■ good many organizations we have a problem of securing Negro boys as apprentices to take the test that these organizations prescribe and that they have prescribed for many years."

Since Dean Rusk received an ovation before and after his speech in defense of the war in Vietnam, it seemed unlikely that any kind of issue would be made at this convention about the war. But the unqualified endorsement of President Johnson's policies did bring an amendment from Charles Cogen, president of the Teachers Union, that the AFL-CIO take no position on the Vietnamese situation. Leon Davis of the Hospital workers union spoke briefly in behalf of that view, and a former Marine from World War II was allowed to read into the record the position adopted recently at the National Labor Leadership Assembly [see "Labor Meets for Peace" by B.J. Widick; The Nation, November 27]. Meany then said that the labor peace assembly was planned in Hanoi, and that the resolution it adopted had appeared in the Daily Worker two weeks earlier. From Detroit, Emil Mazey, secretary-treasurer of the UAW, denounced Meany's statement as "libelous and slanderous; the kind you'd expect from a senile old man," but no one placed Mazey's words in the record.

Unquestionably, the overwhelming majority of delegates agree with Meany, and the vote for his views was so enthusiastic that everyone knew President Johnson would make an appearance before this truly friendly crowd, to begin his campaign for re-election and to seek support of the war. The President's appearance did excite the delegates, and there is no question but that the labor leaders and the President are in harmony on the war and the election. Only when Mr. Johnson talked about wage restraint was there lack of applause. Otherwise, this convention gave President Johnson a warmer reception than he is likely to get anywhere else in the nation.

The unanswered question, however, is how much influence will the trade union leadership have in 1968? By its own admission, labor is in trouble politically. The official report of the AFL-CIO council pointed out that "Labor can never account for more than a minority of votes. In a close situation it can provide the margin of victory. In a situation such as in 1966, we can take satisfaction in having prevented a worse disaster."

Here are some of the problems.

"Our 1966 post-election poll of union members revealed that even then, 25 per cent of all union members were less than 30 years old, and nearly 50 per cent were less than 40 years old. Twenty-five per cent had belonged to a union for five years or less, and 46 per cent had been union members for ten years or less.

"As new voters and new union members, these young people have no memory of Roosevelt, the depression or World War II. They have no memory of hard times or of union battles fought and won from which they are reaping the benefits."

The political report outlines three factors which will make 1968 more difficult for labor than 1966.

"(1) Unless there is a dramatic change in the situation in Vietnam, our military involvement will continue as a disturbing and divisive issue.

"(2) Public hostility toward legitimate civil rights progress will almost certainly stiffen as a result of urban violence. Slowing or discontinuing such progress can only increase the desperation and alienation of impoverished minorities.

"(3) In the big-population states, where there are decisive blocs of electoral votes, important state-wide elections and a considerable number of close House races, there is a good deal of lethargy and factionalism."

According to a study made by some labor observers, the political action policy of the trade unions contains another painful dilemma. Most "hawks" in Congress have an anti-union voting record, and most "doves" have a strong pro-union record. Which comes first in deciding labor support—the war or social progress?

CONSTANTINE AND THE COLONELS

ON THE EVE OF CIVIL WAR

ROY C. MACRIDIS

Mr. Macridis is Walter Jaffee Professor of Politics at Brandeis University and co-author of Modern Political Systems (Prentice-Hall) and The De Gaulle Republic: Quest for Unity (Dorsey).

The French call it a coup de théâtre and if the situation in Greece today were not so desperate and tragic, the news of the "captive" King liberating himself from the tight grasp of the military junta and arriving in Rome with his immediate family, including the all-powerful Queen Mother Frederika, would bring smiles of recognition to a people used to Aristophanes. The ensuing difficulties of our State Department with regard to recognition of the junta minus the King can only compound this amusement. Our representatives and policy makers are "observing closely" the situation, but remain particularly anxious to maintain the integrity of our NATO flank against the unseen and imaginary enemy. The fact that the junta acceded to Cyrus Vance's efforts and agreed to withdraw Greek troops to mollify the Turks—this great diplomatic triumph of President Johnson that only maintains a precarious status quo—has not been sufficiently connected with the United States attitude toward the junta. At what price did the junta make the concession? What has the United States promised?

The King's departure is only the prologue to the long drama that lies ahead. It is the result of nothing but a struggle for power between throne and military. There was no conflict of ideas about government, the constitution or democracy. The King was not a "captive" nor was he eager for a return to the constitutional monarchy that he himself had repeatedly subverted. He had had a number of opportunities to oppose and disavow the junta, far more opportune than the one he chose. He decided to flee because he was losing in the power struggle to the colonels, who efficiently and quietly purged the state apparatus and the army of "royalists" and "democrats" and established a tight control over the country. By remaining in Athens, the King had nothing to lose but his power. By leaving, he hopes to regain both throne and power. Military dictators have the habit of coming and going in Greece, but the kings have always returned. The myth of the captive King who fought for democracy will help Constantine pave his way back, even make it possible for him and the junta to divide the spoils that the country represents for both of them.

But events may move so fast in the coming months as to make this difficult if not impossible. The thousands of political prisoners, the democratic and left-wing forces, including the Communists, are likely to take a hand in Greece's future. They are already beginning the painful struggle for freedom, and the King's departure is an episode that may help them. With Constantine in Rome, the last shred of legitimacy associated with the present regime has vanished, and its tyranny stands naked. In a clandestine pamphlet that has been sent to me, a resistance group entitled Democratic Defense rallies the citizens: "Greek patriots, champions of democracy, join forces with us in the struggle against the Fascist junta. Save our country from dishonor and help us reconstruct democracy in the country where its torch was lit." The new civil war has already begun.

The junta took over on April 21 to forestall the elections, and set about at once to consolidate itself. It dissolved every organization with the exception of the Greek Orthodox Church. Athletic associations, political groups and parties, philanthropic organizations, all elected local and departmental councils, have been set aside. At the same time it has prohibited the formation of new groups without prior consent of the government, and has made the participation of a government delegate mandatory. There can be no meetings of more than four persons; and two political leaders, one from the Center and one from the Right, have received sentences of three to five years for permitting small gatherings in their homes. Even the traditional christening ceremony will bring heavy penalties unless notice is given in advance and a member of the police or the gendarmerie attends. The new tyrants, without having read Thomas Hobbes, remember that associations and groups are "living worms in the entrails of a man."

Where can an atomized society get information? The press and radio are entirely controlled by the government, and listening to foreign broadcasts is prohibited. Owners of short-wave radios are told to register them with the police, only to have their sets confiscated. Newsreels and movies cannot be shown without authorization. But information can also be carried by word of mouth. Many Greeks have had their telephones removed. Every householder is required to inform the police of any house guest, and in the small villages—more than 65 per cent of the Greeks live in villages of less than 1,500 inhabitants—news of who talks to whom and for how long reaches the police quickly. Thus every individual begins to fear his friend and neighbor and keeps his mouth shut.

The second instrumentality of tyranny is intimidation. It has taken every conceivable form. Mass arrests in which more than 15,000 persons were taken away from their homes and families, to be sent to five barren islands, was the first major effort to cow the population into submission. The great part of these prisoners have been released, but only after they signed appropriate pledges not to indulge in politics and to make their whereabouts known to the police. A second practice is far more pervasive. At the slightest provocation a person is arrested and kept in jail for two or three days. He is subsequently released, but his associates assume that he has "talked" and they avoid him: while he, fearing that he may again be subjected to arrest, avoids them. Courts-martial are busy meting out sentences that range from two to five years to all who utter words derogatory to the government, the Monarchy (and presumably now the Regent), or the Church. Since April, more than 40,000 Greeks have been jailed or sentenced to imprisonment. For those who have been caught organizing resistance or conspiring to use force, the sentences are much more severe, and in some cases even the formality of the military tribunal is dispensed with. The "guilty" are simply rounded up and are seen no more.

The atomization of the society and its intimidation are not enough. A silent and indifferent citizen is suspect. The regime has organized a vast program of political re-education and reactivation. Church attendance is obligatory; participation in national ceremonies is mandatory. Whenever the prime minister, the members of the military council, and until December 14 the King or any government official appears, everybody is ordered to be present. The army, the police and the gendarmerie provide transportation and require the display of the flag. To abstain or even to show insufficient enthusiasm is to be suspect, and it is a brave man who will let retribution for his own defiance fall upon his family.

The Greek army, under the very eyes of the American Military Mission and the responsible NATO officers, has become an instrument of coercion. As a result, its character is changing. The first criterion for the officer corps is loyalty to the junta. Officers who have expressed democratic sentiments or who were closely attached to the King have been purged. More than 30 per cent of the officer corps has been placed on the retirement list, and the elimination continues.

As in the years of the Nazi occupation, the Greeks are now faced with the inescapable choice of submitting or resisting. But the situation is far worse today. In the years of the Nazi terror, hope of rescue by the great democracy across the Atlantic, by the tenacious and brave British armies, even by the Soviet Union as its army moved into central Europe, spurred the efforts of resistance. Today the NATO allies and the United States representatives in Athens witness the consolidation of the regime in silence. However "reluctantly," the United States has accepted the present regime. In the eyes of many Greeks, we are accomplices. Military aid has not ceased; the tourists continue to seek the sun; private American firms make lucrative investments and the Department of State and the White House have not issued a single statement explicitly disavowing the junta. Efforts made by Denmark, Sweden and the Swiss Red Cross are only tokens of sympathy and understanding.

"Those who believed that the Greek people would ever show the cowardice to submit to the predicament prepared by a clique of Greek and foreign tyrants will be disappointed." That is the opening statement of the Democratic Defense pamphlet quoted above. Already gunfire is being heard at night in the cities, and many villagers are beginning to take to the hills. Their task seems impossible, but as the tyranny is consolidated, many more will follow. And if the international situation were to deteriorate, if Greece's northern neighbors were to change the strict neutrality they now maintain, if there were a renewed conflict over Cyprus, pitting Turks against Greeks, or if tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union over the Vietnamese question or the Arab-Israeli conflict were to take a turn for the worse, the maquis would grow. Passive disobedience in the cities—used so successfully against the Germans—is being organized.

For eight months, our State Department, the White House, our ambassador, have shown a wooden indifference to the establishment of military tyranny in a country that is a member of NATO, to which the Truman Doctrine had pledged freedom and democracy, in which our military mission trained and organized the army, and where our Central Intelligence Agency has its headquarters for the whole Middle East. No sophisticated Greek—and politically speaking, this means every Greek—will ever believe that we were powerless to prevent what happened, or that once the military junta took over, the United States could not bring pressure upon them to mitigate quickly the harshness of their rule. And every Greek, rightly or wrongly, will conclude that we have a share in what is happening now. The dream that sustained Greece in the years of the German terror and occupation is now replaced by the incongruous sight of American officers and representatives giving their moral and material support to tyranny at the very time when the stirrings of freedom are spreading throughout Eastern Europe and as far west as Spain.

Yet the future of the country, its hope for economic recovery and reconstruction, its diplomatic relations with the European community and its northern neighbors, its internal stability, based upon a broad democratic centrist formation led by the Papandrous and supported by the

Franklin, Toronto Star

"Relax, Mr. Prime Minister, You're Safe Now"

Left, were bright until the colonels, with the complicity of the King, struck it down. The liberal leaders, including Andreas Papandreu, together with his many American-trained associates, are now in jail or in exile. Greece represents for our present policy makers a parcel of our military real estate and anyone who casts the slightest doubt upon our claim of control—as the Papandreous did—was not to be tolerated. Yet we should be learning from Vietnam, as the French learned there and in Algeria, how ephemeral is military ownership and how expensive to maintain. Let us hope that the Greek people will not have to teach us that lesson again.

FACTS AND FALLACIES

NEGRO 'ANTI-SEMITISM'

GARY T. MARX

Mr. Marx is an assistant professor in the Department of Social Relations, Harvard, and an associate at the M.I.T.-Harvard Joint Center for Urban Studies. He is the author of Protest and Prejudice (Harper & Row).

He is a benefactor for our people. I have always felt friendly toward a Jew. There is a distinct difference between a Jew and a white man and I hate a white man.

Foundry worker, Pittsburgh

The white landlord who is not Jewish is better. Well, the Jew landlord he'll put you in this apartment and you'd pay an arm or a leg and it isn't worth it. The apartment is raggedy. There are rats in them. They are falling down, shabby. They won't fix anything. They won't repair. All they want is their money. He may have ten or twelve houses and all he's doing is sitting down collecting his money and rubbing his bald head.

Housewife, New York

The Jews understand colored better because they have been through some of the same kind of discrimination. They have more heart. They are more in sympathy with our people's problems.

Laundry worker, Chicago

In an age of social science research, much of which has been concerned with problems arising out of the multi-ethnic nature of American society, it is unfortunate that recent discussions of supposed Negro anti-Semitism have generally taken place without reference to empirical research. However, it is something more than unfortunate when statements such as one by James Baldwin that "... of all white people on the face of the earth it is the Jew whom the Negro hates the most," or by Saul Alinsky that there "is no other group in which there is such rampant anti-Semitic feelings as among Negroes," lead to demands by some Jewish leaders for the withdrawal of Jewish support from the civil rights struggle.

The Survey Research Center of the University of California, under the sponsorship of the Anti-Defamation League, is completing its five-year study of the intergroup attitudes of Americans. One phase of this project concerns Negro attitudes toward Jews and toward whites in general.

Samples taken to be representative of the black population were compiled in New York City, Chicago, Atlanta and Birmingham. A national sample of Negroes living in non-Southern urban areas was also prepared. In all, more than 1,100 people were questioned by Negro interviewers who spent approximately an hour and a half to determine each person's opinion on a wide range of contemporary issues, including the civil rights struggle and the Jews.

Not surprisingly, the negative items referring to Jews which received the most acceptance dealt with economic behavior. For example, roughly six out of ten people said "true" to the statement: "Jews are more willing than others to use shady practices to get what they want." Somewhat less acceptance was granted to statements about Jewish clannishness; thus, roughly four out of ten of those questioned said "true" to the statement that "Jews stick together too much." Much less acceptance was granted to traditional conspiratorial items. Only about one person in ten felt that Jews had too much power in the United States. The above items along with six others were combined into an index of anti-Semitism. Among those in three groups, the nation-wide metropolitan area sample, New York and Chicago, three in ten respondents were considered to be anti-Semitic (giving anti-Semitic responses to five or more of the nine index items), while a like proportion was considered to be not anti-Semitic (rejecting eight or all nine of the anti-Semitic index items). In the South less than one in five scored as anti-Semitic, while four out of ten gave little or no evidence of anti-Jewish sentiment.

Ever since James Baldwin wrote a few years ago, "but just as society must have a scapegoat, so hatred must have a symbol. Georgia has the Negro and Harlem has the Jews," most discussions of Negro anti-Semitism have made at least some implicit reference to a scapegoat theory. It is suggested that, as a particularly vulnerable and accessible white group, Jews are somehow singled out and become the recipients of disproportionate Negro hostility. Our data offer almost no support for such an interpretation. For most of those interviewed attitudes toward Jews were roughly comparable to attitudes toward whites in general. Only about one person in twenty-five who scored as anti-Semitic expressed little or no hostility toward whites in general. When those questioned were asked to compare Jewish whites with non-Jewish whites as landlords, merchants and employers, the scapegoat pattern also failed to emerge. Just as the majority of whites fail to distinguish between Negro Protestants and Catholics, a majority of those in the present study dismiss merchants, employers and landlords with the phrase, as one man put it, "white folks is jes white folks."

For example, in response to the question, "Compared to other white store owners do you think Jewish store owners are better, worse or about the same?" roughly seven out of ten said "about the same," and those who saw a difference were somewhat more likely to think Jews were better than other whites. When asked, "Do you think it is better to work for a Jewish person or for a white person who is not Jewish?" about half the sample responded the "same." However, those who expressed a preference were much more likely to think Jews were better to work for. For example, in New York City 39 per cent felt it better to work for a Jew as against 15 per cent who felt it better to work for a white person who is not Jewish. Even a question about landlords elicited a similar pattern.

Furthermore, these data are consistent with six out of seven studies made in the past twenty years. And two recent studies on riot cities find that Jewish merchants did not seem to be singled out for attack. A report on Philadelphia states "not a single eyewitness to the riot recalls the mobs shouting anti-Semitic slogans, although anti-white epithets abounded." And although a large number of Jewish-owned businesses were destroyed in southwest Los Angeles during the summer of 1965, a UCLA study reports that when Watts residents were asked who were the targets of attack, only 5 per cent mentioned Jews.

Negro anti-Semitism also may be put in perspective by comparing it to the anti-Semitism of whites. Given the added element of prejudice against all whites and the involvement of Jews in the economic life of many ghettos, it might be anticipated that anti-Semitism would be somewhat higher among Negroes than among whites. This generally was not the case. Negroes were more likely than whites to accept negative economic stereotypes about Jews, although when level of education was taken into account these differences were reduced. On other negative stereotypes, such as that Jews stick together too much, the percentage giving the anti-Semitic response was about the same, regardless of race. On still others, such as thinking that Jews have too much power, Negroes were less likely to appear anti-Semitic. And on matters not involving stereotypes, Negroes consistently emerged as less anti-Semitic. Compared with whites they more frequently opposed passage of a law to stop further Jewish immigration, more frequently said they would vote against a Congressional candidate who declared himself against the Jews, more frequently said that they would not mind if their party nominated a Jew for President. In addition, Negroes expressed greater opposition to occupational and social club discrimination against Jews than did whites. Apparently their position as a persecuted minority leads black Americans to reject discriminatory behavior against other minorities as well, even if it does not always lead to the rejection of negative stereotypes. This is a significant factor for political expressions of anti-Semitism.

While attitudes toward Jews were roughly comparable to attitudes toward whites in general, there was still enough variance in this relationship to require consideration of certain special features which tend to make the Negro-Jewish relationship unique. Our study was concerned with two such factors, the first dealing with economic factors and the second with the fact that Jews are themselves a minority group and one relatively more supportive of Negro rights than the society as a whole.

The extent of Jewish involvement in ghetto economic life has no doubt been exaggerated, particularly if New York City be excluded, but the fact remains that for certain historical reasons Jews are conspicuous in the economic processes of many urban ghettos. Almost seven out of ten respondents report that some of the stores they now shop at are owned by Jews. About three out of four respondents outside the South, and two out of four Southerners report that they have worked for a Jew in the past or are working for one now. While such data cannot be relied upon to measure exactly the extent of Negro-Jewish contact, because of the problems of subjective perception, they are still highly suggestive.

Our study observed three economic measures: extent of impersonal economic contact with Jews; perceived mistreatment at the hands of a Jewish merchant and several beliefs about the credit practices of Jews relative to those of other whites. When these factors were combined into an index of "predisposition to economically based anti-Semitism," the powerful role of economic factors in generating hostility toward Jews could be noted. The percentage scoring as anti-Semitic increased from a low of only 10 per cent among those lowest in this predisposition to a high of 70 per cent among those highest on this measure. Negro anti-Semitism, unlike that of whites, has some very concrete economic sources.

An important set of factors helping to explain why anti-Semitism is not more evident among Negroes related to Jewish minority group experience. A shared minority consciousness seemed to exist for many of those questioned. More than five out of ten felt that Jews were currently discriminated against in the United States and many were aware that Jews had suffered in the past. Many of those interviewed also recognized Jewish efforts on behalf of civil rights. For example, in response to the question, "On the whole, do you think Jews are more in favor of civil rights for Negroes than other white people, less in favor, or is there no difference?" more than four out of ten felt Jews to be more in favor of Negroes' rights, and only about three in 100 felt Jews to be less in favor. Similarly about seven out of ten of those interviewed felt that the record of Jews was better than that of other whites when it comes to hiring Negroes. When these factors are combined into an index, and observed in relation to the index of anti-Semitism, they have a powerful effect on the curtailment of anti-Jewish sentiment.

It has been suggested by some that the Muslims, with their plea for economic self-sufficiency, criticisms of Jewish involvement in the civil rights struggle, and occasional involvement with the Arab world are an important source of anti-Semitism. The 4 per cent of the sample in sympathy with the Muslims were much more apt to be both anti-Semitic and anti-white than the other Negroes studied. However, with respect to the remaining 96 per cent of the sample, the surprising finding emerged that as civil rights militancy increased, tolerance also increased. In addition, those in civil rights organizations were less anti-Semitic and anti-white than those not in such organizations. This does not deny that on occasion particular civil rights groups have taken anti-Semitic positions, as events in the latter part of 1967 made painfully clear, nor that at community levels there may not be factors conducive to conflict between Negroes and Jews. However, in considering the orientation of individuals, not only were the social and psychological factors which made for militance in most cases the same as those which made for tolerance but there is an ideological link between the two. Many of those interviewed seemed to realize the inconsistency in attacking white racism from the perspective of the black racist. This finding suggests the possibility that in order to increase attitudes of tolerance among Negroes one might work to increase activity in the area of civil rights.

LIKE A SMALL DEAD MAN

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronx People (Harcourt, Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), has recently returned from his second trip to Southeast Asia.

The very young soldier got off the plane at Saigon and walked straight for the propeller of another plane. Before he hit the prop a sergeant in a green beret grabbed him and turned him around.

A correspondent who was on the plane with the soldier saw this and he saw the soldier again on the other side of the baggage room. The soldier was lying dead in the dirt; that is, his body was in the awkward throw-down angles of the dead, but when the correspondent sat down on an oil drum alongside him the soldier smiled up gently. The soldier was quite alive.

"They are all dead," the soldier said. "Everyone I knew is dead. My whole platoon."

The correspondent did not say anything. He just sat there above the soldier, guarding him in the dust.

"Ambushed," the soldier said. "The bushes were jumping." The soldier spoke out of a child face that was splattered with blood. "Water."

The correspondent passed down his canteen and the young soldier drank, holding it with both hands. When the soldier surrendered the canteen he said, "I'm not going back up."

The correspondent dribbled some water from the green camouflaged canteen on the soldier's face, then wiped off the blood.

"I wouldn't know anyone," the soldier explained carefully. "I don't know anyone in the world."

When the correspondent had finished with the face he told the soldier he looked now all clean like a Saigon Warrior or a Remington Raider. The soldier smiled because these were the names for the rear echelon troops, those who played the typing machines.

A military policeman came up now and stood over them, big in the dust.

"You better get rid of him," the military policeman said. "We're supposed to pick them up." Then the military policeman walked over alongside the terminal hut and got a Pepsi.

"Get on the army bus marked Brinks," the correspondent told the stricken soldier still in the dust. "It will let you off near the Continental and the Caravelle Hotels. Do not go to either of these. They are snobbish and expensive and do not permit women in the rooms. Make it down Tu Du Street to the Catinet; it's run by a Chinaman."

The correspondent helped the boy soldier plop upright and got him on the army bus that said Brinks. The boy stood on the step of the bus and said, "I don't know anyone."

"You know me."

The boy took the correspondent's hand and shook it, then turned into the interior of the bus and said, "I don't know a single person."

The correspondent sat down on the oil drum and watched the bus move off. The bus looked like a very large military hearse except that the windows were barred with a heavy screen so that the enemy could not toss in bombs. The boy sat in the front of the bus stiffly, as though leading the others somewhere, but he looked old now, rigid like a small dead man.

Some Cartoons of 1967

Mahood, The Times (London): Ben Roth

'It Hurts Most When I'm Sliding'

Punch: Ben Roth

*"Careful, Millingworth
—They're Suede"*

Beaton, Toronto Telegram: Ben Roth

"Waiter! There's a Beastly Mao Thought in my Fortune Cookie"

Waite, The Sun (London): Ben Roth

"There Seems To Be Quite a Demand for Them"

Illingworth, London Daily Mail: Ben Roth

Librarians Never, Never, Never Shall Be Slaves

Abu, Tribune (London): Ben Roth

Macpherson, Toronto Star

Renault, Frontier: Ben Roth

"Not You, Harris!"

Bernie, Aux Ecoutes (Paris): Ben Roth

Nothing Else To Eat!

ADVENTURES IN THE SKIN TRADE

TONI STABILE

Miss Stabile is the author of Cosmetics: Trick or Treat? (Hawthorn Books).

Last year, sales of cosmetics, excluding soap, passed the $3-billion mark. In addition, Americans spent about $4.5 billion in beauty shops for cosmetic services. Yet, although sales have quadrupled in the past twenty years, cosmetics are likely to be dismissed as frivolous and relatively unimportant by the general public, as they were dismissed by Congress in 1900 when cosmetic controls were proposed as part of the Pure Food and Drug Act.

At the turn of the century, it was popularly thought (often correctly) that cosmetics were a mess of goo usually concocted in bathtubs and sheds by a few ladies for the painted ladies on and off the stage. Even The Toilet Goods Association, the industry's representative and historian, has records of cosmetic sales only back to 1914 when they totaled less than $40 million a year.

Cosmetics were not acknowledged by Congress until 1938, when, after horrendous blinding, injury, and death from poisonous beauty aids, the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act was passed and found, almost immediately, to be as toothless as a cosmetic police dog. In the Act, Americans were told that "cosmetics" were not only powder and paint but were now officially defined as: "(1) articles intended to be rubbed, poured, sprinkled, or sprayed on, introduced into, or otherwise applied to the human body or any part thereof for cleansing, beautifying, promoting attractiveness, or altering the appearance; and (2) articles intended for use as a component of any such articles; except that such term shall not include soap."

Thus thousands of products for the entire family, from baby oil and talc to toothpaste and shampoo, to deodorants and shave cream, to nail polish and hair spray were classified as cosmetics. And despite the fact that many of these grooming items have become as much a part of the family shopping list as salt and aspirin, as "cosmetics" they escape the more stringent controls provided for foods and drugs. Cosmetics are marketed without required testing of any kind, without revealing or listing ingredients (even when a product contains ingredients known to be injurious), without warning of possible danger from caustic or toxic substances (although 1,700 children were poisoned from swallowing cosmetics in one year), and without disclosing or identifying such potential hazards, even after a product is proved to have caused widespread injury. Only when a cosmetic sold in interstate commerce has been found to be mislabeled or injurious can the Food and Drug Administration seize a shipment of the product and administer an ineffectual after-the-fact slap.

Compounding the anything-goes-until-and-if-caught climate of the cosmetic business is the consumer's touching faith in modern science, which has prompted many in the industry to add "scientific" or "miracle" ingredients to their products. The heralded "special" ingredients possess the authentically miraculous power of swelling a nickel's worth of cream into a $20-an-ounce promise, or a penny's worth of water and alcohol into a $5 bargain in hope. The consumer is shielded from the disillusioning knowledge that many an exotic "miracle" ingredient is some other industry's waste product, and that insufficiently tested it may add more risk than benefit to the cosmetic.

With the rules of the game so heavily favoring the industry, it is little wonder that cosmetic companies are being sniffed out by bigger, unrelated business complexes. Once ignored, cosmetic stocks have now become glamour offerings on Wall Street. Increasingly, news of cosmetic companies has moved from the women's pages to the financial pages.

Cosmetic companies have been absorbed into larger companies so often during the past few years that a relative handful of the popularly known cosmetic-specializing companies still retain their independent status. Many, if not most, are primarily distributors, buying their products from so-called "private-label" manufacturers who produce cosmetics in quantity for any company that wants to sell under its own label. Often one manufacturer supplies lipsticks or eye make-up to hundreds of companies which then distribute them throughout the country, from variety-store counters to exclusive specialty shops, at prices that may range from 29c to $5. It is not uncommon to find that the lipstick or eye shadow in the tubes selling for 29c, $1, $2.50 and $5 are basically the same products from the same manufacturer.

The disappearance of small companies into large corporations has somewhat disturbed the industry. Stephen L. Mayham, honorary president of The Toilet Goods Association, regrets the replacement of the "great personalities" who were largely responsible for creating the American cosmetic industry by faceless corporate structures. Mr. Mayham, who served as the TGA's executive vice president and whip for almost twenty-five years, told a meeting of Cosmetic Career Women that the personalities "have given way to people who know how to buy and sell securities and who make themselves wealthy without learning anything much about the business in which they are really engaged." He also expressed uneasiness about certain "elements" that appear to have been attracted to the cosmetic industry, elements he described as having "no place in this business and—in some instances—in any business at all."

However, it cannot be said that the cream and lotion trade has waited shyly to be courted. In recent years, the once reticent industry has become noticeably bolder in its wooing of Wall Street. An executive from Revlon, a company not noted for loquacity, was quoted by Drug Trade News as telling a recent meeting of the New York Society of Security Analysts that the cosmetic industry is anything but speculative. He urged the financial community "to broaden its interest in the cosmetics field for the mutual benefit of both groups," explaining that "without a full understanding of what cosmetics mean in a woman's life, no true understanding of the financial ramifications of our industry is really possible.'"

The executive also described the situation as a "three billion dollar misunderstanding" and defined the current status of cosmetics as that of "necessary luxuries."

Note that in addressing a predominately male audience the male cosmetic executive stressed the "meaning" of cosmetics in a woman's life without pointing to the parallel "meaning" of cosmetics in a man's life. Ask any man what he thinks about cosmetics, and you'll most likely get a shrug. Mention that he uses cosmetics every time he brushes his teeth with toothpaste, uses shampoo to wash his hair, shaves with shaving cream, splashes an after-shave lotion on his face, uses a deodorant or a suntan lotion, or a hair-grooming product, or a foot powder . . . and you will probably get the reply that none of these is a cosmetic and that it is somebody's self-serving plot to call them so.

Manufacturers and sellers do indeed side-step the term "cosmetics" even when promoting the new face "bronzers" or colored face make-up for men, but though a copywriter may call the hundreds of grooming products used by men "toiletries," they are nevertheless legally classified as cosmetics and, as such, offer the same gambles inherent in the insufficiently tested, undisclosed-ingredient cosmetics offered to women and children.

Therefore, since men are predominately in charge of legislating and administering in Washington, it is possible that semantics has discouraged the reviews and adjustments that should have kept tabs on any industry trading in products used on and in the human body. If the "three-billion-dollar misunderstanding" lies at least partly in words, Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D., Mo.), who has campaigned for new cosmetic legislation since 1953, might have been more effective had she fought for a change in category. While Mrs. Sullivan deserves credit and encouragement for her lonely stand, the cosmetic lobby has effectively blocked any meaningful consumer safeguards.

The Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938 is a prime example of how lobbyists can convert what was intended as "consumer legislation" into "industry accommodation." As in the sixties, when the thalidomide tragedies spurred drug investigation and legislation, so in the thirties blinding and death from coal-tar substances used in "permanent" hair dyes nudged cosmetic legislation out of committee. It took Congress five years to pass the Act, during which time the toxic dyes continued to be advertised and sold as "The New and Improved Eye Brow and Eyelash Dye." While Congress haggled over the Act, hair-dye manufacturers insisted that they couldn't produce satisfactory dyes without the admittedly dangerous coal-tar colors. They warned Congress that if hair dyes were not exempted, not only would a thriving business that employed many voters be ruined but the hair-dyeing women of America would storm the Capitol. Congress capitulated and coal-tar hair dyes were exempted from all controls, provided they bore a label warning that the product was not to be used on eyelashes or eyebrows, and that a preliminary test was to be made to determine the user's sensitivity to skin irritation from the ingredients. Apparently ignored was the fact that many of the men and women who dye their hair have the job done in shops where they never see the label, and that it is almost impossible to find a shop that performs a preliminary test before every application, retouching included, which was the intent of the warning on the label.

FDA Deputy Commissioner John L. Harvey explains: "When this provision was written into the cosmetic chapter of the law in 1938, coal-tar-containing hair dyes were recognized as substances that caused a significant number of individuals to become sensitized upon using the products. Upon repeated use, the sensitized person develops an allergic reaction which may manifest itself in mild skin irritation in the area of the scalp, or in many cases manifests itself as violent irritation accompanied by rash, fever, pustules in the scalp area which may become infected. The person who suffers a severe reaction is seriously ill and may require hospitalization followed by medical treatment for months."

By industry count, 20 million to 30 million women dye their hair. Prompted by industry promotions, an increasing number of men are joining the women. In 1966, Clairol, alone, was reported to have spent more than $25 million to advertise its hair-coloring products; $2,391,000 of this was used to advertise its hair dye for men.

An indication of the rapid rise in the hair-coloring section of the cosmetic industry is the sale of over-the-counter hair-coloring products. In 1966, sales totaled $192,760,000, as compared to $72,210,000 in 1960. Accounting for some of this bonanza are formulas for color shampoos and "four- or five-week rinses," which are more often coal-tar dyes than "rinses." Formulas and ingredients for many of the current hair dyes were unknown in 1938 when the industry won its exemption. Although there is growing evidence that a sensitivity test for skin irritation is not sufficient to warn of possible harm and injury, the FDA is powerless to act against suspected dyes. As Mrs. Sullivan has pointed out, the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act is as out of date as the 25c-an-hour minimum wage which was adopted in the same year.

Another industry coup was the exempting of cosmetics from the 1960 Federal Hazardous Substances Labeling Act. The 1960 Act superseded the Federal Caustic Poison Act of 1927, which listed caustic poisons requiring warning labels with emergency antidotes. The 1927 Act, which became out of date with the advent of new detergents, cleaning compounds and chemicals unknown at the time of its passage, did include cosmetics. The 1960 Act exempts cosmetics; no warning label is now required even though a cosmetic product contains a known poison and may cause death if swallowed. Moreover, the poison in a cosmetic need not be identified or emergency directions given. This means that if a child—or a careless adult—swallows a cosmetic poison, he or she may well be dead before a doctor can be reached, the ingredient identified, and life-saving treatment begun. Despite the incalculable help of local poison control centers, the race too often is needlessly lost.

During the Congressional hearings that preceded the passage of the new Act the FDA and representatives of the industry held that cosmetics should be included under a protective labeling amendment to the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act—not to the Hazardous Substances Labeling Act—although the legislative results would be the same and the Food and Drug Administration would administer the law either way. It was a technical point, the Congressmen were told; no one wanted cosmetics to be listed in both Acts. According to the industry, it wanted only to avoid a form of double jeopardy. Both the FDA and The Toilet Goods Association agreed that the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act should be amended to require proper labeling of hazardous substances in cosmetics. The provision was duly included in the pending new cosmetic legislation—which was subsequently dropped. The cosmetic industry was home free.

Congress also passed the Color Additives Amendment to the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act in 1960, ten years after children had become ill from eating Halloween candy which had been colored with a high concentration of a permitted orange dye. In 1955, children again became ill from eating Halloween popcorn cats colored with the same orange dye; and in December of the same year about 200 people, mostly children, became ill after eating popcorn colored with a permitted red dye which the FDA had tested and certified harmless in 1953.

Following improved modern test procedures, FDA found that seventeen colors formerly thought harmless caused ailments and injuries that included anemia, enlarged spleen, liver damage, stunted growth and cancer, when fed to animals at levels considered appropriate by FDA. Obviously, further legislation was needed.

After five years of legislative jousting through the hearing rooms and in the courts, the Color Additives Amendment was passed. Since the dyes also were used to color drugs and cosmetics, such as the lipstick which women ate along with their lunches, the amendment included drugs and cosmetics. The loudest yells were heard from the lipstick makers. What was Congress trying to do to the industry? It couldn't carry on without those colors. Women would run screaming to Washington. There'd be a black market in lipsticks and all kinds of undesirables would get into the act.

The FDA insisted that the cosmetic manufacturers now had to test their colors. The food and drug makers, who had already been doing some required testing, had survived and flourished. For the first time, a cosmetic manufacturer would have to prove to the FDA's satisfaction that an ingredient was safe instead of waiting until the FDA proved it was unsafe. It was also the first time since 1938 that cosmetics had been included in any addition to the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. Although the testing and pre-marketing certification by the FDA applied only to colors used in cosmetics, it opened the door to the pre-market testing of cosmetic ingredients in general.

On June 13, 1963, the FDA formally announced its interpretive regulations for cosmetics under the new amendment. Two days later, The Toilet Goods Association and thirty-nine cosmetic companies, which later were joined by a fortieth company, filed a complaint suit in the Federal District Court in New York City against the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration. The TGA, et al., challenged the FDA's interpretation of "color additive," and has pressed its case up to the Supreme Court which sent it back to the Federal District Court for a decision. Although the decision may be known before this article reaches print, there could still be years more of appeals, conferences, postponements and delay before the 1960 amendment is applied to cosmetics. The FDA could have attempted to enforce the law and then fought the industry, but it did not. Meanwhile, the cosmetic industry has gained a seven-year moratorium during which it has been free to continue business as though no law had been passed.

How extensive are the risks? To paraphrase a hair-dye slogan, no one knows for sure because no one has to tell. The cosmetic industry points to billions of sales with what it describes as minimal instances of harm. Government agencies counter by citing harm that has occurred and may occur as long as cosmetics can be marketed without required testing.

Although the cosmetic industry protests that the products of the 1930s which contained caustic chemicals and poisons are gone, the 1938 legislation hasn't prevented such periodic shockers as a hair straightener that used lye, a hair dryer with carbon tetrachloride (a potent liver poison) and a cleansing cream colored with "butter yellow," a known cancer-producing chemical. Neither did it prevent wholesale injuries by a number of shampoos, nail-base polishes, plastic nails and a permanent-wave neutralizer.

Famous names as well as obscure "bathtub operators" in the cosmetic industry have been involved in marketing potentially injurious products. But unless injury is widespread and reported to the FDA, the general public is unaware of day-to-day reactions suffered by consumers. Often a reaction, injury or disease is not linked to the cosmetic causing it.

"The problem today," according to FDA Assistant Commissioner Winton B. Rankin, "is not so much the products that are known to harm but the cosmetics that are not known to be safe." How much cooperation can the 200 million American consumers expect from the little industry they made big business within one lifetime? One trade source quotes the new executive vice president of The Toilet Goods Association as proclaiming to a recent meeting of the Cosmetic Industry Buyers and Suppliers Association: "Now we are engaged in a great civil strike to determine whether this industry or any other industry may prosper in these United States."

LETTERS (Continued from page 2)

tional theme of war and peace ["The Goals of Dissent"; The Nation, Dec. 11]. . . . Mr. Grauman is worried about the image presented by the "violent provocation," or later the "uncivilized provocations" (which is it; there is a difference you know), of the dissenter. And while he mentions the distortions of the press, I do think he has not gone far enough in this line of reasoning. The Administration knows all about the distortions of the press, knows how to feed into it, knows its value to its own cause. Does Mr. Grauman not think that the Administration is capable of provoking violence, of even having agents provocateurs among the dissenters? . . . I think therefore that the problem of violence is one of informing the American people of who is violent, and I mean violent and not insulting. . . .

Philip Siekevitz

killing the dream

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Your editorial ["Grasping at Chaos," Nov. 27] is liberal tunnel vision at its most acute. Who says this nation is committed to integration? The blacks? Have you consulted them? The suburbs, the towns, the overwhelming majority of whites? Where is the evidence of their commitment? It exists only in the dreams of the liberals.

The U.S. Commission on Human Rights concludes: "Underlying these [regressive] private and public actions have been attitudes within the white majority—attitudes based on fear, on racial prejudice, and on a desire for status. While many of these attitudes are not overtly expressed, they are nonetheless real and effective. They have been accompanied by a lack of concern for and a failure to become involved in the problems of the slums."

There's much more of the same, including some useful correctives, from minority spokesmen, for the narrow outlook of liberals complained of in my first sentence.

All that this nation is now committed to, after generations of neglect, is a slightly better deal for blacks, as long as this progress be not too much, too fast, or too costly. Bettering the black condition is a humane impulse and not to be derided. But neither the Commission on Human Rights nor I mistake it for a commitment to integration, and you shouldn't either.

Acknowledging the need for formal separation of the races is to acknowledge national failure. This is especially humiliating to liberals, as your epiphany illustrates. But we ought to learn from our errors, not go on mumbling about them. I do not advocate separatism out of panic but because it seems to me the only method of permitting blacks to become full human beings, not imitation whites, and of averting civil war.

There's the question of time; how long do you counsel the impatient and frustrated black to wait, quiet and tractable, to achieve a state that apparently looks less and less promising to him every moment? And what if the blacks in general are by now convinced that they don't want integration? Do you think we liberals had better inflict it on them just the same?

You and I are aiming at the same thing: dignity, selfhood, justice and freedom for black citizens. To state a complicated proposition simply, you believe that these conditions can somehow be met by more energy and dedication to the liberal vision of an integrated community. I don't think there's a chance of it in the confines of a paternalistic, black-tolerating white community. Our 400 years of overlordship have produced poisons of mind and attitudes impossible to neutralize. Thus I think we must move to more feasible arrangements. I reluctantly conclude that some form of agreed-upon separatism is best. If liberals dislike this suggestion and have a better one, let them report it to the Commission on Human Rights, which seems pretty despairing.

In the meantime, let liberals stand back: they have already been the authors of overmuch black frustration. It is time they stopped inflicting their dreams on blacks and paid attention instead to their needs for self-identification, land reform, management of their own affairs. Among such needs integration does not really figure. W. H. Ferry

We sympathize with Mr. Ferry's sense of frustration and despair. And we are indeed, as he says, aiming at the same thing: dignity, selfhood, justice and freedom for black citizens. But we do not share his view of the present situation. Where do we find the commitment to which Mr. Ferry refers? Among other sources, in the Fourteenth Amendment, to which we are irrevocably committed, in a long series of Supreme Court decisions interpreting the enormous affirmations of that great statement, and in a wealth of recent legislation designed to implement these affirmations. We are also committed to integration as a matter of social and educational policy for reasons which have been stated many times, most recently in the Coleman Report. Mr. Ferry is right: we do not acknowledge the need for formal separation of the races nor do we intend to lead or join a retreat back to "separate but equal."

We share his sense of urgency but we do not recall having urged "the impatient and frustrated black to wait, quiet and tractable"; on the contrary we will match our frustration and impatience with his. Do blacks "in general" want integration? We are convinced they do. Perhaps the simplest explanation of our difference with Mr. Ferry, an old and valued friend, is that we attach more importance to social ideals than he does. We would agree with Gunnar Myrdal that "Ideals are important social facts when they are firmly anchored in the hearts of people and become fortified in institutions like the Constitution. . . . The so-called hard-boiled scientists are simply wrong when they try to analyze the causation of social changes without recognizing the fact that people have problems with their consciences which will be disquieting when they are not living up to their ideals."

Editors

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Cool, Courageous and an Excellent Shot

CONSTANCE DE MARKIEVICZ: In the Cause of Ireland. By Jacqueline Van Voris. University of Massachusetts Press. 384 pp. $7.50.

SEAN CRONIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist who has lived in Ireland and the United States, and has written for publications in both countries.

By the ownership of the land and the power of magistracy a small feudal caste controlled Ireland for 300 years. The Protestant landlord Ascendancy class considered itself a foreign garrison in a conquered country. To the tenants, the landlords were despoilers and despots who had seized the lands of Ireland, banished its leaders, proscribed its religion and laws, outlawed its culture and language. Irish history in the 18th and 19th centuries is largely a chronicle of the ferocious struggle between the two classes.

British bayonets sustained the landlord in his privileges. Secret agrarian trade unions and the folk memory of an ancient heritage sustained the tenant in his misery. Revolutionary movements flared, failed, flared again. In fighting landlordism the Irish also were fighting foreign rule. Thus nationalism became a force in Ireland, though it failed to dominate the country in the manner of its chief rivals, British imperial power and the Catholic Church. However, it destroyed landlordism.

That much background is necessary to understand the story of Constance Gore-Booth, daughter of a great landlord family in the west of Ireland. The family seat was at Lissadell. Ben Bulbin and Drumcliff churchyard are nearby. William Butler Yeats, grandson of the local rector, and in consequence part of the caste system himself, remembered in a later untroubled year the beauty of Constance and Lissadell.

*When long ago I saw her ride
Under Ben Bulbin to the meet,
The beauty of her country-side
With all youth's lonely wildness stirred,
She seemed to have grown clean and sweet*

Like any rock-bred, sea-borne bird . . .

On St. Patrick's Day 1887, at the age of 19, she made her formal debut by being presented to Queen Victoria. "Constance then was a wild, beautiful girl," Lady Fingall (another member of the Irish aristocracy) recalled. "And all the young men wanted to dance with her. She was lovely and gay and she was the life and soul of any party."

How the society butterfly became a revolutionary and the bitter enemy of her class is told with remarkable understanding in matter-of-fact style by Mrs. Van Voris in this latest—and best—biography of the flamboyant heroine of the 1916 Rising. "The Red Countess," as the sensational English press called her, has found a sympathetic recorder of her worthy deeds.

The transition began with the suffragette cause in the late 1890s when she shocked her family by speaking at public meetings. She had a habit of quoting John Stuart Mill to the effect that the only forcible argument against giving women the vote was that "they did not demand it with sufficient force and noise." Constance added characteristically: "Silence is an evil that can easily be remedied, and the sooner we begin to make a row the better." She continued to make a row in the cause of justice for the rest of her life.

But there was an interlude while she studied art in London and Paris. Count Casimir Dunin-Markievicz, son of a Polish landlord in the Ukraine, was a fellow student on the Left Bank. They fell in love, married, settled in Dublin, and threw themselves into the lively intellectual life of what has come to be called the Irish literary renaissance. The Count wrote plays; the Countess acted. They met Arthur Griffith, leader of a small but vocal group called Sinn Féin, which wanted the Irish members to withdraw from the British House of Commons and meet in Dublin as the Irish parliament, thus establishing de facto independence; Bulmer Hobson, of the revolutionary Irish Republican Brotherhood, who helped the Countess found the Fianna, a Boy Scout movement dedicated to militant national ideals; James Larkin, radical labor leader whose creed of industrial unionism led to the general strike and lockout of 1913, and James Connolly, the Socialist who left the stamp of his thinking on her ideals.

She came to know the Dublin of the poor. She collected food and funds for the strikers; cooked and served dinners at Liberty Hall, the union headquarters; wrote letters to the press and addressed meetings; joined the Citizen Army when the workers set up their own defense force, and clashed with Sean O'Casey who disliked her aristocratic air.

During the 1916 Easter Rising the Countess was second in command of a Citizen Army unit at St. Stephen's Green, one of Dublin's main squares; friend and foe agree she was cool, courageous and an excellent shot. After the surrender she was sent to Kilmainham Prison, Ireland's Bastille, to await court-martial and execution. The sentence of death was commuted to penal servitude for life. She was transferred to Aylesbury Prison in England, released in the general amnesty of Christmas, 1917, rearrested five months later in a roundup of rebel leaders, put aboard a gunboat and lodged in London's Holloway Prison. In Prime Minister Lloyd George's "khaki election" of December, 1918, she was the first woman returned to Parliament; but like her fellow Sinn Féin representatives—who swept two-thirds of the Irish seats—she was pledged to an independent Irish parliament in Dublin and would not sit in London. The members not in prison met as Dáil Éireann, the national assembly of Ireland, and elected Eamon De Valera President. A few months later the Countess was released. When De Valera named her minister of labor in his underground executive she became the first woman cabinet member in Western Europe.

Her constituents in the Dublin slums idolized her. "The best and the last of the long fight is before us," she told them during the tumultuous reception following her release from Holloway. "The watchword is organize." Her department operated under the code drawn up as the Democratic Program of the Dáil: "It shall be the first duty of the government of the Republic to make provision for the physical, mental and spiritual well-being of the children, to secure that no child shall suffer hunger or cold from lack of food, clothing, or shelter but that all shall be provided with the means and facilities requisite for their proper education and training as citizens of a free and Gaelic Ireland." Her conception of a free Ireland was "a state run by the Irish people for the people. That means a government that looks after the rights of the people before the rights of property. My idea is the Workers' Republic for which Connolly died."

Meanwhile, Ireland was a battlefield. British troops, tanks and a murder gang disguised as a police force—nicknamed the Black and Tans because of their uniforms—failed to enforce Crown rule against an underground government and army that became adept in the use of guerrilla tactics. ("Many of the techniques of Fascist terrorism were developed by the Black and Tans of Ireland," the author notes.) The Countess was arrested again in the summer of 1919 and jailed in Cork for a seditious speech. "This is the most comfortable jail I have been in yet," she wrote her sister Eva. "There's a nice garden full of pinks and you can hear the birds sing." She read a great deal but was often lonely. Her sentence completed, she returned to the barricades, but was forced to go underground as the terror increased. She was seized in September, 1920, following a meeting of the Dáil, lodged in Mountjoy Prison, Dublin, court-martialed and sentenced to two years' hard labor. Kevin Barry, an 18-year-old medical student, and a number of other young men were hanged for treason. Many died on hunger strikes, in street battles and along lonely mountain roads. The jails were full. Then in July, 1921, Lloyd George arranged a truce. The Countess walked out of prison again.

On December 6, 1921, a treaty was signed granting dominion status to the South while retaining the North as part of the United Kingdom: the Irish had won partition not freedom. The Dáil split. The treaty was carried by seven votes. "While Ireland is not free I remain a rebel, unconverted and unconvertible," the Countess told her fellow deputies. She was touring America as the debate on Ireland's status ended in civil war. When she returned in November, 1923, she was arrested, promptly went on a hunger strike, and was released at Christmas.

Now began the painful task of rebuilding the shattered rebel ranks. To those who complained that they were sick of politics the Countess would reply that "politics ought to be nothing more or less than the organization of food, clothes, housing and transit" for the people. And she would quote Eugene Debs: "I would not lead you to freedom, even if I could, for if I could, someone else could as easily lead you back into slavery."

But the fires were going out. Mary Colum, wife of poet Padraic Colum, visited the Countess in 1925: "Her fight, her imprisonments, the prison fare had depleted her and dimmed her personality. . . . She was like an extinct volcano, her former violent self reduced to something burnt out. [She was] haggard and old, dressed in ancient demoded clothes. . . ."

Two years later Constance de Markievicz died at the age of 59 in the public ward of a hospital among the poor. The previous winter had been hard and she had spent it trudging up and down tenement stairs taking fuel and food supplies to the destitute. The authorities banned a lying-in-state at Dublin's City Hall. The military were out in force to stop any demonstrations at the graveyard. Detectives mingled among the mourners. It was a fitting end for a woman who had said of her own haughty family: "I suppose it's very embarrassing to have a relation that gets into jail and fights in revolutions that you are not in sympathy with." The state she had helped bring into being found her revolutionary dedication embarrassing too.

Mrs. Van Voris, who obviously understands the period, moves skillfully through the political thickets. The research is thorough, the errors very minor. She says Tom Clarke, the I.R.B. leader, "had suffered in prison months of solitary confinement": she might have added that he spent more than fifteen years in English jails. Some names are misspelled: Mitchell for Mitchel, Lawler for Lalor, Debs for Debs. The family name of the Spanish Dukes of Tetuan is O'Donnell not O'Connell; they are not lineal descendants of Hugh O'Donnell, the Gaelic chief who rebelled against Elizabeth, and died without issue. The O'Rahilly, a 1916 leader, doubtless was wise and urbane but he was not an "aristocrat" in the usual meaning of that term.

There is one poignant picture. Once a friend entered the Countess' room in the autumn of her life "and found her as no one had ever seen her before, sitting quietly looking out at the rainy twilight with tears running down her cheeks." One wonders was she crying for the world she had lost, or for the world she had failed to win?

The Puzzleheaded Critics

THE PUZZLEHEADED GIRL: Four Novellas. By Christina Stead. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 255 pp. $6.95.

FREDERICK H. GARDNER

Mr. Gardner is a free-lance writer.

During the war Christina Stead wrote an autobiographical novel called For Love Alone, the story of an Australian girl, Teresa Hawkins, daughter of a preachy, penny-pinching, domineering widower. "I told you I would kill you if you insult me," she reminds him at 19. Instead she flees, following a teacher to England. The teacher turns out to be an egotist. She goes to work for a grain trader named James Quick, a scholarly, gabby Marxist, unloved by his wife, a walker of city streets, a nonstop quoter of poets. He is dazzled by the girl's hallucinosis and falls in love with her; then she with him. There is a weekend with a friend of Quick's who is leaving to fight in Spain. And then comes fulfillment with Quick himself. It is one of the most beautiful love stories in our language—clean, honest, unsentimental, full of ups and downs, joyous in the end.

In the title story of the present collection Miss Stead describes the girl again, but with a twist. Her visions take on more weight than reality now; the relationship with the Marxist businessman is never consummated and he sticks with his loveless wife; the wraith marries the wrong man and leaves him, saying: "Love! I spit, I spit it out. It was all lies. It kills you. It's to get you. There's no love at all." She wanders off and dies. "She's the ragged wayward heart of woman that doesn't want to be caught and hasn't been caught," someone explains.

"The Puzzleheaded Girl," like For Love Alone, has a tone of celebration. Taken together they seem to say that a happy biography is a question of inches. Alone, the new novella tells us that what counts, what is really worth writing about, are the qualities that define us as individuals, win, lose or draw.

The second tale, "The Dianas," also recalls (though less directly) a novel, Letty Fox, Her Luck. An American girl named Lydia, bored and aimless in Paris, collects men. "You'll never get married," one gent tells her, "you'll just drift on and on." But the prophecy is untrue, thanks again to external accident: a man comes along who wants her, even though he questions her stability. Until he appears, with one page to go, the description of Lydia's affairs has been slow with detail. Then he proposes—"I've thought about your life and I've made up my mind what I'm going to do"—and Miss Stead squeezes time as though it were a concertina. "Little by little," she ends, "patiently but with determination, he met her old friends, was good to them and discarded them."

Lydia's marriage is the kind of event Randall Jarrell cited when he wrote, in his introduction to The Man Who Loved Children: "Christina Stead has an uncanny ability to imagine an event that will be the necessary surprising sum of the events before it . . . a qualitatively different event that at once sums up and contradicts the earlier events and is the beginning of a new series." In this case the marriage is the actual ending. The discarding of the friends could have been the stuff of a novel, but what matters about Lydia and her husband occurred at the start of the relationship. We have all we need to understand both the surface and the basis of their experience. To generalize, the difference between Christina Stead's novellas and novels is simply: This truth can be roped off in 36 pages; that one will require more than 500.

None of the contradictory events in her stories involves a sharper turn than one Miss Stead took in her own life. Her first book, The Salzburg Tales, was a collection of hallucinations, some funny, some grotesque, all believable (I believe she saw these things), all upsetting. Her subsequent involvement in workaday European finance and politics, her long trip to America with her husband, a brilliant expositor of Marx, must have forced the fantast to recede, and

THE STEWARD

*The sixtieth gull.
It begins to rain,
He turns too, in his
White coat, throws
His cigarette into
The sea.
It is time to return
To those who do not Love him, to babble
Their children
To sleep, to be Part of the hum
Of the ship's engines.
The nights sail
Away, on the oil
Of manners and charm
But once
They stuffed with wicks
Those white gulls
Of the English Channel
And burned them for Lamps, when Stuka
Provided the birds
And shore-watchers went Dizzy. It takes (This sea where we Rock) the fieriest
Gulls, and it makes
The Stukas and Messerschmitts fall
In a mist so thick
Few remember, and it Gives for a bonus
The calm of white-Jacketed years.*

DAVID RAY

the later works contain very few ghost stories. But a tension remains—the outlandish dreamer vs. the social historian giving us the essence of this man, that couple, that movement, that nation, that epoch—and her best prose takes its energy from the conflict. In the volume at hand is a story called "The Right-angled Creek," a recounting of the unhappy tenure of three families—and most vividly the anguish of Laban Davies, a left winger, writer, alcoholic—in a house near New Hope, Pa. The prose in this story is at once rich and precise, particularly the nature writing, luxuriant as that lovely country and ominous as the crack-ups to come:

This tiny creek first appears as a meander in a wet place, and then as a wallow, where a broad soft meadow declines into swamp, where Sobieski's black and white cattle lounge all day in a hemicycle of trees, till they are called in the evening, Cow, cow, cow, by Sobieski's little boys. Above, it becomes a creek, falling from a series of rocky saucers from which the transparent water drips between banks of poison ivy, elder and tiger lilies. In the saucers are elvers and other small fish; and where the track and the creek together make a rightangled turn and go east, a trickle from the Strassers' rocky infertile ridge has made a deep cut, passing under a strong wooden bridge in which there is a loose plank. This plank is kept loose at one end to tell who is passing: a footstep, lunk! a car lunk-lunk! It is heard in the daytime in the fields; at night, much louder, it wakes from sleep. . . .

Like Jarrell, who entitled his essay "An Unread Book," every admirer of Christina Stead finds himself pondering her long obscurity. (For someone who is just starting to write it is a devastating fact; it makes you think it's all a lottery.) Jose Yglesias, in these pages, speculated that "because Miss Stead seems so old-fashioned, she doesn't interest the avant-garde; because her vision is so radical, she disquiets the mass of readers who are middle class; because she is original and tough-minded, left wingers feel no comfort of recognition."

In the end, of course, it is radicals who should appreciate her, as Engels appreciated Balzac, for sheer accuracy. Why then have they not claimed and celebrated this woman—they claim and celebrate nonentities every week—who is certainly one of the foremost writers of our time and tongue? My guess is that the recognition to which she leads left wingers, far from comforting, is appalling. With few exceptions, the American radicals she presents are hypocritical and incestuous, honey talkers, good livers, enlightened parents of darkly disturbed children. The fourth and last novella in this collection is about a middle-aged man whose hunger is for young girls. It would be a sentimental untruth to say that he is no better, no worse, than most people. Most people don't exonerate themselves quite so glibly.

No Right To Be Wrong

THE CONCEPT OF IDEOLOGY: And Other Essays. By George Lichtheim. Random House. 327 pp. $5.95. Paper $1.95.

EDWARD T. GARGAN

Mr. Gargan is professor of history at the University of Wisconsin. He is the author of De Tocqueville (Hillary House).

In an errata slip provided to reviewers of George Lichtheim's book, Random House states: "Through a publisher's error, the copy on the front of jacket reads 'a distinguished philosopher and social critic.'" This is in error and on all future printings, line will be corrected to read 'a distinguished historian and social critic.'" The writer of the jacket can be forgiven for his error, for Lichtheim does talk and write like a very good philosopher.

The temptation to regard Lichtheim as a philosopher is further encouraged by his suggestion that if sociology and history are to be integrated for the greater understanding of our condition, then this will come about through the use of the common intellectual tools of philosophy. His philosophical approach as critic and reviewer is additionally indicated by the quotation from Hegel he uses to open this collection of essays and reviews. "What is rational is real and what is real is rational," Hegel wrote in the preface to his Philosophy of Right. George Lichtheim operates on the conviction that what is real can be known and that its reality is to be understood in terms of the inner logic that governs its existence. Errors in understanding are never for him merely differences in interpretation, but flaws in the reasoning process annihilating the object of understanding and understanding itself.

This standard imposes upon Lichtheim the most severe demands for himself and those who are subject to his critical scrutiny. He is forced by his own rules to come close to the position that error has no rights. This test supports conclusions of Lichtheim that are magisterial in their wisdom and scope; but at the same time it encourages his cruel and trivial attacks on those he finds wanting, leaving those who have encountered him bloody and often near death. Such an engagement is compulsively attractive to his readers, but when the blood has dried what was once thought to be tragedy is seen as melodrama, and the cold corpses lying about his collected reviews arouse less interest in the victims than in the kind of man who keeps such a private morgue.

Lichtheim acts on the high premise that the world turns on our correct understanding of the historical process, that our historical consciousness determines our destiny, that "Reason" as an absolute permits us to know and sustain "the enduring realities of human existence." The limits of any argument, any book, are not for him merely the shortcomings of our common condition but disasters to be treated with scorn if they are the results of stupidity, or deserving logical destruction if they are the consequences of perverse ideology. He is, as he has been in his previous studies of Marxism, without mercy for the great disciple-distorters of Marx, of whom he would include as the most grievous sinner, Friedrich Engels. He is a militant opponent of all subjectivism and irrationality, and in keeping with this obligation regards Nietzsche as in no sense a responsible thinker. Kierkegaard and Nietzsche, he insists, have nothing to contribute to our understanding of how history functions. His rejection of Nietzsche is significant because to appreciate this philosopher one must be sympathetic to the doubts about man that tortured this great German. For Lichtheim, a serious thinker may confront difficulties submissive to reason, but a writer ceases to be responsible if anxiety, dread and doubt capture his intelligence.

Lichtheim's confidence in reason makes him a great successor to the philosophes of the Enlightenment, but it does not fully explain the anger and violence of his own performance as critic. When he is in agreement with the logic of a thesis he is the best commentator any writer can hope to have. When he declares that C. B. Macpherson's The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism has altered for all time our understanding of this subject, he is convincing and makes his own very necessary contribution to political thought and history. When, however, he disagrees with the findings of those he criticizes he becomes untrustworthy.

In discussing John Plamenatz's Man and Society, a work involving Hobbes, Locke, the Enlightenment and 19th-century thought, the period of Lichtheim's superb competence, he not only finds the methodology false but he ridicules and demeans the author for his sins against his canons of historical method. He writes that in Plamenatz's book "the French Encyclopedists are not considered at all. Perhaps news of them has not reached Oxford?" In fact the Encyclopedists are briefly noted five times in the course of Plamenatz's work and are cavalierly treated as lacking originality. This is indeed a serious shortcoming; it is due, however, not to the news of their presence not reaching Oxford but rather to a belief that their message, though engagingly announced, was not very new. This is the moment of falsehood or truth that requires examination.

Perhaps George Lichtheim's response to Professor Plamenatz's work is the result of his aversion to those who hold tenured posts in the academic establishment. His criticism changes in tone when he examines the work of men who have moved beyond academia to create statements that are part of the intellectual possession of this generation. When he reviews Karl Löwith's epoch-making From Hegel to Nietzsche, Lichtheim generously praises Löwith's work as a major effort within a specific tradition among "educated Germans." Embarrassed, however, by the book's theological center, he judges it faulty in not treating the irrationalism of German political conservatism. This is a true judgment on German political conscious-

THREE CHOICE VOLUMES

from

The University of Michigan Press

MATTHEW ARNOLD: DISSENT AND DOGMA

Edited by R. H. Super

This is the sixth volume in Professor Super's definitive critical edition of The Complete Prose Works of Matthew Arnold, which The Times (London) Literary Supplement calls "one of the major literary undertakings of our time." Devoted largely to religious criticism, the book includes Arnold's most popular work, Literature and Dogma. In addition, there are 130 pages of critical, textual, and explanatory notes and a special index. $11.75

ECONOMIC FAILURE, ALIENATION, AND EXTREMISM

Michael Aiken, Louis A. Ferman, and Harold L. Sheppard

The social and psychological effects of economic failure are thoroughly examined in this study of 314 workers left jobless when the Packard Motor Car Company failed in 1956. An excellent resource and research aid, the book is complete with data tables and a methodology chapter. It has special relevance for a fast-changing society in which the plight of these workers could be that of almost any American worker today. $7.50

NEGROES AND JOBS: A Book of Readings

Edited by Louis A. Ferman, Joyce L. Kornbluh, and J. A. Miller

Foreword by A. Philip Randolph

Some of the most important social thinkers of our day give an up-to-date account of the economic plight of the Negro in America. Among the contributors to this collection of recent articles are James Tobin, Herbert Hill, and Senator Robert F. Kennedy. Discussion covers the causes of Negro job disadvantage, the nature of the Negro job market, and possible action programs to increase the Negro's access to job opportunities.

$9.00 clothbound
5.25 paperbound

The UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS

ANN ARBOR

ness, but Löwith addresses himself to the German fixation on problems of the spirit, of transcendence, which equally require illumination and which he successfully exposes with intense lucidity. The quality of that light is not present in Lichtheim's discussion.

Lichtheim's ambivalence toward those who have great stature in the contemporary world becomes clearer when he writes about Jean-Paul Sartre. Throughout his book Lichtheim refers again and again to existentialism as a philosophical "fashion." He begins his consideration of Sartre by characterizing his thought as the most interesting failure in modern French literature, and concludes his essay, centered on Sartre's Critique de la raison dialectique, by stating that Sartre's attempt to understand the meaning of history is "breath-taking." Lichtheim does not accept Sartre's view that history and consciousness depend upon man's "choice of being" through man's praxis in history, but he brilliantly highlights the significance of that position and is a great critic when he enables his readers to see why Sartre's "tour de force" has created a new situation for the philosophy of history: things are never going to be quite the same again." At this point existentialism is no longer a fashion but is in the position to form existence.

When George Lichtheim is writing as historian rather than critic his performance is matchless. This is demonstrated by the long essay that gives this volume its title, The Concept of Ideology. Here he examines the development of this concept from its tentative beginnings as a term introduced by Antoine Destutt de Tracy at the end of the 18th century through its transformation by Hegel and Marx, Comte and Durkheim; the efforts of academicians such as Weber and Mannheim to confine ideology within the problems of sociology; the present urgent need to see the history of ideology as focusing all our attention on the problem of history as a "concrete universal" upon whose understanding our destiny hinges. No one has ever in any compass examined this subject with comparable rigor and depth. In this achievement Lichtheim is more than a "distinguished historian"—he is a great one.

Neo-Confucianism in the 12th century A.D. The Chinese philosophers here represented are in the Great Tradition, and uphold, in modern terms, the value and validity of the essence of Confucian philosophy as presented by Chu Hsi in the late Sung period.

The late E.R. Hughes, an English scholar, is almost alone in standing up for the Buddhist-influenced thinking of the Chinese Middle Ages, from the end of Han to late T'ang (3rd to 9th centuries A.D.). Some of these questions may seem rather more in the field of the professional philosopher than in that of the ordinary reader, but the experts have made consistent efforts to present difficult problems in language as close to that of the layman as the subject permits. On one main conclusion all are agreed: that the underlying principle of all Chinese thinking is Humanistic and not Deistic. From Confucius onward the story is the same: even the Buddhists and Taoists, in many ways teaching doctrines antithetical to the Confucians, are nonetheless deeply influenced by the Chinese humanism. This fact accounts for the decay in China of the metaphysical Buddhist schools of Indian origin and the rise and long continued success of Chinese schools, or Buddhism whose doctrines were more acceptable to the Chinese outlook. Among these was Ch'an or Zen as it is more often called after its Japanese name.

From a historian's point of view it sometimes seems a little surprising to discover that many of the philosophers are still prepared to accept as of very early date some texts which modern scholarship would now assign to later periods. Lao Tzu, the traditional founder of Taoism and alleged author of the Tao Te Ching, is not now considered to be a historical personage, nor is the Tao Te Ching believed to be a book contemporary with Confucius. Stylistic evidences are strongly against such a conclusion. Perhaps the exact dates, three or four centuries this way or that, of the ancient texts is of less significance from the point of view of their philosophic value than it may be for the historian, but in a history of philosophy, showing the development of ideas as opposed to their intrinsic value or truth, the dates have more importance.

Dr. Moore, in a lucid introduction, defines these problems of Chinese thought and philosophy, giving a very clear and useful list of the main points in which Chinese thinking has diverged from the Western pattern; the dominance of philosophy and ethics over theology and dogma; the unity of philosophy and political thought; the essential belief that the Nature of Man is Good, which lies at the heart of Confucian doctrine—even though one early

Through China's Looking Glass

THE CHINESE MIND. Edited by Charles A. Moore. East-West Center Press. 402 pp. $9.50.

CHINESE LOOKING GLASS. By Dennis Bloodworth. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 432 pp. $6.95.

CHINA LOOKS AT THE WORLD. By François Geoffroy-Dechaune. Translated from the French by Jean Stewart. Pantheon Books. 237 pp. $4.95.

C. P. FITZGERALD

Mr. FitzGerald teaches Far Eastern history at Australian National University. He is the author most recently of Concise History of East Asia (Praeger).

These three books, written or edited by an American scholar, an English correspondent, and a French artist respectively, give an interesting cross section of the views on China held in different parts of the Western world. The Chinese Mind, edited by the late Charles A. Moore is, it is true, an anthology of contributions by many different scholars, several of whom are themselves Chinese, and were originally given as papers at the four East-West Philosophers Conferences held at the University of Hawaii in 1939, 1949, 1959 and 1964.

Perhaps for this reason there is an inevitable overlap of some of the contributions, especially as they are selected from a period of more than twenty-five years. This is not, therefore, a topical book designed to reveal the mind of contemporary China in any aspect of its bewildering complexity and contradiction: it is devoted to the older philosophy of China, from the earliest times; and many of the contributions give very valuable insights into the development of the Chinese philosophic tradition over the past 2,500 years. A very notable contribution is that of Dr. Hu Shih, "The Scientific Spirit and Method in Chinese Philosophy," which sums up his famous views on this subject, first put forward many years ago in his "Development of the Logical Method in Ancient China." The contribution in the present work is perhaps the last work that Dr. Hu wrote.

For an understanding of the cultural background from which modern Communist China has emerged no book could be better. The main threads of Chinese thought are clearly distinguished and analyzed from the point of view of Western philosophy, and the effects of Buddhism on Chinese thought are closely argued by several of the contributors. It is very clear that the majority of the Chinese philosophers who consider this question hold the opinion that the Buddhist contribution was slight, had less lasting effect than might be supposed, and was largely rejected (in intellectual circles) after the rise of Confucian held the opposite opinion. Original Goodness, rather than Original Sin, is a fundamental difference of approach which shapes all thinking and much ethical and social teaching. It is, for example, evident as a continuing force in the thinking and political experiments of Mao Tse-tung. Only a conviction that man was good by nature could support a program like the Cultural Revolution.

Mr. Bloodworth's book will be a valuable source book for future writers on China and the overseas Chinese. It covers a very wide range, but always with well selected and pertinent citations and examples. Chinese history is touched upon to bring out an abiding trait in the national character, or reaction to circumstances. It is not given in narrative form but used to illuminate the formation of cultural ideals and social practices. There is also a very well-balanced and objective discussion of the social system of old China, and what remains of it (a very great deal) among the overseas Chinese. The lot of women, and how some strong characters escaped it, is matched by a perceptive description of the Chinese woman's great counteroffensive in a male-dominated society; her capture of the home.

The second part of the book increasingly turns to the deep and underlying causes of revolution, and its latest manifestations. China had established a political system and a social structure that had stood many a shock for 2,000 years, but always came back to an even keel. Why it should have suddenly succumbed to the relatively weak pressures and limited assaults of the Western world in the late 19th and early 20th centuries has always demanded full explanation.

Bloodworth sees it, as modern scholars tend to do, as more concerned with processes within China than pressures from without. Until recently we did not understand what was going on in China in the late 18th and 19th century. We saw the situation from our side of the looking glass. Bloodworth makes us see it from the other side, from China looking out.

From this point of view the internal ideological struggle which preceded political revolution was really interested in adaptation, not transformation. It was accepted, unconsciously one might say, that China was, of course, superior. It always had been; any other view was merely capricious and silly. The question was how far new circumstances made the adoption of some foreign techniques, and the adaptation of some Chinese ideas necessary to the accepted, universal purpose—to maintain and restore China's "natural" supremacy. Every Chinese acceptance of some new Western practice or skill, new art or fashion, has always this character, sometimes inconspicuous, often obvious. Western medicine, engineering, science, political ideas, yes; Western art, literature, religion, no. The generalization is sweeping, but the qualifications needed to make it fit the facts are much less so.

It need be no surprise, therefore, that the Communist Revolution, whether political seventeen years ago, or cultural today, has also these characteristics. It is the old debate in a new form. How far is the imported Western idea valuable; how well does it serve China (not the Working Classes of the World); how can it be fitted into basic Chinese values, or modify these values. Those who would have "used Chinese Learning as the base and Western Learning for use" in the 19th century, the revolutionaries of 1911 (who never considered the social system, only the political regime), and the Nationalist-Communist duel all had the same subject for debate, each in their generation; all made the same unquestioned assumption. Western learning, a republic, nationalism or communism were there to solve China's national problem, make it strong once more, and so able to reject or accept what was unnecessary or desirable from the alien world beyond. Liu Shao-ch'i and Mao Tse-tung are still engaged in this essential and unchanging argument, and using the language, updated, which their controversial predecessors employed. "Traitor to China (Han Chien)," cried the old conservatives: "bigoted old scholar," they were answered. "Revisionist" charges Mao Tse-tung—and just what Liu would answer to that is still denied to us since he cannot at the moment make it public.

"Mao Tzu" is Bloodworth's title for his last chapter; giving the present leader the title of Philosopher or Sage, which his early forerunners, Confucius and Mencius, bore. He asks will, 2,000 years hence, the leader of the Cultural Revolution be read as "Mao Tzu" by millions, or will his age be briefly noted as a "period of confusion" between enduring regimes. It seems to many observers that it will in any case be a Chinese solution, and the probable nature of such an outcome can be better assessed by those who have the opportunity to read this understanding book. One small point! Yüan Shih-k'ai was not assassinated; he died "of eating bitterness," as the Chinese put it, in his bed.

Speaking of the warlord period, from 1920 to the outbreak of the Japanese war, M. Geoffroy-Dechaume says: "China was on the eve of one of those great waves of collective emotion which mark her history, and which dialectical materialism has not yet been able to explain." In one sense his book is an attempt to explain this phenomenon,

ECONOMIC FAILURE, ALIENATION, AND EXTREMISM

Michael Aiken,
Louis A. Ferman, and Harold L. Sheppard

When a man loses his job, he loses more than a paycheck. He also suffers serious social and psychological consequences. These effects are examined in this study of 314 workers left jobless when the Packard Motor Car Company of Detroit failed in 1956.

Complete with data tables and a chapter on methodology, the book is an excellent resource and research aid. It should have special relevance for a fast-changing society in which the plight of the Packard employees could be that of almost any American worker today. $7.50

The UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
ANN ARBOR

YOU STILL HAVE TIME TO GIVE THE PERFECT GIFT

48 Issues of

THE NATION

This Country's Oldest (1865)
Weekly Journal of Dissenting Opinion

Plus FREE Bonus Book

- VIETNAM: The Logic of Withdrawal
by Howard Zinn
- THE NEW STUDENT LEFT edited by Mitchel Cohen and Dennis Hale
- BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN
by Carey McWilliams
- THE WAR IN VIETNAM by the Staff of the Senate Republican Policy Committee

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Please send The Nation as a gift for one year at the Holiday rate of $10 for the first Gift subscription, and $8 for each additional Gift, to the following friends. Also send a FREE copy of the book I have listed.

Name

Address

City State Zip #

Book Sign Gift Card from

Name

Address

City State Zip #

Book Sign Gift Card from

Your Own Name

Address

City State Zip #

Foreign and Canadian: $1 per year extra

☐ I enclose payment of $..... ☐ Bill me which today is once more so obvious—and so contrary to Marxist dogma.

1-1-68

The author sees the essential problem as tension between Chinese inheritance and modern or Western intrusive ideas and techniques. He is an artist, and the book is an artist's interpretation of the clash between China and the West, seen in terms of cultural rather than political conflict. He points out that as a corollary to the well-known fact that China is more a civilization than a nation—or rather that this was the traditional situation—the Chinese also tend to see the outside world in the same terms: "The Foreign Lands" (wai kuo) or more recently "the Imperialist exploiting reactionary regimes." Not as nations with an individuality, even if only a small national territory, but cultural aggregates—new versions of the all-inclusive "barbarians" of the past.

It is a sympathetic book, not unduly distressed by what the author clearly feels are passing manifestations of a cultural contact that must be resolved by the better understanding of China by Westerners, and when this is once more possible, by a greater depth of exploration of Western culture by educated Chinese. When Chinese cease to look upon the West as either an enemy to be rejected or a source of useful techniques to be adopted, real understanding will be easier to achieve. Europeans must, for their part, learn to forget the willow-pattern plate China and recognize one quarter of the human race as fellow men, not as statistics.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

It has all been Americana for me since the 5th of December, Americana of all shades, stripes and shapes.

To begin with, there was Joseph Heller's We Bombed in New Haven, done as part of the Yale School of Drama Repertory season. This is young generation Americana, flippantly derisive and at times quite funny. The fun is not as sustained as in the author's novel, Catch 22, and is largely visual in the lively production under Larry Arrick's direction. A good team of actors is most helpful, notably Ron Leibman as a humorously atrabilious sergeant and Anthony Holland as one lunatically eager to replace him. The play's general idea is the obscene pointlessness of military routine and action.

The second act gradually turns to pathos. Here the Captain, well played by Stacy Keach, is obliged to send his own son off to be killed in air combat.

THE NATION/January 1, 1968

In this play, the men thus condemned to death are chosen and known in advance. None of the play is projected as "realism" but as the presentation by actors presenting themselves as both characters and actors—a device which for the most part succeeds—and is called Pirandellesque by folk who think by tags even when, as in this case, the tag is wholly inappropriate.

Most of the audience felt that the second act was a "let down." I found, on the contrary, that its final scenes gave the play a unity it needed to be something more than a series of gags. The situation of a father being forced to sacrifice his son (a role well played by a student actor, Stephen Mills) is a stereotype, but here it is ingeniously handled. And there is an ironic touch at the last curtain in which Stacy Keach asks the audience to contribute to the Will Rogers Fund for tubercular patients.

Two aspects of the play and production interested me particularly. A theatre audience, I have found, is quite willing and able to leap from high jinks to pathos, with no naturalistic bridge between. It is resilient and will play any game theatre artists have in mind, provided each segment of the piece is well contrived. The fact that many members of the New Haven audience failed to respond to the play's last moments indicates that some impediment prevented them from lending themselves to the play's avowed sentiment.

This leads to the second aspect of the play's "problem." The son asks his father why he hadn't done anything to prevent the war, not just before its outbreak but from the boy's birth. The question, a pointed one, is unanswerable because it is "revolutionary." So revolutionary indeed that it demands an altogether different kind of play. Heller's charade and others of similar caliber, despite their "subversive" intention, don't breach our inertia or awake anything in us beyond a mild assent which is little more than complacency at our own inept liberalism. The day of satire which hurts has not yet arrived.

George Kelly's The Show-Off (an APA-Phoenix production at the Lyceum) was written in 1924 and represents the Americana of an earlier generation. When I saw it then I was impressed by it seemed to be—and probably was—the lampoon of "America."

in America till there were very few chickens or cars but mostly empty pots and garages.

As a period piece The Show-Off is still entertaining in bits and patches, but there are dull stretches between. One factor that makes the play now less than a total success (I do not refer to the box office) is that it is so well carpentered. Every point is so carefully planted, every move so prosaically explained, every consequence so neatly laid out, that we grow tired by the time required for all this lumber to be set in place.

The fact is that realism of this sort is superannuated; it bores. Realism is good theatre today only when it is genuinely perceptive and probing, as it is with the masters. The more commonplace realism can be redeemed only by brilliant acting. The APA production suffers chiefly from a lack of a good Aubrey Piper: an actor who is not a counter for the character but a first-rate comedian who can make you enjoy Piper rather than being embarrassed by him.

Helen Hayes as Piper's mother-in-law is very effective: she knows every trick. She stands out from the context by giving a highly skilled performance of a performance. Between the actor playing the show-off, who should be central rather than an excuse for the show, and Miss Hayes's knockout demonstration, we are no longer in realism at all but in gimcrack theatre. Other members of the company are good and Pamela Payton-Wright as Piper's wife is very good. If everyone were on that level the play as play would fare better.

I do not know Peter DeVries' fictional work except through its dramatizations. Spofford (Anta Theatre) is a comedy by Herman Shumlin based on Mr. DeVries' novel, Reuben, Reuben. From the evidence of this play and the earlier Tunnel of Love I assume that the author is a descendant of an older countryside who is humorously exercised over its transformation into a well-heeled middle class, jazzed up, quasi-educated and, on the whole, foolishly tony exurbanite bedroom town.

The play is affable and smoothly literate. Its dialogue is compounded of that lustrous glue that creates the effect of quietly self-congratulatory sophistication and wit which is associated with the lighter New Yorker stories.

Spofford is a 64-year-old chicken farmer who has educated himself by learning a new word every day, to the point of being able to quote Mary McCarthy, dig a pastiche of Dylan Thomas verse, and make offhand jibes at William Faulkner. Spofford, a widower, is surrounded by his illiterate family of primitive country stock and the new-fangled fauna from the city. The latter are rich Republicans, and their wives range from the harmlessly bitchy to the decoratively mediocre. The plot deals with Spofford's efforts to get his college girl granddaughter to marry the scion of one of the "better" families, and incidentally to save himself from marrying his ignorant daughter-in-law's equally ignorant mother. He will probably succeed in his first aim and will undoubtedly fail in his second.

There are tedious moments in the early portions of the play; the latter part has several very funny spots. The whole is intelligently inoffensive and amiable at an equable temperature, like the banter of good-natured folk at a cocktail party where everyone wishes to be brightly pleasant without making any real contact or hurting anyone's feelings.

Melvyn Douglas, a fine person and

From The Smith

with Horizon Press

New Year's Eve/1929

JAMES T. FARRELL

$4.50

In this twentieth of his published novels, Farrell depicts a bunch of Chicago Bohemians at a thunderous New Year's Eve party. Dan O'Neill, the Danny O'Neill of the famous novels, is there and involved in the drinking, fighting and would-be fornicating. As the night progresses and people move in and out of apartments more and more uncertainly in an alcoholic haze, the author's vision of, and concern for, the human predicament become clear. The sadness and merriment of the characters and the time have a special relevance for the reader of today.

At your bookseller or from The Smith.

15 Park Row, New York 10038

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum. It has already been selected for an anthology to be published by Atheneum next Spring.

Single copies—15c

25 copies at 10c each

Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

good actor, brings off the slight action of the play, and his comments on it (addressed solo to the audience) with genial ease. His part is physically strenuous but otherwise a snap for so accomplished a trouper. I didn't believe his rural accent at first (or anybody else's for that matter), but with the progress of the play either he relaxed or I became used to the Connecticut cracker speech.

The opening section of the play showed strain, perhaps because of the rigid meticulousness of Herman Shumlin's direction which wore off toward the middle of the evening. In this respect the acting—especially apt with Teresa Hughes as Spofford's daughter and Pert Kelton as her mother—should improve with further playing and greater freedom.

How Now, Dow Jones with book by Max Shulman, lyrics by Carolyn Leigh, music by Elmer Bernstein (Lunt-Fontanne Theatre) is musical comedy Americana, concerned as the title indicates, with the stock market and its multitudinous aspirants.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Considering the sensations that accompanied its publication, the surprising thing about the film version of Truman Capote's In Cold Blood is that it is so unsensational. That, I think, is because the style and action of the picture are domesticated by exposure on the detective thrillers of television. This work may be more meticulously detailed than the typical half-hour episode, but the tone is so unmistakable as to evoke that slack-minded sprawl on the living room sofa. The cops are quiet-voiced fatalists, weary, baffled by their own decency, dogged. The Clutter family, seen proportionately much more briefly than in Capote's chronicle, is also less righteously domineering. It is precisely the sweet electronic American family, down to the smallest details of curtains, jolly health and dad shaving in the bathroom. The picture is filmed in Hollywood verismo, with rain and wind to supply mood, and the sounds of transportation—trucks, cars, trains and bus terminals—to drive home the credibility. You can watch it secure in the knowledge that you will be scared a little, but hurt not at all, and that soon it will be time for a beer.

That leaves for consideration the great holes in the center of the picture, as it was the great hole in Capote's narrative, the killers themselves. No one has ever been able to explain why we are spending so much time on these two young men; they are achingly dull and the fact that they can also be deadly makes

There is not a good tune in it, but for the life of me I can't tell the immense difference between musicals which cause most of my critical colleagues (and consequently much of the audience) to love some and hate others. The New York Times, for example, loved Superman two years ago, was cordial to Henry, Sweet Henry this season, and hated How Now. It is true that three different critics were involved but, after all, they are all from The New York Times.

I found several laugh-provoking lines in the new show; I thought Brenda Vaccaro sweet and juicy, Anthony Roberts thoroughly likeable, Marlyn Mason of good voice, nice disposition and well legged, while Hiram Sherman, an actor who never strikes a false note, was impeccable. There are a few cute scenic and choreographic effects and a theme paramount in our way of life: the run for money. What more do you expect nowadays for $9.90: something great? Believe me, How to Succeed in Business, etc. was much better but not that great!

them no more interesting. A defective steering wheel is as arbitrarily lethal. Bonnie and Clyde were also killers, and I have little doubt that they were as stultifying as Dick Hickock and Perry Smith. But in the film they had a terrible style and they acted out something that one knew was in the American blood. Bonnie and Clyde, though, was a story; In Cold Blood takes great pride in being fact.

But it is "how" fact, with very little "who" and no "why" at all. The film keeps asking why they did it, and comes up with nothing more revealing than a psychiatrist's suggestion that the two boys together formed a third personality who was the real killer. But that takes no great wisdom, since Hickock arranged it that way when he roped Perry into the job. It is one of the heresies of our fragmented era that you learn something by "telling it like it was"; all you are really doing, though, is running the tape through once again. And there is something dubious about the avidity with which we lap up the replay. It's clear enough how Dick and Perry got their kicks; but how are we getting ours?

And I wonder even about the facts. If I remember Capote's text accurately, Perry has been considerably spruced up for the film. It was probably necessary. Any film that hopes to make good of the national circuit must have at least one character we can root for, and since the Clutters are dead, the police are a cathedra and even his mother wo scarcely root for Hickock, that leaves Perry to play the good guy. I'm not sure that I fancy spending two and a quarter hours in cinema America only to end up feeling empathy for an aspirin-chewing enigma who is nice to kids and fires off shotguns in the faces of his tied-up victims. Scott Wilson as Hickock and Robert Blake as Perry Smith are as graphically brilliant as everything else in the picture. But as characters they are suspiciously pat: the one a naturally mean coward (he lacks the nerve to kill people in cold blood, and you find yourself despising him on that score); the other a sweet, trusting boy tormented by visions of wayward parents. In the end, one is left, not with a work of art, not with a document but with a cliché. It is an inadequate monument, even to a pair of stupid criminals.

The quartet of young Englishmen chiefly responsible for Beyond the Fringe seemed to have every talent required for topical entertainment except that of self-criticism. As a result, their program of barbed and witty skits took an occasional tumble into fatuous dialogue and campy gesture. Now two of them, Peter Cook and Dudley Moore, with director Stanley Donen, have collaborated on Bedazzled, which for the most part is an extended tumble.

The film is one of those ventures that rely heavily on humorous costumes and the dropping of famous names. It is also trapped in its formula, the Faust legend, so that Mr. Cook as Satan and Mr. Moore as his client must labor through the catalogue of wishes that lead to the forfeit of the latter's soul, with no belief in the original force of the myth and no energy to play effective contemporary changes upon it. The essence of all seven episodes is precisely the same: only the decor changes, and I found myself ticking them off on my fingers with a view to estimating when I might get home to dinner. Some of the remarks addressed to God struck me as chatty to the point of irreverence, but I am not a regular churchgoer, and will leave the issue of religious decorum to the judgment of the clergy. The attempts at bawdiness were enervated, despite the efforts of two sportive ladies.

It would be wrong to say that Bedazzled contains no merriment, but at current admission prices laughs come at inflated cost.

Crossword Puzzle

FRANK W. LEWIS

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

There is a simple and terrifying scene in a classic of cinematic horror, the English Dead of Night. A man is tying his tie before a gilded Gothic revival mirror in his moderne apartment. At some unspecified instant before he is aware of it, before even we know precisely what has happened, the situation somehow liquifies and the mirror is reflecting a moldering Victorian interior, tulle-swathed four-poster, flickering tapers. It was with somewhat the same sensation, an illusory, yet grippingly real relocation of time and place, the present dissolved in a nightmare environment of other, alien and dead beings, thwarting even my capacity to look behind, that I was transfixed by the tableaux of Ed Kienholz, which are now lying in homely state at the Washington Gallery of Modern Art.

Though initially one might think it had something in common with waxworks, the medium by which Kienholz transmits such sensations is radically different, except in certain parallels of setting or detail, and perhaps the Guignol effect. Between the mode of waxworks and that of Kienholz lies the opposition of a reconstruction as compared with a re-creation. At Madame Tussaud's, one views a scholarly attempt to get the personage, the scene, "as it was," producing the inadvertent result of horror because so many of the trappings of human life clothe only effigies of human creatures—the habiliments, the circumstances, the cosmetics giving rise all the more to the experience of a moment embalmed. One responds as to a conventionally staged theatre vignette, and judges on the basis of plausibility and naturalness.

With Kienholz's "While Visions of Sugar Plums Danced in Their Heads," however, the simulacra of a tatty 1940's bedroom, its fiberglas denizens coupled in carnal rigor, provides an environment through which we wander to the staticky tunes of its radio, and under the feeble, lace-shrouded lights on the vanity. While the efforts of the wax morticians are devoted to highlighting the bogus "life" of their characters, Kienholz congeals into death an outrageously more real humanity since, for an interval, we partake of

For this to happen, elements of the scene must be changeable, time must be differentiated, so that the tableau organically adheres to our temporal consciousness, rather than being set into it, as with an object requiring more formal viewing. If I muss the rug, recognize a new Pop hit, or notice the mirror reflection of the couple (photo transferred on gelatin), drinking and combing hair, it is only to imprison myself between feelings of something happening now, and of an older occurrence, the shifting materials of memory and sensation so tangibly wearing away my identity in the present that the experience whirls into symbolic decay . . . or rather, emerges as a new kind of dread.

It is this dreadfulness of Kienholz which informs the great tableaux at Washington, etched in even more pungently by their persistent reference to waiting, deterioration and death. Moreover, he has no scruple in equating our intrusion into his realm with voyeurism, so that to witness his work is to be incriminated of prurience. If one looks between the legs of the girl mannikin giving birth ("Birthday"), one is confronted by a mirror: to gain a view of the interior of "State Hospital," one peeks through a small barred window. A price must be paid to examine the alluringly horrid, generally unseen contents of this work. Usually the price is guilt, but the payment may be as little as being physically squeezed through the urine-smelling, coffinlike precinct of "Barney's Beanery" (not in the show).

Dread and guilt may well be complements, but here they serve more as antagonists. Dread has to do with the flesh-crawling intuition of being thrown into a time limbo. The chirping canary in "The Wait" (Whitney Museum) makes an already skeletal old lady, surrounded by the faded bric-a-brac of her cramped life, look like "remains" that indict the mindlessness, but also the tenuousness of the present. (How well Hitchcock explored the pathology of this momento mori in Psycho.) Guilt, on the other hand, is involved with jimmying open the bad conscience that makes us disdainful of, even as we are drawn to witness, all the prosthetic, illicit underpinnings of a repressive, double-standard society. Kienholz knows that we fear most our loss of integration: he uses dread to attack the self that is conscious, and guilt to menace the self of which it is conscious (to use a formula of Richard Ellman and Charles Feidelson). Dread, therefore, siphons and gets us lost within the work; guilt recoils from the work, as from a predator, forcing, as it does, the realization that we have been hoaxed. This physically inward as opposed to the socially outward drive of a Kienholz tableau is also a correlation of the general condition under which they operate, as compared with the particularities of their format.

At such a point, one might easily consider the product hopelessly disjunctive as a work of art, were it not for a third, all-pervasive, and all-unifying ingredient, revulsion. To be sure, dread and guilt are already concomitants of a certain revulsion but, if so, they may be only mental or emotional. Kienholz generously sees to it that the mental and emotional tie in with the sensory. With inspired nastiness, he accomplishes this mainly through tactility, manipulated as if by diabolical genius. Not only are his textiles stained, filthy, dried out, pillled or unravelled, but his woods and metals and plastics are heat cracked, rusted and shellacked, as if by some unspeakable sexual mucilage. If, at

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ ANATOMY OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT by Smith Simpson (Houghton Mifflin, $5.95) $4.75
- ☐ FAMINE 1975! America's Decision: Who Will Survive? by William and Paul Paddock (Little, Brown, & Co., $6.50) $5.20
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.55
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ PRISON NOTES by Barbara Deming (Grossman, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95
- ☐ THE NEW RADICALISM by Christopher Lasch (Knopf, $6.95) $5.55

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

1-1-68

times, his objects are coated by a velvety flock, it only connotes dust, or the insides of caskets. But sweaty, rancid or spilled-on surfaces are also the obverse of the stingy, tasteless, synthetic items that once, and still, Kienholz claims, clutter the piggishly littered American interior. Dread is the dream mold of the Kienholz tableau; guilt constitutes its social impact. But revulsion is the motor of its form, not merely the third but the most tangible of his trinity of values. To uphold it, he must forsake any sympathy a spectator might conceivably extend to his vision; and to mobilize it, he must make the objects themselves the target of his rage.

Still and all, the actual experience of these works provides a spectacle problematic in quite another direction: the theatrical. They have the poetics of true scenarios: each, in fact, may be called a situation tragedy. Even the barest of them, "The State (Mental?) Hospital," narrates the "story" of a naked old man, chained to a cot, dying perhaps, and (as Kienholz himself has remarked), getting socked occasionally by a bar of soap wrapped in a towel so it won't show bruises. The latter might be called secondary information, not as visible but on a level with the notes, inscriptions and newspaper clippings planted in the tableaux as fragments of a plot. Kienholz is like a stage designer run amok, dispensing everything with actors because things tell about the human presence so much more truly and ghoulishly than does action itself. Indeed, in a crucial area, the faces of his people, he articulates by absence: the inmates of "Barney's" have clocks for features (the time, 10:10, provides symbolic eyebrows); the head of the old woman in "The Wait" is a deer skull, and the old man in "The State Hospital" has an aquarium for a head, two black fishes fitfully appearing and disappearing in its murky bowl. It is often said that all these creatures are waiting, "killing" time. Their consciousness of it is either mechanistic or animalistic, but in either case ebbing, or already ebbd.

Like a playwright, and unlike a visual artist, Kienholz applies himself to exploring what is happening in a character's mind. But his means of indicating it are blatantly visual. With naive brilliance, he intrudes one diagrammatic, outsized element, so that it dominates the naturalistic minutiae, and, once seen, makes the composition impossible to imagine—a mere chaos of aggregated miscellany—without it. The old man, for instance, is doubled, he on the upper bunk, haloed by a neon-rimmed cartoon balloon, being only the despairing future of the identical thinker beneath. The lovers in "While Sugar Plums, . . ." etc., have brighter, but more perverse visions of themselves, visible through peepholes located in the gigantic, pink pseudopods terminating their crossed, craning necks. And, with a flourish worthy of Artaud, Kienholz lets explode from a gray-flocked pregnant belly in "Birth-day" a host of giant curving plastic arrows that locates all life in a crazed viscera. These monstrous devices are, of course, the most "expressive" features of the Kienholz ménage, partially because they violate his naturalism, and partially, also, because they enhance it. At the same time that they constitute his most daring liberties—so close in spirit to the obscene metaphors in the last section of Van Italie's America Hurrah—they are also the most plausible rendering of the cruelty that is his theme. Nothing could be more dramatic, compositionally, and yet nothing could be more effective in showing the triumph of an inner over a material reality. To the dread, guilt and revulsion that already characterize his tableaux, all of them designed to jolt the spectator "out of himself," Kienholz scarcely root for Hickock, that leaves Perry to play the good guy. I'm not sure that I fancy spending two and a quarter hours in cinema America only to end up feeling empathy for an aspirin-chewing enigma who is nice to kids and fires off shotguns in the faces of his tied-up victims. Scott Wilson as Hickock and Robert Blake as . . . as graphically by spasms, and ripples move out interrupted by weeds.

*The lake enormous and calm;
a stone falls;
for an hour the surface moves, holding to itself the frail* *shudders of its skin. Stones on the dark bottom make the lake calm,

the life worth living.*

DONALD HALL

adds elements that anchor him to the individual fate of the created personages.

This last brings up the curious question of the historicity of Kienholz's art, for most of what he shows has occurred in a specific American past: the 1940s—that is, his own West Coast adolescence. It is obvious that he takes a venomous rather than a sentimental view of his nostalgia, that he is almost wreaking vengeance upon the past. But that past—with all its lascivious and hysterical alarms—exists in him still, a cargo which must be disburdened, exorcized. Yet, from an artistic point of view, if it is no accident that his diagrammatic metaphors give to his works their canceled explicitness, his recall lends them their predated durability. It is not style so much at the core of the current thirties revival in painting that intrigues him, but psychosis, stiffened by the violence and war of the forties, that obsesses him. The inverted moralism of his procedure is nothing but the reverse of the promiscuity of the current scene. For that, if for none of his other repellent strategies, New York has not forgiven this Los Angeles artist. (And even the Los Angeles County Museum has not allowed its curator to feature Kienholz at the Venice Biennale, although he was invited to do so.) Horace Walpole once said that the man who feels will tend to view life as a tragedy; the man who thinks will see it as a comedy. Kienholz, in the end, is a thinking man; but, with final contradiction, his perspective on life is endlessly tragic.

For an installation that is as intimate and domestic as it is subtle and discreet, Walter Hopps, the Gallery of Modern Art's new director, is to be commended without reserve.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 11 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

1-1-68

113 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1230

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 How some cheat a little with their candy rations? (5)
- 4 An infant with an oil emulsion from the old country? (9)
- 9 See 27 down
- 10 The one 27 and 9 was responsible for was not the Farmer's. (7)
- 11 and 12 It might confirm the expectancy of what we're going to catch. (4,5)
- 13 What is silence in Hamlet's last words could also be in music. (4)
- 16 Nothing paid for, it might be conceded!
- 17 Goes to great lengths. (7)
- 19 Captivate a strong inclination, if quiet at first. (7)
- 22 One of the floating population. (7)
- 24 and 26 Sounding like an extra dividend to the crooner? (8)
- 29 The devil to pay, sooner or later? That's what might be implied by the irreverent.
- 30 A risk to take into consideration, if the vehicles are upset. (7)
- 31 and 25 across A revolutionary leader to figure the islands out? (6,3,5)
- 32 This little one has to undergo metamorphosis. (5)

DOWN:

- 1 Very good for the initial price! (5,4)
- 2 and 24 down What gamblers try to make with two fives, or a six and four? (This five is only half.) (7,5)
- 3 Made into cheese. (4)

- 4 and 28 down Is the lady so bound to be both physical and spiritual? (4,3,4)
- 5 Such letters have tangible points. (7)
- 6 No shape to put up with! (4)
- 7 The right material obviously makes the girl sharp-looking. (7)
- 8 The race results in a tie, it seems. (5)
- 14 Tea, not too strong, with a little twist?
- 15 Comic take-off? (5)
- 18 The sort of gulfweed found with Spanish town. (9)
- 20 Draw into the fold, but not regularly. (7)
- 21 Tied up with what Teddy busted, it might seem. (7)
- 22 Foxglove is taken off some computer's description. (7)
- 23 More like thieves, by comparison? (7)
- 24 See 2 down
- 27 and 9 across As a writer, he didn't live up to his name at first! (4,7)
- 28 See 4 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1229

ACROSS: 1 Bowdlerize; 6 Jamb; 10 Canteen; 12 Measures; 13 Alarm; 15 Ensur; 17 Embitters; 19 Turned out; 21 Dirge; 23 Ready; 24 Prestige; 27 Attract; 28 Crueler; 30 Hoopskirts. DOWN: 1 and 11 across Back numbers; 2 and 25 Wonder-struck; 3 Leeds; 4 and 29 Run true to form; 5 Zones; 7 Average; 8 Bushmaster; 9 Imparted; 14 Better half; 16 Everyman; 18 Buttercup; 20 Realtor; 22 Regular; 24 Patio; 26 Arms.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

A CREATIVE NEW PUBLISHING IDEA

A Subsidy Based Arrangement at Approximately 1/3 the Normal Cost. Selective Lists — Limited Editions — Regional Promotion. Distinguished Paperbound Editions: The Red Robin Series, by:

WILLIAM MURRAY, Publishers
Americus Georgia 31709

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)

"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

McCarthy in '68, Reagan & Lassie in '68, Johnson for Ex-President RFK in '68, Dump Johnson in '68, Kill for Peace king-size bumper strips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802, Chicago, Illinois 60690

PHYSICIAN AND LAYMAN wanted to select war-injured children for evacuation to U.S. for surgery. Minimum 6 months each. Adequate stipend. Contact Mrs. Smith, Committee of Responsibility, 60 Madison Avenue, N.Y. (212) 889-4210.

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D. Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

WE HAVE BEEN BETRAYED—Our '64 vote was for Peace—Impeach Johnson, recall war supporters; also HOFFA FOR PRESIDENT and WASH OUT WASHINGTON on 6" ruler and 1-1/4" wood discs. 12/$1, 100/$5 (circulars, balloons, bumper strips, telephone dialers, etc.). Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Election Year Special:

For a dime a week, join "the subscription list that reads like a who's who of Washington?"

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Controversy—not "consensus"—in articles like these...

"No more Nonsense About Ghetto Education!"
by Joseph Alsop.

"Nixon's Return, Engagement"
by Gilbert A. Harrison.

"What Ails America?"
by Hans Morgenthau.

"Hitched to LBJ?"
by The Editors.

"Walt Whitman Rostow"
by Alex Campbell.

"Limits of the New Left"
by Christopher Jencks.

"Freak-Out in Chicago"
by James Ridgeway.

"Who's to be Born?"
by Robert Coles.

"Harlow in Hell"
by Richard Gilman.

"Pooh as GOP Candidate"
by Henry Fairlie.

"Scar-Spangled Banner"
by Stanley Kauffmann.

Continuing Coverage of
the Drug Scene
by David Sanford.

"Albee at the Crossroads"
by Robert Brustein

...and regular features like these

■ TRB's weekly comment
on the Washington scene

■ Stanley Kauffmann
on films

■ Robert Brustein on drama

■ Osborn, Mauldin, and
Feiffer cartoons

Newsweek said it, describing New Republic readers. Describing The New Republic itself, Esquire said, "it can still be counted on for meaningful outrage." The New Republic gets talked about, even by other magazines.

We'll probably stir up more talk this election year. Seldom have we had so much to be outraged about.

New Republic readers know that from now through November they'll get fiercely independent, often angry, opinion on LBJ, Nixon, Bobby, Rocky, Barry, Ronnie, Romney, and company—opinion they can get nowhere else. And they'll get behind-the-scenes reporting of facts they can get nowhere else, too. (Esquire went on to say about us, "Their sources are excellent, credibility high.")

Since, frankly, we'd like as many voters as possible to get as mad as we are, we are making what could be called a meaningfully outrageous Election Year offer—48 issues of The New Republic at half the usual subscription price.

If you accept this offer, you'll be covered through election day and into the all-important post-mortems. And not only will you keep on top of the campaign, you'll keep on top of all the other meaningful things going on—in Vietnam, the Black Power movement, our cities... in what's left of the anti-poverty program... as well as in the world of books, films, plays, art, and music.

Our hope is that you'll get mad with us. But if you get mad at us, judging from what Newsweek said about our subscription list, you'll be in good company. Either way, there never was a better time to start getting mad at somebody—about something important.

1/2 PRICE:

ELECTION YEAR
SUBSCRIPTIONS
48 Issues—Just $5.00—
1/2 Regular Yearly Rate

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Subscription Dept., Box 623
381 West Center St., Marion, Ohio 43302

☐ O.K., New Republic, I'll join you this Election Year. Send the next 48 issues (a full year's subscription) for just $5.00 (1/2 the regular subscription price; ■ saving of $14.20 on the newsstand price).

☐ Let me first see what gets everybody so excited. Send the next 18 issues for just $2.00 (my check is enclosed).

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

UNMAKING A VILLAGE JONATHAN MIRSKY

THE NATION

JANUARY 8, 1968 35 cents

JAN 11 1968

San Francisco State

HOW TO WRECK A CAMPUS

DAVID SWANSTON

The Nettles of Prague JOHN DORNBERG

The Marchers of Tokyo ALBERT AXELBANK

Politics

Calculus for '68 ELDON KENWORTHY

When Did the Cold War Begin?
D. F. FLEMING

5-21-68R PLJ-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

green buttons

Westbury, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: On December 6, while participating in a Stop the Draft demonstration in New York, we were arrested. The charge was disorderly conduct. We pleaded not guilty. We had been standing on the sidewalk while demonstrators blocked traffic. The police charged in to break the mob and free the congested streets. Police herded small bunches of people in different directions. Contrary orders were shouted from unseen faces. We stood on the street—unable to move onto the sidewalk because of the police line behind us—hands with a monitor who was trying to direct people away from the congested area. Suddenly we heard shouts of "Arrest them! Arrest him!" We were grabbed by plain clothes men, wearing small green buttons. They shoved us against the wall, then pushed us into the paddy wagon. We were not shown any police identification until we reached the Center Street jail.

The apparent growing militancy in the peace movement has begun to divide its different factions. This apparent abandonment of nonviolence does not merely include provocative actions from the demonstrators but to an uncertain degree from police infiltrators. These plain-clothes men hide in the crowds disguised as businessmen, workmen, hippies and black nationalists. This was evident in New York during the recent Stop the Draft Week. As two arrested victims, we want to publicize our observations. The majority of the arrests were made not by uniformed policemen but by these plain-clothes men. . . .

We believe that these agents, in an effort to turn public opinion against the peace movement, are greatly responsible for the more violent nature of recent demonstrations. Their activities may not be restricted to instigating violence. Their infiltration may be rooted a deeply into the membership and even leadership of anti-war groups.

We urge you all to consider our observations before criticizing the new militancy of the peace movement.

Roger Mann
Margot Eastman

ring around a Lyndon

Willoughby Hills, O.

DEAR SIR: President Johnson at his news conference on Nov. 17 said that dissenters should count to ten. Here is one way that it could be done.

One, two three, four . . .

When are you going to stop the war?

Five, six, seven, eight . . .

Now is the time to negotiate!

Nine, ten, nine, ten . . .

Save the lives of American men!

Richard I. Briggs

the Chicago line

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: on Dec. 14, 1966, Jesse Lemisch, assistant professor of History at the University of Chicago and an occasional contributor to The Nation, received notice that his contract would not be renewed for a second three-year term. Two days later, Department Chairman William McNeil told Lemisch in explanation, "Your convictions interfered with your scholarship."

Lemisch's convictions were no secret. During a student

(Continued on page 62)

EDITORIALS

Best Congressmen of the Year

We have not made the award before, but The Nation's best-Congressmen-of-the-year awards for 1967 go to a Republican freshman, Donald W. Riegle, Jr., age 28, and to a Democratic sophomore, John Culver, age 35.

Instead of hiding his light under a bushel and letting his constituents in Flint, Mich., make allowances for his youth and inexperience, Riegle started right out doing things on his own. Like Secretary of Defense McNamara, he is a product of the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration.

Back in November, he wrote McNamara a letter on Vietnam in which he explained, "I have designed an information matrix to collect data that I believe is germane to the problem." As part of this project, he asked for a precise statement of the strategic importance of South Vietnam to the defense of Southeast Asia. After much persistence, he finally got this answer from Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard C. Stedman: "From a strictly military viewpoint, the United States does not require control of the land mass of South Vietnam to meet possible Communist aggression against countries with which we have treaty obligations."

Then he joined with Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.) in a resolution calling for formal Congressional debate on Vietnam alternatives. Later, with data obtained from his "information matrix," he subjected Rutherford M. Poats, deputy foreign aid administrator, to a brilliant four-hour cross-examination, which has to be read in its entirety (Congressional Record, September 19, 1967) to be fully appreciated. Here is a sample: Riegle: "You are saying in essence . . . if this war were conducted in a way that required greater economic sacrifice by certain elements in Vietnam, the political instability is such that the country might fly apart; is that right? Mr. Poats: Exactly."

More recently Riegle heard of a group of five distinguished scholars who, under the leadership of Dr. Alexander Eckstein, professor of economics and director of the Center for Chinese Studies at the University of Michigan, were attempting to work out a proposed solution to the war. Mr. Riegle promptly got in touch with them, arranged private financing so that the research team could visit Washington, and then organized a four-hour seminar for the benefit of nineteen of his colleagues, Democrats and Republicans. The papers which the five scholars presented, as well as their proposed plan for a solution of the conflict, appear in the Congressional Record, December 15, 1967, pp. H-17231-H-17238. For a freshman Representative, this shows commendable initiative and reveals a first-rate mind at work on difficult problems.

Rep. John Culver is a Democrat serving his second term from the 2nd Congressional District of Iowa. He graduated from Harvard cum laude, studied at Cambridge, served in the Marine Corps, graduated from Harvard Law School, assisted Sen. Edward Kennedy, and then was elected to the House. Somebody made the mistake of appointing him to the House Committee on Un-American Activities, where he has been a dissident member. Whenever a bill is reported out by the committee, Mr. Culver can be relied upon to file a sharp minority report.

HUAC's child, the Subversive Activities Control Board, a boondoggle of boondoggles (see "HUAC Under Siege," The Nation, September 11, 1967), has had nothing much to do since it was hamstrung by a series of court decisions. But it provided $25,000-a-year jobs for five "deserving" hacks, and Senator Dirksen managed to keep it alive by means of a tricky amendment. Culver made a fine speech against the measure, as amended, and mustered 104 votes against it on a roll call. In the Senate, after conference, the measure received three votes in favor to two opposed, and passed. Excitement was hardly at fever heat.

Culver's role as a critic of HUAC does not seem to offend the voters in his district, which is known as "anything but secure politically" for a Democrat. In 1964 his opponent used his criticism of HUAC measures against him, but Culver won by 8,400 votes. In 1966 his margin was 11,200.

With a few more young men like Riegle and Culver in Congress, voters might be less despairing of the political process.

Brass Alibi

It is a truism that no modern army is ever defeated in the field. By an accepted military convention, the heroic soldiers and the equally heroic generals, versed in strategic lore (which none but they can understand) are betrayed by faint-hearted civilians in the army's rear. Usually this theory is kept in abeyance until the army has been clobbered, but Gen. Earle G. Wheeler, our Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has come up with an anticipatory version of the old technique. Of course the American forces in Vietnam are in no danger of defeat in the sense that Ludendorff was in World War I, or Hitler in World War II. But Wheeler is under the necessity of explaining why, with unlimited air power and a splendidly equipped army of half a million men, his commanders in Vietnam are unable to crush a rabble of half-starved local guerrillas and a modest force of North Vietnamese regulars fighting at some distance from their base of supplies. So he comes up with this dictum: "The single most important factor in prolonging the war is Hanoi's calculation that there is a reasonable possibility of a change in U.S. policy before the ultimate collapse of the Vietcong manpower base and infrastructure." Because of this putative hope, he adds, "the major campaign of the war is being fought here in the United States. . . . We are winning the war in Vietnam, but Hanoi is still not ready to give up."

The shift of emphasis is interesting. The Vietcong manpower base and infrastructure is pretty nearly on its last legs, but Hanoi refuses to cry uncle. And Hanoi's recalcitrance is supported by anti-war sentiment in this country which, while constitutional and all that, involves a "responsibility to recognize and acknowledge what their [the critics'] dissent means."

There is only one way to interpret General Wheeler's

IN THIS ISSUE

January 8, 1968

EDITORIALS

34

ARTICLES

- 38 San Francisco State:
How To Wreck a Campus
David Swanston
- 41 The Marchers of Tokyo
Albert Axelbank
- 43 Crop Allotments:
Power Behind the Cotton
Peter Marcuse
- 46 Peace Politics:
Calculus for '68
Eldon Kenworthy
- 50 The Nettles of Prague
John Dornberg

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 53 When Did the Cold War Begin? D. F. Fleming
- 55 Unmaking a Village Jonathan Mirsky
- 56 Playing for People Harold Clurman
- 57 Nation Book Marks Alan Cheuse
- 59 Television John Horn
- 59 From a November Journal
(poem) Raymond Roseliep
- 60 Art Maurice Grosser
- 61 As I Come Home (poem) Harvey Shapiro
- 63 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, MICHAEL GOLDMAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. and additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: ■ is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 2

remarks. Delivered on the eve of a Presidential election, his speech had obvious political implications; it was a kind of statement that should never be delivered by a man in uniform, much less by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. Wheeler served notice on all prospective Presidential candidates (Democratic and Republican): Support LBJ and our boys in the combat zone or run the risk of being charged by the military with giving aid and comfort to the enemy—not perhaps in the legal sense of treason but bordering on it. He is turning the screws, particularly on those candidates who in good conscience, or in their interpretation of the national interest, might argue in favor of a negotiated peace in which neither side would be able to claim a clear-cut victory. Wheeler is in effect indicting not only Sen. Eugene McCarthy but also military men like Gen. David M. Shoup, who calls the notion that the Vietnamese War involves vital national interests “pure, unadulterated poppycock.” Before Wheeler goes any further in his remonstrance with Americans opposed to what Shoup calls “genocide on that poor little country,” he might try to deprive Shoup of his Medal of Honor. Between now and the first Tuesday in November, 1968, the Joint Chiefs should confine their public remarks to military matters.

Another Can of Worms

If we ever succeed in getting rid of our prize collection of leeches in Southeast Asia, Latin America may provide a worthy successor. All that is keeping it in second place now is an absence of largess on the scale of what we are disbursing to our eager allies in Vietnam.

The American-imposed solution for the civil strife that broke out in the Dominican Republic some three years ago was blazoned as a great triumph for our diplomacy, particularly for Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, now our proconsul in South Vietnam. But the Dominican solution appears to be coming apart. President Joaquin Balaguer has kept the economy functioning after a fashion with the aid of $300 million in U.S. assistance, but he is threatened with a renewed insurrection from the extreme Right, represented by Gen. Elias Wessin y Wessin, who ousted President Juan Bosch in 1963. Wessin is nominally an alternate delegate to the UN, but he lives in Miami, where he is engaged in forming a new party to regain power for his gang of reactionaries. Simultaneously, the leftist leader, Col. Francisco Caamano Deno, who at least has some attributes of a patriot and went voluntarily into exile as military attaché in London, has suddenly disappeared. Bosch, at present residing in Spain, suggests that Caamano “has gone somewhere to formulate his political ideology,” presumably to counter the rightist ambitions of Wessin.

As these storm clouds gather, the principal American manipulative agency in Latin America, the Organization of American States, is in its usual chaotic state—but this time worse than usual. José A. Mora, the retiring Secretary-General, has removed two OAS officials from their posts because of fiscal irregularities. The Pan American Union director in Buenos Aires was dismissed on a charge of misuse of funds which he received for the account of the Alliance for Progress; the official in San José, Costa Rica, was transferred to Washington following numerous overdrafts on his accounts. Although the OAS budget year ends on June 30, the annual audit for 1966-67 has not been published; Price, Waterhouse & Co., the accountants for the past eighteen years, have not been able to complete their audit because of “long-standing administrative confusion.” The OAS has also sent a representative to the Dominican Republic to investigate reports of irregularities there. The American taxpayer is ignorant of all such unpleasantness, but since the United States contributes most of the $25 million which supports the OAS bureaucracy year after year, Rep. Armistead I. Selden, Jr., chairman of the subcommittee on Latin America, is preparing to call witnesses to ascertain, if possible, what is going on.

The OAS is riven politically as well as financially. Secretary-General Mora has fired a high-ranking Dominican official of the OAS secretariat, Luis Raul Betances, who was accused of threatening the Dominican ambassador with dismissal and other reprisals unless the ambassador backed the Panamanian candidate, Eduardo Ritter Aislan, for the post of Secretary-General. The Panamanian has been in the lead, with Argentina, Brazil and the United States backing Galo Plaza Lasso of Ecuador, and Mexico washing its hands of the whole imbroglio by abstaining. To make matters still less seemly, Benjamin Welles reports in The New York Times that racist considerations have entered the internal contentions of the OAS, with the integrated Central-American-Caribbean bloc resenting the pure-blooded European stock of the “big boys”—Argentina and Brazil, which have close relations with the United States. Taking it all in all, it would seem that America’s ambition to run the tangled affairs of the world is faring no better in this hemisphere than in the other.

War and Taxes

In the Illinois Business Review Robert Eisner, professor of economics at Northwestern University, recalls that during the 1964 campaign (waged on a platform of “no wider war”) President Johnson extracted from Congress the “Gulf of Tonkin” resolution, which after his election he interpreted as authorization to expand the war to its present—and not necessarily final—dimensions. The powers of the Presidency being what they are, Mr. Johnson could have expanded the war in any case, but with the resolution in hand he virtually made Congress a partner in his military enterprise.

Professor Eisner sees a parallel between Mr. Johnson’s 1964 demand for an open-end authorization in Vietnam and his present demand for a tax increase. Those who favor further escalation in Vietnam may logically vote for the tax increase. Those who wish to dissuade the President from any further excesses he may harbor in that direction should oppose a tax increase.

The question is political, rather than economic. A year ago it was more economic than political. At that time Professor Eisner—and The Nation likewise—favored the tax increase. The reasoning was that since the war had been expanded, the cost should be borne by those who had acquiesced in the expansion, rather than be passed on to a later generation. A tax increase at that time would also have been a reminder to the American people that the agreeable formula—guns and butter in profusion—had its limits, and that if they didn't care to be presented with the bill they had better make their opposition to the war known to their Congressmen. To some extent, the people did just that—which is one factor in the refusal of Congress to do the President's bidding in the session just past.

But what about inflation? As a result of the $30 billion a year being squandered in Vietnam to kill, uproot and coerce its inhabitants, there has been considerable price inflation in the United States (and disastrous inflation in South Vietnam). Prices will continue to rise here in the months ahead, regardless of what is now done in the way of taxation. Curbing inflation now would require a fiscal policy so tight as to bring on a recession. Short of such drastic measures, the wartime expenditures to date must have their effects and we must endure them as best we can.

Another argument for a tax increase is that it would enable the federal government to spend more on domestic needs. With the doings of the past session of Congress on record, that assumption is naive. The political situation, in Eisner's estimation, "is such that it is inconceivable that there will be any major increase in expenditures to meet domestic needs so long as the war continues."

Eisner quotes Kenneth Boulding, president-elect of the American Economic Association: "A tax increase now would be the final abdication of Congress A determined stand against the tax increase is perhaps the last constitutional chance to resist the disastrous Presidential leadership to which we have been subjected." For another year, at least, we must put up with a President who has shown that he is as devious as he is headstrong. To open the purse strings for him still wider would be to compound folly.

As for the drain on the dollar, the answer is the same. If the Vietnamese War continues, the outflow of dollars will continue. If we wish to keep the dollar tied to gold at the present ratio, there is a clear remedy: end the senseless war in Vietnam, however greatly such a step may mortify Lyndon B. Johnson.

The Mercenaries

One of the dirtier features of our dirty war in Southeast Asia is our public relations pretense that we have staunch allies in our effort to force the North Vietnamese, in Secretary Rusk's immortal phrase, to "leave their neighbors alone." With the possible exception of Australia, which has some 6,500 troops in South Vietnam, and New Zealand, with a token force of 400, we have no allies in the proper sense of the word. We do not even have substantial contributors. The allegation that thirty-one nations have responded to our 1964 appeal for aid is just more State Department propaganda. Senator Fulbright has shown that thirteen of these purported sympathizers donated $26,000 or less from June, 1964, through December, 1966, while others have given nothing for a year or more. Still others are making money out of our Vietnamese embroilment. It adds up, in the words of a St. Louis Post-Dispatch editorial to the fact that "there is not a single country which on its own and out of its own resources, is helping the U.S. because it believes in the American cause. We have collected a miscellaneous assortment of mercenaries by arm-twisting and bribery as well as by outright payments."

Our chief supplier of mercenaries is South Korea, with 48,000 troops. The terms of our deal with the military oligarchy in Seoul are so generous that the Johnson Administration has covered them with a dubiously legal security classification, to forestall both adverse domestic reaction and possible demands from other "allies" for matching concessions. However, Richard Dudman of the Post-Dispatch has uncovered some features of the arrangement. Like the Philippines and Thailand, Korea provides the base pay for troops supplied to us; beyond that Uncle Sam picks up the tab, providing overseas pay, liability insurance, logistic support, subsistence and transportation. South Korea also benefits by U.S. purchases of supplies for the troops in that country, under arrangements that in most cases protect the bidders against competition. This is a further contribution to the fictitious South Korean "prosperity" that stems from American economic and military aid, including 50,000 U.S. troops stationed in South Korea fourteen years after the armistice and apparently for the indefinite future. Why this army could not be moved to South Vietnam and the 50,000 South Koreans be left at home to defend their own country, is another of those Pentagon-State Department mysteries, with only the public relations aspect as a possible explanation.

Another of our ardent but canny Asian allies is Thailand, governed like Korea by a military dictatorship. Not satisfied with the 2,200 Thai troops now stationed in South Vietnam (one never hears of them fighting) the Johnson Administration has arranged for a levy of 10,000 more. In return, on top of the existing flow of benefits from the United States, the Thais are to receive $50 million worth of Hawk surface-to-air missiles. Against what invading aircraft these weapons are to be used is not clear. Presumably the $1 billion of American installations in Thailand are capable of defending themselves. The approximately 1,700 insurgents in the north-east provinces of Thailand have no aircraft, and little enough of any other armament. Perhaps the trade of Hawks for mercenaries is a future element in the big push against Red China that may eventually grow out of Mr. Rusk's determination to teach the North Vietnamese neighborly manners.

Some aspects of these machinations are surveyed in an article by economist Eliot Janeway in the Washington Evening Star. It is an expensive deal, Mr. Janeway comments, despite our need for foreign-flag troops in Vietnam—especially yellow-skinned ones. Mr. Janeway suggests that the Thais may do no better under General Westmoreland than George III's Hessians did under General Cornwallis. The future will tell: all too clear in the present is "the way America's war-time dollar diplomacy is working. It is endowing countries in need for the most rudimentary infrastructure with the most advanced and expensive military superstructure. It is offering the primitive stratified societies of Asia irresistible incentives to forget the use of ploughshares and to make a business of trafficking in the weapons of war." Operations of this type in Southeast Asia, in the special form of trading materiel for men, makes a malignant war a little more malignant.

That LBJ Trip

Whatever else the President may be, he is the incurable, the quintessential Texan. He can do nothing in moderation. If he mourns, he mourns excessively; if he pleads, he descends to bathos; if he boasts, it is at the top of his voice, with arms flaying and fingers pointing. If he attempts understatement, the effect is so ludicrous as to be unbelievable. This is not meant unkindly: he cannot help being what he is. He is a larger-than-life Texan, and Texans, as everyone knows, are Ten Feet Tall and growing.

Consider his latest junket: 27,600 miles in 112 hours, in three aircraft—Air Force I; then a back-up plane, with emergency spares, used also to transport staff, communication experts and Secret Service agents (you can never tell about those Samoans); then a Pan-American press plane. And, for part of the trip, a fourth jet served as a cargo plane, and carried still more agents and the President's bubbletop limousine. By the President's standards, just a minor excursion, with minimum gear. As Air Force I rips through space, the President busily manages the news by making last-minute changes in the tape of his television interview, attends to various chores of state, and works out on the "exercycle" so that he will not have any idle moments in which he might just sit and think.

As stops are made, he busies himself with a variety of tasks: watches belly dancers, fire dancers and jungle drummers in Samoa; sets up shop in various hotels where he interviews visiting dignitaries "like a shop foreman interviewing job applicants"; mourns for the dead Prime Minister in Australia; twists Thieu's arm (not too painfully) in a man-to-man, Texas-style, confrontation; cheers up the boys in Thailand by making a speech at Korat at 5:30 A. M. in pitch darkness and, a little later, still another speech at Cam Ranh Bay; entertains President Ayub Kanh at Karachi, then off for Rome to talk peace with the Pope as he had talked war with Thieu, then more work-outs on the "exercycle," as showers of dispatches are sent here, there and yonder, and, finally, back at the White House for Christmas, then on to Texas—to which all Texans must return now and then to touch their mother earth and regain their giant strength.

Politicians must be all things to all people, but must they be all things to all people, all the time, all over the world, flying round trip, nonstop? What does the President think he is doing? Is he trying to make us believe, as The New York Times suggests, that he is pursuing all possible policies, simultaneously, all the time? And how does he see himself? As the all-time, all-Texas-Texan, just about the most lovable Old Boy that ever waded barefoot and starry-eyed in the Pedennales? Everyone knows, by this time, that Texans see themselves as sitting high in the saddle; the trouble is that others find it difficult to see them that way. So far as the President is concerned, this creates the basic credibility gap.

SAN FRANCISCO STATE

HOW TO WRECK A CAMPUS

DAVID SWANSTON

Mr. Swanston is a reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle on the Berkeley campus of the University of California.

San Francisco

For five years, San Francisco State College squatted on the cold foggy edge of the city and quietly found answers to the problems of student unrest. The college created an exemplary free speech policy in 1962, appointed students to campus committees, supported a student-run "experimental college" and, when students protested against Dow and military recruiters on campus early last fall, sponsored a five-day series of convocations to discuss the college and the war. (See "The War on Campus," a special issue of The Nation, December 18.)

Three weeks ago, San Francisco State ran out of answers. A "mill-in," called to protest, among other things, the suspension of four Negro students, turned into an afternoon of violence and vandalism that closed the college and shook the campus to the core of its hang-loose ethic. White activists smashed into the college administration building, broke windows and scribbled on the walls. Negroes from off campus started fires in the bookstore and tossed rocks and heavy pots through the windows. Others roughed up white students and looted the college dining hall.

The violence was the most dramatic chapter in a series of events that began just after fall classes opened at the 18,000-student commuter college that is part of California's giant State College System. White radicals—about 100 activists from SDS and the Young Socialist Alliance—became increasingly militant and directed their energies almost entirely toward the campus. But although the activists were demanding and their techniques troublesome, SF State's administrators were able to deal with the white radicals with a large degree of success.

However, another element that had formed on campus presented SF State's administrators with an entirely new set of problems. A militant faction, about 100 of the school's 400 Negroes, banded together for a fiery program of "black consciousness" and "third revolution" that included weeding out "racism" within the college. The group, the Black Students Union, preached Black Power, tutored black ghetto children, and openly discussed violence as a revolutionary tactic.

In early November, a dozen Negroes, most of them members of the BSU, walked into the office of the campus newspaper, attacked its student editor, fought with a part-time journalism instructor, scattered equipment around the city room, and left.

The next day warrants were issued for nine students, and in less than a week they surrendered to police and were given interim suspensions by college president, John Summerskill. A quickly created Board of Appeal and Review later recommended that only four be suspended and letters of warning be sent to the other five. Summerskill accepted the board's recommendation.

Several explanations of the attack have been advanced. The four most widely held are these:

Student reporters on the paper believe the attack came because of a column written last spring by the editor, who was then sports editor, calling Muhammad Ali a "clown." The reporters note that the paper, the Daily Gater, was running a series very complimentary to the BSU at the time of the attack, and say that nothing the paper published in the fall term would have outraged the black students.

Jimmy Garrett, a BSU leader who in 1965 was instrumental in changing the group's name from the Negro Student Association, told students at the University of California at Berkeley the day after the attack that outbursts of violence by black people were "political acts." Garrett, a 24-year-old former SNCC organizer, was in the curious position of trying to explain the attack as a revolutionary tactic, while denying that the BSU had anything to do with it. In any case, he has declined to discuss his theory at length.

Willie Brown, state Assemblyman from San Francisco and attorney for the students, reportedly told Summerskill that the attack took place after the editor made derisive comments about the Negroes who were in his office.

And several professors believe the attack grew from the general feeling of frustration of being a black person in the United States. The Negro students lashed out at the college society, the professors explain, because it is the closest target, though perhaps not the most oppressive.

Whatever the cause of the attack on the Gater's staff and office, the violence began a series of events that ended with a major campus disturbance. The attack was generally agreed to be a tactical, if not a moral, error. Summerskill compounded the error by issuing the interim suspensions without the slightest hint of due process. And the editor, who was hospitalized overnight, added to the fiasco by writing to the Carnegie Foundation, urging it to withhold funds from several BSU programs—including an extensive tutorial project—and vowing to get the group "kicked off campus."

The incident in the Gater office and the ensuing suspensions and legal action would probably not in themselves have been enough to foment a major disturbance on campus. However, as Summerskill hassled with the BSU problem, Open Process, the campus underground weekly (financed with funds collected from the entire student body), published a poem on masturbation by Jefferson Poland, founder of the Sexual Freedom League.

The poem enraged Summerskill. Last spring, he had suspended the paper after a series of escapades that included a full-length photo of a completely nude young woman, and several spicy articles by Poland. Summer-skill agreed to let Open Process resume publication only after the editors promised to keep sex out of the arty tabloid. When Poland's poem appeared, Summerskill suspended the paper, its editor and Poland—again without any regard for due process.

But this time the San Francisco American Civil Liberties Union became involved, threatening court action if the suspensions weren't lifted, and the campus white radicals moved to support the two fallen journalists. Several hundred were massed outside Summerskill's office ready to demonstrate, when the young president walked out, took their microphone and announced that he had made a mistake and would reinstate the two students immediately and call for a hearing before the student-faculty Board of Appeals.

But, by readmitting the two journalists, Summerskill enraged the BSU and the campus white radicals. The reason: The two students who were readmitted were white; the four black students were not readmitted. This meant, as the BSU and the radicals reasoned it, that Summerskill was a racist. The activists did not note that there had been no great protest when the Negroes were suspended nor did they mention that the suspensions of the four had ultimately been recommended by the Board of Appeals. They took no account of the fact that violence had been a component of the first case, but not of the second, that in suspending the four, Summerskill had been meeting a clear and present danger of further physical attack.

Student militants formed a Movement against Political Suspensions—named after a Berkeley group organized to fight the suspension of two activists for Stop the Draft Week activities—and began planning a “mill-in,” again copied from a tactic recently used at Berkeley, when students walked into office buildings, sat on desks, filled offices and closed halls, stopping work in the buildings.

But the SF State students took on only the trappings of the UC demonstrations and made two serious errors that Berkeley activists take great pains to avoid: The SF State demonstration was launched with practically no broad base of support on the campus, and off-campus demonstrators—who could not be controlled by protest leaders—were invited to join.

On the morning of the mill-in, the campus paper predicted possible snipers, and supporters from San Jose State and UC Berkeley, as well as about 100 young Negroes from Oakland and San Francisco, poured onto campus; the college closed and locked the administration building. After a series of speeches, Garrett told the several hundred demonstrators gathered outside the administration building: “We’re going to close this place down now and tomorrow. Do you dig? The school is closed. You’ve got your assignments.”

Indeed they had. Groups of young black activists roamed through campus classroom buildings, interrupting classes and demanding to be allowed to lecture on the “real history of America.” Professors responded by canceling classes.

At about the same time, white radicals smashed the glass doors of the administration building, pushed their way in and roamed the halls, writing slogans on the walls and breaking windows.

After an hour, college officials announced that all classes had been canceled and asked the demonstrators to leave the building. They did. It was argued that there had been no need to enter the building, since the goal of the mill-in—to make the building inoperable—had been accomplished.

As the activists left the administration building, several thousand students poured out of the classrooms—their classes canceled—and the campus filled with curious, confused people. The clatter of shattering glass brought a crowd to the campus bookstore. Some eight Negroes, none of them SF State students, had broken the front windows and set fire to a card rack.

Suddenly, the angry young blacks turned on the crowd of students and news cameramen and drove them across campus, throwing rocks and swinging sticks. A few minutes later they left.

As the campus exploded, Summerskill, a 42-year-old psychologist who had marched in the April 15th demonstration against the war, met with his top aides and with representatives of the San Francisco Police Department. The main question: Should squads of uniformed police be called to put down the violence?

A strong argument was made for letting the demonstration run its course. Bringing police on campus also brings hundreds of students out in protest and the police—not the incident that brought them—become the issue. Several weeks earlier, the president of San Jose State College had called in the police and a noisy, but relatively harmless, demonstration turned into a near riot. The situation was bad, but Summerskill and the police officials agreed that calling in the police would only make it worse.

The violence in the bookstore and the dining hall—where young Negroes helped themselves to food and roughed up some white cafeteria workers—was probably not planned, but developed as the youths discovered that they were safe from police action. A group of hippies used the one-day immunity to sit in a circle on the wet grass, smoke marijuana and sing All You Need Is Love.

About four hours after it started, the violence ended. More than a dozen windows were broken and five students were injured—none seriously. Summerskill emerged from his office and announced: “I am grateful that a major human disaster has been averted.”

But not everyone saw it that way. Hardly had the last sliver of glass ceased to tinkle on the SF State sidewalk when California politicians began to howl. Lt. Gov. Robert Finch said “violence cannot be tolerated.” State College Chancellor Glenn Dumke, a former president of SF State, said he was “deeply shocked.” Superintendent of Public Schools, Max Rafferty, said he would “like to go into those buildings and bounce those people out like ping-pong balls. And Assembly Speaker Jesse M. Unruh called for an investigation, adding that he was “inclined to think” Summerskill should be fired.

(Of all the outcries against Summerskill’s methods of handling the situation, Democrat Unruh’s was the most surprising. However, Unruh’s anger takes on a little more logic in this context: He plans to use support for higher education as one of his key weapons against the Reagan administration. But with each demonstration and each campus uprising, Unruh sees public sympathy swinging from his position to Reagan’s.)

The trustees of the eighteen California State Colleges held an emergency meeting in Los Angeles to discuss the SF State violence and to consider sacking Summerskill. Faculty members, San Francisco police and SF State students defended the president and he wasn’t fired. However, the trustees voted to conduct a sixty-day study of his “stewardship of the campus” and passed resolutions that will eventually remove from college presidents the sole authority to call police on campus, and make suspension mandatory for demonstrators who use or threaten to use violence. SF State’s faculty and, to a large extent, its students closed ranks behind Summerskill to defend the college from the trustees and politicians, but the crisis at SF State is far from settled.

The student legislature approved the appointment of Garrett as the student member of the academic senate, but the senate turned down (18 to 14) a resolution recommending that the suspensions of the four Negro students be rescinded. The faculty agreed to strike if necessary to support campus autonomy, but many professors were privately annoyed with Summerskill for spending endless hours in discussion sessions with student activists, while ignoring the faculty almost completely. And, although there were rumors that moderates were taking over within the BSU, the Negro activists called a press conference, labeled the academic senate racist, and announced that their chairman, suspended from school, was still in charge of the organization.

The obvious question: Why is San Francisco State, with its tradition of student freedom, its liberal president who is generally sympathetic to student causes, and its innovative educational atmosphere, destroying itself?

One reason is that SF State has made almost as little progress in finding solutions to the dilemma facing the black man in white America as has the country as a whole. And, since nearly all of the students at SF State live and work off campus and cannot, therefore, tuck themselves away in the never-never land of academia, the crisis of America is a very real crisis on that campus.

Black students are frustrated in their efforts to make real changes; they then become more militant and stimulate a collegiate backlash. (Campus athletes met to form a "protective association" the day after the violence.) The more whites are moved by fear and anger, the more difficult they make it for the blacks to accomplish anything and the more militant the blacks become. It's a grim circle.

Another reason for the trouble at SF State is that student leadership, which played a large role in making the college what it is, has left campus. Student government leaders who created the nationally known Experimental College and Community Involvement Program have graduated or transferred to other schools. And leaders of the student Left have disappeared into academia, dropped out, or joined national or regional peace, political or civil rights organizations.

What's left is a student government split between the radical Right and radical Left, and a group of inexperienced student activists who envision a revolution composed largely of slogans, titles and broken glass doors.

San Francisco State may well be a preview of what is in store for hundreds of colleges across the country. The city of San Francisco has no monopoly on angry, frustrated Negroes who have a rock, a book of matches and nothing to lose. The Bay Area isn't unique in its militant, discouraged young activists who have seen years of peaceful protest accomplish nothing. And California isn't the only state governed by frightened, confused lawmakers who believe stronger laws, more police and a good dose of The American Way will cure the sickness of today's society.

THE MARCHERS OF TOKYO

ALBERT AXELBANK

Mr. Axelbank, a resident of Japan since 1959, has written for the AP, UPI and The New York Times. He reports regularly for newspapers and periodicals in North America, Europe and Asia.

If the 1960s in America may be dubbed a "Decade of Rising Dissent," the same period in Japan will very likely be reckoned a "Decade of Mass Demonstrations." In Japan, the present decade was born amidst rousing, nation-wide demonstrations ("demos" to the Japanese) against the military link with the United States; and it will probably expire with giant street protests against prolongation of the controversial pact beyond 1970. The Japanese are the undisputed world's champion at demonstrating. Since the late 1950s, I've observed perhaps 300 political demos of one sort or another in Japan, plus a few in South Korea and Okinawa. Lately, I've witnessed anti-war protest marches in America and Canada. Those in America seem to have had feeble results, whereas the Japanese demos, generally speaking, have yielded remarkable success. Their weight has been—and still is—keenly felt in politics.

The Japanese demonstrate periodically against America's involvement in Vietnam and also against the presence of U.S. military bases in Japan. (There are about 150 American military installations of all kinds in Japan. A fact little known is that U.S. bases in Japan are, by and large, "forward bases," inasmuch as American military jet planes and warships often proceed nonstop from Japan to the fighting front.) These demos are much more frequent than one would gather from reading the American press, whose bare-bones coverage of Japan is—between major news events—limited to the occasional disaster or curiosity. (A recent story from Japan, prominently displayed in many U.S. papers, concerned the efficacy of massage on sexual behavior. Another, syndicated from coast to coast, describes how Japanese celebrate Christmas.)

What thoughtful Japanese fear is that sooner or later the Washington-Tokyo military alliance will directly ensnare Japan in a war with neighboring China. Increasingly, Congressmen, scholars, diplomats and journalists warn that the United States is itself drifting toward such a disaster. Dean Rusk speaks in sober tones of the "slippery slope to World War Three"; America's former ambassador to Japan, Dr. Edwin Reischauer, who showed that a very able scholar can make a very able diplomat, agrees: "Many Japanese look upon the security treaty with Washington as more a liability than a guarantee against aggression."

Not all Japanese, naturally, react to external and internal problems in the same way. A minority chooses to withdraw from society, a few even embracing nihilism as an expression of their disgust with politics. But the vast majority—literate, well informed and cogitative by habit—wishes to express its views or to see them actively promoted by a responsible political party.

The massive 1960 demos did not succeed in blocking revision of the security pact with the United States; they did bring down a government. Because the CIA warned that if Dwight Eisenhower came to Japan he would probably be assassinated, the President canceled his scheduled visit. Significantly, the popular resentment against the hawkish Prime Minister, Nobusuke Kishi, whom the Allies branded a "Class A War Criminal" at the Far East War Crimes Tribunal, caused the ruling conservative party to replace him with a moderate. This change led to conciliatory gestures toward Peking, epitomized by an agreement to exchange trade missions and journalists.

Japan has a parliamentary rather than a Presidential fixed-term system. Thus it appears easier to bring down a government in Japan than to dislodge an American President and his Cabinet. But public disaffection with Japanese ruling party politics has also been significantly registered at the polls. It may perhaps be said that the cumulative effect of the protest movement in Japan, combined with active politicking by liberal intellectuals, produced in 1967 the election of the first "progressive" governor of Tokyo, which with nearly 12 million people is the largest megalopolis in the world. The victor, Ryokichi Minobe, an economist and scholar, won with the support of Socialists, Communists, students and intellectuals, housewives and trade union members. Tokyo, incidentally, is the center of the protest movement in Japan.

The Japanese public is assuredly the best-informed public about both sides of the war in Vietnam. More Japanese journalists and cameramen have gone behind Vietcong lines and visited Hanoi than have those of any other nationality. The spectacular action shots of aerial combat in Felix Greene's film Inside North Vietnam were taken by Japanese cameramen. Moreover, some Japanese businessmen make frequent trips to Hanoi and record their impressions for magazines and newspapers. Such eyewitness reports about the Vietcong and North Vietnam engender sympathy for the underdog, and fill the people with loathing for America's role. The anti-war demos in Japan have become more vehement as the United States has escalated its attack.

In response to a rising public protest against the bombing of North Vietnam (Asahi Shimbun, a leading daily, said 75 per cent of the people in Japan oppose the bombing), the Japanese Government decided to dispatch, on separate occasions, two "peace emissaries" to South-east Asia and other parts of the world to learn the truth about the Vietnamese War and world public opinion. Unlike Washington's "peace envoys," the two Japanese diplomats were experts on Indo-Chinese politics. They were chosen also for their objectivity. What they announced after their lengthy investigations was that (1) basically, a civil war is raging in South Vietnam; and (2) the Saigon government is a creation of the State Department. The two gentlemen were then given polite reprimands by their government.

By this time, the people of Japan were in a mood for teach-ins about the Vietnamese War, and also for films about the expanding slaughter. Barbarous acts by Saigon government forces were shown on Japanese TV. Some newsmen reported that one U.S. general, arriving in South Vietnam, said in his first speech to his soldiers: "I want you to get out there and kill, kill, kill!"

The Japanese demonstrations accelerated. Subsequently, it became impossible for the U.S. ambassador, or the Vice President, or the Secretary of State or his assistants, or Presidential adviser Walt Rostow—when they visited Japan—to speak at the nation's leading colleges and universities. The students have refused to listen to the rationale or justifications for a policy in Vietnam which they consider indefensible. And, upon arrival in Japan, any one of these Americans can trigger almost instantaneous "Yankee Go Home!" demonstrations. Lending support to the position of the students, and to the whole anti-war movement in Japan, has been the virtual about-face made by Ambassador Reischauer, after he gave up diplomacy for the purer air of Harvard. The once lukewarm defender of Washington's Asian policies has become an outspoken critic.

Demonstrations against U.S. nuclear-powered submarines greeted Prime Minister Eisaku Sato a few days after he took office in November, 1964. Bigger demos erupted a year later when Sato visited Okinawa. These demos, demanding return of Okinawa to Japan, actually forced Sato to spend the night at a U.S. military barracks rather than at his hotel. When the first American atom-powered sub entered the port of Sasebo, southern Japan, students, trade union members, Socialist members of parliament and professional people staged a demo outside the front gates of the U.S. naval base.

These demos (many others took place against other subs) reportedly set back the U.S. military "timetable" for Japan. Washington apparently delayed by perhaps a year the announcement that it would send the nuclear-fueled aircraft carrier, Enterprise, to Japan. The "Big E" is likely to visit Japan early in 1968 and will, doubtless, be met by demonstrations.

Two demonstrations in Japan have had singularly effective results. One, which continued for several weeks, compelled the signing of an agreement whereby the government permitted Koreans in Japan to be repatriated to North Korea. The other forced the removal of American U-2 "spy" planes from Japan.

New York's "Stop-the-Draft-Week" demonstrations, early in December, were pronounced a "failure" by various quarters. The week of protest was billed in advance as having great importance, but less than 2,500 students turned out. Few nonstudents joined, few Negroes, no labor leaders, almost no public figures. Dr. Benjamin Spock, who takes his politics as seriously as he does his pediatrics, was a notable exception. He said many of his colleagues heartily agree with his detestation of America's role in Vietnam. Yet he came to Battery Park alone. New York's Robert Kennedy, who volubly dissents from Washington's Vietnamese policy on the Senate floor, didn't come. The grievances of the anti-war, anti-draft demonstrators are shared by Senators Fulbright, Kennedy, Mansfield, McCarthy, Gruening, et al., but these men have shunned public anti-war demonstrations. To hear these Senators talk today about the Johnsonian foreign policy is to listen to prophets of gloom.

Such lack of support is rare in Japan, where they take demonstrations seriously. Politicians, educators, intellectuals, labor leaders and housewives often link arms and march at the head of demos. Banners and signs are carefully constructed, some as big as 10 feet wide. In New York, many anti-war posters were smaller than a handkerchief.

Demonstrations in New York and elsewhere in the United States suffer from another handicap: the press is more hostile than sympathetic. I saw other problems. For instance, when a protest march in New York was halted temporarily, the leader, described by the press as "a willowy blonde," gave the marchers several alternatives, then asked: "Now what shall we do?" A rift in the ranks occurred and the protest became skeletonized.

In his December 12 address at Miami Beach to the AFL-CIO convention, President Johnson intimated that the United States is waging war to protect democratic freedoms and the right of the people of South Vietnam to determine their own destiny. This, say Dean Rusk and Walt Rostow, is what the war is all about. A few months ago in Tokyo I asked Foreign Minister Tran Van Do of South Vietnam whether Ho Chi Minh is very popular in the South. "Oh yes," he said. "Everybody knows him." And: "He's considered a hero for leading the Vietnamese people to victory against the French." Not surprisingly, sociologist-economist Gunnar Myrdal says that the American public can nowadays be convinced of almost anything by the Administration. America, says, Myrdal, is an "unenlightened nation."

CROP ALLOTMENTS

POWER BEHIND THE COTTON

PETER MARCUSE

Mr. Marcuse, a lawyer practicing in Waterbury, Conn., has been South a number of times for the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee. He is chairman of the Waterbury Anti-Poverty Board and co-author of Equality (Pantheon).

In the Deep South, where cotton is king, those who control cotton allocations are the power behind the throne. Black Power there would mean a Negro county office manager of the United States Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) more than it would mean a Negro sheriff or registrar. The effort of Negroes to obtain a role in the administration of federal agricultural programs proportionate to their numbers is as much a matter of elementary justice, if not of survival, as the effort to gain the ballot. A series of recent attempts, including a major lawsuit, designed to increase Negro participation in agricultural affairs, has involved almost every Negro and civil rights organization that is active among the tenant farmers and sharecroppers of Alabama and Mississippi.

Not many people besides the professionals know exactly what the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service of the United States Department of Agriculture is, though its jurisdiction covers the livelihood of most farmers in the South. Although Negro farmers in Mississippi and Alabama can hardly be categorized as professional, they are becoming increasingly aware of its importance to them: 92 per cent of Negro farmers in the South are engaged in growing those crops (cotton, tobacco and peanuts) for which permissible acreage allotments are established under ASCS. Cotton, in particular, cannot be grown in the United States for profitable sale on the private market; it has been conceded for decades that cotton farmers must have government price subsidy to survive. Participation in government subsidy programs is limited to those who agree to restrict the acreage they plant, and the ASCS determines how many acres each farmer will be allowed.

Generally, the ASCS is responsible for the administration of all federal crop allotment and price support programs, and in many Alabama counties the funds disbursed by the various offices of the ASCS are so large as to dwarf county government operations. Although Negroes may in many cases receive a proportionate share of the allocations requested by them as compared with white requests, the actual amounts received have not contributed to an improvement in their economic position. Yet that improvement was one of the purposes of the program, according to a 1965 study by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

The ASCS has a rather simple policy-making structure. Each community (township, village) elects a community committee (generally three regular members and two alternates); all the community committees in a given county meet together once a year to elect a county committee (again generally three regulars and two alternates). Over the county committee is a state committee, of ten or so members, appointed directly by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The county committee is the key administrative organ in the ASCS, the function of the community committees being primarily to elect the county committee. Decisions at the county level affect the size of a farmer's allotment, adjust program benefits between landlords and tenants, and act on the appeals of farmers objecting to cuts in allotments. The county committee also hires the county staff whose salaries, along with the cost of operating the county office, are financed entirely by federal funds. The state ASCS committee, appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, supervises county committees and regulates elections of community and county committees.

In the spring of 1964, there were twelve members on the Mississippi state committee of the ASCS in the state of Mississippi and ten on the Alabama committee. Not a single one of them was Negro. There was an elected ASCS county committee in every one of Mississippi's eighty-two counties and in every one of Alabama's sixty-seven counties, or a total of 745 ASCS county committeemen in these two states; not a single one was Negro. Each county committee was in turn elected by a group of community committee delegates—in the two states, a total of more than 3,000 community committeemen. In the spring of 1964 not one was Negro. It would be belaboring the obvious to point out that no county office manager, the key local administrative officer of the program, was a Negro in the two states, and that no executive, administrative, clerical, or policy-making person of any nature anywhere in the whole structure of the ASCS in the two states was other than white.

Even worse, in a sense, is the situation on ASCS state committees, which are appointed directly by the Secretary of Agriculture. Until January, 1965, no Negro had been appointed by the Secretary to any state ASCS committee in the South. Since then, one has been appointed in Arkansas, one in Maryland and one in Mississippi. There was, through 1966, no Negro serving on the state committee in Alabama (now there is one), but an all-Negro "advisory committee" to the state ASCS has been appointed in that state! It is no wonder that, in 1965, a high official of the Department of Agriculture admitted that his department "was characterized as the 'Bad Guy' in civil rights in the federal government."

In the summer of 1964, organized efforts were made to get Negroes on the ASCS ballot and elected in a number of communities in Mississippi. Violence, intimidation, arrest and assault of poll watchers, etc., greeted these efforts; yet the attempt went on in Mississippi and, the next year, in Alabama. The odds against the success of any such attempt were tremendous. In the first place, though no formal "registration" was necessary in order to vote, since anyone "having an interest in a farm" within the community was by that fact alone entitled to receive a ballot, if the county office manager did not choose to send out that ballot, a Negro farmer had no way of forcing him to do so. What percentage of eligible Negroes was thus arbitrarily and illegally disenfranchised cannot be ascertained; the figure was high enough to produce total victory for whites in every single election in the two states.

The question of getting on the ballot was still tougher. The existing committees nominated candidates for their successors, and such nominations did not go to those whose outlook differed radically from that of their nominators. Under ASCS rules, nominations could also be made by petition, but the existing committees had the right to determine the eligibility of those nominated, and appeals from such decisions, even if they had any possibility of success, were scheduled to be heard after the election.

Underlying these procedural roadblocks are the facts of life in the Deep South. Prof. Morton Grodzins, a member of the committee asked by the United States Commission on Civil Rights to review the Department of Agriculture programs in 1964, is cited in its report as summarizing his findings as follows:

He stated that elections for such committees pose real difficulties because in a rural community powerful people "have a great opportunity to punish their local opponents with a wide range of economic, social and political weapons." Professor Grodzins also maintained that "intimate acquaintanceship with and participation in the local community may lead not to even-handed justice but to subservience to the powerful and neglect of the weak." When a landlord-tenant relationship is added to the already powerful racial discrimination in Southern counties, the protection of the voting rights of Negro participants becomes of paramount importance if the ASCS committee system is to function properly.

The Department of Agriculture was not oblivious to its responsibilities in this area. It did, before the 1965 elections, amend its regulations to provide that nominations for the following year by incumbent committees should fairly reflect the nature of the farm groups being represented. Perhaps as a result, 12,471 Negroes were so nominated in 1965 in all Southern states, although only eighty-five of them were elected to the community committees. New procedural regulations were adopted to help insure fairness in the casting and counting of ballots, and more formal appeals procedures were set up. Unfortunately those designated to administer the procedures and consider the appeals are the same white men who have always controlled the ASCS apparatus in the South.

In the summer of 1966, local Negro groups concerned with the lack of progress in the ASCS affairs, turned to the courts. North Central Alabama was the scene of the suit; a number of individuals in the counties covered (including Lowndes County), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and SNCC were the plaintiffs. The Selma office of the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee of the ACLU provided counsel.

Lowndes and its neighboring counties were a logical scene for such action: the 1965 elections there had been so improperly conducted that the Department of Agriculture itself, in the first such instance ever recorded in ASCS history, set them aside and ordered a rerun because "the spirit of the election procedures was not complied with."

The suit specifically attacked the incomplete and discriminatory nature of the list of eligible voters; the insufficiency of the notices sent out to those on these lists; the denial of the right to examine the lists of those eligible to vote; the bias of those administering the elections, with specific reference to the all-white administrative and executive staff of the ASCS in Alabama and the all-white state committee of the Alabama ASCS; the lack of any measures to provide information about procedures in ASCS elections to the potentially eligible voters; the still inadequate appeals procedures; and finally, the unusually early date set for the election, the middle of August, which it was charged was calculated to prevent the success of local Negro groups and of outside groups concerned to assist them in voting.

The plaintiffs' major emphasis was on the obligation of the federal government to provide meaningful information to the poor farmers of the state, so that their theoretical right to participate would exist in fact. They pointed out that:

The fact that election procedures for these elections, as written up by the ASCS itself in their simplest form for use by those administering the program on the local level, and incorporated in Handbook 7 CA, takes some 43 pages of typescript with 13 pages of amendments and exhibits, illustrates the amount of education needed to convey the pertinent facts to the poorest part of the population of a state which ranks 48th of 50 states in level of formal education.

After a brief hearing in August, the Department of Agriculture reluctantly agreed to extend the period during which ballots could be cast by several weeks; no further nominations were allowed, however, and the results of the extended voting were disappointing; still not a single Negro was elected to take any county office throughout the state of Alabama. In Mississippi, where no suit was brought, two Negro alternates in 1965 had been elected out of the 410 regular and alternate county committeemen; in 1966, every single person elected was white! The tremendous effort in the 1966 elections in Alabama did result in increasing the number of Negro community committeemen from eleven in 1965 to twenty-three in 1966 (out of more than 1,840 total); in Mississippi, life reverted to its accustomed patterns and the number fell from twenty-four in 1965 to sixteen in 1966 (out of more than 1,641 total).

In May of 1967, the Alabama State Advisory Committee of the United States Commission on Civil Rights held open hearings in Selma in which the ASCS figured prominently. Available for the committee's use was a commission staff study detailing the lack of representation of Negroes in either regular or seasonal jobs with the ASCS, as well as the desultory results of the ASCS election procedures. Included was the fact that in 1966, in counties with Negro population majorities, 68.1 per cent of eligible whites voted, while only 49.7 per cent of eligible Negroes did so.

Other interesting statistics were mentioned without comment: for instance, in the 1964 census, Negroes comprised 65 per cent of farm operators in Lowndes County, original home of the Black Panther Party. In the 1965 elections 58 per cent of the eligible voters were Negro. In the 1966 elections, suddenly, only 39 per cent of the eligible voters turned out to be Negro. No explanation is provided for the drop. There is comment in the staff report of "considerable variation in the size of communities which select committeemen"; while the average is 231 eligible voters per community, the range is from 78 to 1,011 eligible voters. The report points out the obvious: "many of such communities have heavy majorities of one race or another and have not altered their community boundaries in many years. Some boundaries have not been altered since established." The one-man-one-vote rule does not seem to have made any inroads into the ASCS elections procedures.

The 1967 elections in most of the Southern states have just taken place. The preliminary tabulation of the results by race has been completed, and it is clear that there has been no change in the pattern of the last five years, in either results or methods. Actually, the results are clearly worse now than they were in 1966. There are still no Negroes on any county committee in the South; on community committees, the total number of Negroes elected in the fourteen states fell from 113 to 100, and Negro alternates went from 545 to 451. Alabama went down just a little; in Mississippi 39 per cent fewer Negroes were elected in 1966 than in 1965, and in Texas, the percentage drop was 45 per cent. One appeal has already been filed, alleging that in Macon Co., Ala., employees of the county office deliberately solicited white votes, failed to contact eligible Negro voters, disqualified Negro ballots on technicalities not used with white ballots, etc. The procedures of the ASCS appear to get better on paper each year, but the results never seem to vary.

The legal and political ramifications of this situation are considerable and raise some interesting constitutional questions. The government takes the position that it is now conducting itself in a fair and impartial manner, implying that whatever private economic coercion is used, or whatever handicaps are imposed by lack of knowledge on the part of Negroes, are no concern of the government. But when the government provides that locally elected committees shall be the administrative agents of its programs, rather than itself retaining direct administrative control, it is not illogical to argue that it must then see that elections produce results consistent with the Constitution, as any other administrative procedure would be required to do.

One method of accomplishing this has been proposed by Donald Jelinek, who was chief counsel for the plaintiffs in the 1966 suit which won an extension of that year's election. He is now director of the Southern Rural Research Project which, in more than 2,000 on-the-spot interviews with Negro farmers in the Deep South, found that 80 to 90 per cent of them had no knowledge whatever of ASCS procedures for the selection of community or county committees. Jelinek suggests that separate positions on each community and county committee be allocated by color, the number to be based on the number of eligible voters of each color, and such positions to be filled only by voters of that color. The ASCS has to a certain extent moved in a parallel direction as far as nominations are concerned. In 1966, it required that county committees nominate minority group farmers as candidates for election in "proportion to the number of farmers of minority groups that are in the county or community." This policy was subsequently changed to provide that in communities where 10 per cent or more of eligible voters are members of a minority group, the county committee must place a minority group member on the ballot, unless one has been nominated by petition. Whether the ASCS will extend this procedure to apply to elections as well as nominations is an open question: Jelinek's idea certainly raises administrative and legal as well as policy questions (it could be interpreted as another kind of segregation), but it shows to what extremes the accumulated frustrations of several years of constant effort in the South have forced those most familiar with the problem.

Are elections the proper instrument in this situation? We are not accustomed to asking this question, but here it is relevant. If the economic strength of whites, the sociological disadvantages of Negroes, and the complexities of the whole process are such as to preclude a racially fair result in elections at this time, perhaps direct administration from Washington is more consistent with democratic principles. The possibility that local democracy in the South will produce results consistent with national policy seems dim at this writing; but perhaps the answer is that local democracy, like Christianity, has never really been tried in Alabama yet. If in Alabama entrenched economic power protects entrenched political power, and political power in turn protects economic power, then perhaps the site of political power should be moved to Washington until the vicious circle is broken.

In 1965 the administration of the Farmers Home Administration, similarly run by the Department of Agriculture in Washington, specifically directed state FHA directors to appoint at least one Negro to FHA county committees in any county where 20 per cent or more of the farmers are Negroes. At least some progress can be guaranteed by this method; perhaps the best solution is one that combines election procedures which promote democratic Negro representation with controls from Washington that make sure that such representation does come about. One thing is clear: white power will control cotton allocations, and with it life-or-death economic power over black farmers, in the Deep South until the Department of Agriculture changes its policies radically.

PEACE POLITICS

CALCULUS FOR '68

ELDON KENWORTHY

Mr. Kenworthy teaches comparative government at Cornell University.

What is hard about Vietnam is that the issue is both moral and political. While compromise is the essence of the latter, especially when you see yourself as a small minority operating in a stable liberal democracy, it seems out of place in the former. The immorality of this war, when one thinks about it for a while, hardly produces a mood for politicking. Somewhere politics and morals must meet, however, if only because we cannot act in more than one way at one point in time. What follows is an attempt to re-explore that boundary in the light of the options open to us in January, 1968.

Suppose we start with goals. If there is consensus on anything among those on the Left who identify with "the peace movement," it is on the urgency of ending the war. And ending it in the right way: through decreasing, not increasing destruction. (This qualification is to be understood in all that follows.) A moral course of action, then, would seem to be any action that contributes to ending the war as quickly as possible.

Some actions, however, may be excluded out of hand as being inherently immoral. It is interesting that for all the analogies drawn with Hitler's Germany, and all the talk of revolution, such a class of actions still exists for most of the Left. We have what Dietrich Bonhoeffer called "the scruples of our class." But before bogging down in the ends-means question, we should ask whether any of the acts that pose this problem would, in fact, contribute to stopping the war. Only after the effectiveness of a strategy has been established need we inquire into its (to put it crudely) side effects: what it means for our moral consistency, what repercussions it will have on other goals we may seek.

But how do we judge an act's effectiveness? Obviously no one can know in advance what impact, if any, various actions of ours will have on the multiplicity of forces which govern the United States role in Vietnam. But neither do we act in a vacuum of total ignorance. In assessing strategies, we must estimate as best we can their probable impact on the real situation, including obviously the reactions they will elicit from groups more powerful than we.

Father Conner, on being reclassified I-A delinquent for having returned his draft card, was quoted as saying that at least future generations will know where he stood. That misses the point. It is not where we stood that will matter, but what we did. What we do will be judged in terms of the options actually open to us, and in terms of how effectively we exploited them in advancing moral goals; not in terms of our definition of the situation at the time or of the purity of our values. We know where someone stood who left Germany at the first tinge of fascism. We admire more those who stayed to put up effective opposition as long as possible.

It is necessary to spell this out since many sensitive, "moral" people choose strategies not for their political meaning—a meaning that only the national context can give them—but for their fidelity to private feeling, in this case by how accurately they mirror the anger and disgust felt for the war. This is expressive, not effective, politics. The contribution of expressive politics to ending the war is random: it may help or it may hinder, depending on how it "mixes" with the other political forces on the scene. What is immoral is precisely this failure to inquire into effects ahead of time. We engage in expressive politics when instead of asking ourselves, as the editor of the Wisconsin Daily Cardinal put it, "What is the problem? What can be done about it?" we ask ourselves, "What is the most radical thing to do?"

Expressive politics can be justified only when nothing is known about the situation in which we act—who the other actors are and how they will react—or when the cause is lost. If nothing we do matters, then a case can be made for recording for posterity where we stood. I cannot see how ending the war in Vietnam qualifies on either count, though if the only thing one will settle for is the immediate withdrawal of the whole U.S. "presence" from that country, then the cause probably is lost. But is it moral to demand so much? Simply stopping the bombing and the shooting matters tremendously, when one considers the importance of life.

I am, of course, making another assumption: that remaking American society at home and/or eliminating all vestiges of imperialism from U.S. foreign policy are not the only ways to stop the war. To be precise, while they may be sufficient conditions, they are not necessary ones. Albert Hirschman, describing Latin American intellectuals, records their remarkable ability to spin linkages between problems where linkages need not exist. Sometimes this facilitates problem solving, sometimes not. (The linkage drawn between ghetto riots and War on

Punch: Ben Roth

"Had Any Luck?"

Poverty programs have had both effects.) In the case of Vietnam, far-flung linkages have been neither helpful nor accurate.

The ends-means problem also arises in another form when we realize that we are the means for the present policy. We may pay taxes, cooperate with the draft, and in countless other ways "support" the government. I doubt that the Left's tax contribution amounts to much—we probably take out in federal support to education more than we put in—or that its share of the military manpower pool is significant, but again there are things which, as a matter of personal conscience, one simply cannot do. Considerable confusion has arisen on this point because radicals try to capitalize on their withdrawal from Johnson's program by advertising it as the most effective strategy for changing that program. While on moral grounds one may have to dissociate himself from existing policies, this act may or may not be the most effective means of influencing policy. There is an important difference between an individual refusing the draft

(and his friends supporting him) and "the movement" deciding to make the draft the central issue in its strategy to end the war. The difference is that we engage in public activity, especially concerted activity, in order to affect things on the societal level. We do not need movements to be true to ourselves: for that purpose solitary action is usually better, since it demands fewer compromises.

Where does this leave us in January, 1968? First, the goal: to end the war as quickly as possible. While remaking the society or eliminating imperialism are worthy ends, they are for the time being secondary and must not be pursued to the detriment of the primary goal. Next, the situation in which, willy-nilly, we must operate. While too complex to analyze fully here, it seems to me that the essential aspects of the situation are to be found in answers to two simple questions:

- (1) Can the present Administration stop the war?
- (2) Can any conceivable administration stop the war?

Since we are unwilling to wait forever, the second question in effect becomes: Could an administration elected next November stop the war? Three assessments grow out of these questions: (a) Yes on one, in which case the second question becomes irrelevant; (b) no on one but yes on two, and (c) no on both. The strategy one selects should be linked to one of these assessments.

If one sees the situation as (c), then activity aimed at stopping the Vietnamese War is irrelevant. Presumably the only means by which it could be ended would be by revolution. Given the present affluence of this society and the degree of compliance which the national government elicits from the public, any revolution seems unlikely in the next half dozen years, and one way or another the war will be over by then. Least likely of all is a revolution led by white radicals over an issue of foreign policy.

There are two groups which see (a) as a description of reality sufficiently accurate to act upon: those who adopt the Reston scenario of Johnson, confronted with a Republican peace candidate, outflanking him with a dramatic move toward negotiations which cannot be reversed (although they might drag on as with Korea), and those who are now adopting a strategy of "confrontation" or "resistance." Since the former is closely bound up with possibility (b), I shall discuss it in that context a bit later.

Confrontation is the strategy urged by those who believe it possible to obstruct the war effort through acts of harassment and sabotage. Specifically, it means going beyond those acts which society grudgingly permits its vocal minorities (such as "peaceful demonstrations") to acts that previously have been taboo, even with the Left (such as violations of civil liberties and of property rights, Provo-style offenses to public mores, and the deliberate hounding of public officials). The objective, as outlined by Nathan Bossen, one of the planners of Stop the Draft Week, is to change the government's policy by raising "the cost of the war in terms of political harassment, social disruption and real money costs" (The New York Times, November 22). While we are not here concerned with the justification of means in any terms but effectiveness, some of the novelty of this strategy is reflected in Carl Davidson's statement that "when an institution is without legitimacy [in the eyes of SDS], it is without rights, it is without the right of free speech" (Washington Post, November 13).

This strategy, it seems to me, is premised on an enormous error of scale. One cannot transfer tactics which worked on some campuses and in some communities to the nation at large or even to Washington in particular. "Shutting down" the Pentagon by sitting-in is inconceivable. Whatever else our government may be, it is not a banana republic whose personnel and policies can be changed by deft strokes taken by small minorities on the outside.

Even at the point where the radical Left, by its age concentration, could most affect policy on Vietnam—the draft—it still seems improbable that we could alter Washington's mind against Washington's will. For every two men who are drafted, three at present enlist. The Administration preferred the system of generous student deferments as long as no one raised the issue of equity, which indicates how little the military need campus recruits. The rate of enlistment and re-enlistment among Negroes, the other group to which the radicals might appeal, is sadly high.

Furthermore, advocates of confrontation, like the hawks, fail to see that their opponents will escalate when they do, or if they see this they fail to anticipate how much more difficult it will make obstructive tactics. In his last press conference, Johnson linked this strategy to "storm trooper bullying." He would like nothing better, one supposes, than to link all serious protest to "crime in the streets." When that happens, it will be open season for communities that want to "crack down" on dissent.

We are left with (b), the assertion that while this Administration cannot extricate itself from Vietnam, its successor might; or, in the Reston version, that under pressure from such a likelihood, Johnson might change his policy. There is some evidence for this view in recent opinion polls and in the behavior of politicians. A majority of the public became disaffected with Johnson's handling of the war in early 1966, and this majority has since grown until it now includes three out of every four of those polled (Harris Poll, taken in late October). Glassboro gave the President a brief respite, but presumably only because it raised hopes of a settlement.

Within this substantial disaffected majority, as everyone knows, there are hawks as well as doves. There are probably a large number of others who are best categorized as "tireds" and isolationists. What is significant is that the hawks have held steady over the past half year, at about one-fifth of the public. The doves and the tireds, on the other hand, have risen from 24 per cent (last July) to 44 per cent (late October). Along with the "not sure"—which, significantly, is also increasing—they constitute a majority in the nation. By doves and tireds I mean those who passed up both a chance to reaffirm present policy and a chance to call for a total military solution, choosing instead the item that called for "getting out as quickly as possible."

The attitude of politicians is far less easy to discern, but there appear to be some parallel trends: the Governors' Conference, which did not endorse Johnson's Vietnamese policy this time around; Democrats who did not seek Administration support in the last by-election; and the movement of leading Republican candidates from hawklike to sphinxlike positions. (This even includes Nixon, though not Reagan.) Sen. Eugene McCarthy probably would not have embarked on a course of challenging the President in the primaries if he felt a dove could only fall on his face.

For (b) to approach being a realistic description of the situation, two questions must be answered: When has an incumbent President who wanted a second term not gotten it? And, after 1964, how likely is it that a candidate pledged to end the war will actually do so? Perhaps 1964 should not be singled out, since both Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt similarly reversed themselves on campaign pledges to minimize U.S. involvement in foreign wars. Recent history suggests that Johnson will have little trouble getting the nomination and that only three events can stop him from being re-elected: his dying, the appearance of a strong third party, and the public's identifying the situation as a crisis and blaming him for it (cf., Hoover in 1932). As for the Reston reversal, it seems wholly unpredictable. It and the question as to how much one can trust campaign promises depend to largely on one's estimate of what the war is all about.

The United States entered this war more for ideological reasons than for any precise notion of geopolitical or economic interest. Unlike some on the Left, I do not find the first reason to have less explanatory power than the next two, nor is it less to be condemned. (If anything, it is more to be condemned, being further removed from accepted notions of national interest.) But when one compares the history of U.S. policy toward Eastern Europe with that toward Latin America, it appears that ideologically motivated policies, while pursued more single-mindedly at the time, may be easier to alter over time than economic or geopolitically rooted policies.

It is conceivable to me, therefore, that an American President could "redefine" the meaning of Vietnam in such a fashion that a peace pledge could be implemented. (Given the commitment of his prestige, however, I doubt that Johnson could do it.) This country is beginning to feel the war. Troop levels now match Korean War figures; the implications of the war for taxes and inflation can no longer be avoided. If Korea is any parallel, once a war is felt in this way, it may be difficult for a President to renege on a promise to extricate the country from a war begun by his predecessor.

Can we increase somewhat the small probability that Johnson will not be re-elected? Though small, I estimate the probability to be considerably greater than that of his changing policy or obstructing its implementation. We cannot control his health, and assassination—to canvass all logical possibilities—would rebound against us. Kennedy's assassination provoked a public demand that his policies be implemented, not changed. As for an effective third party, that too is out of our hands. Only if someone of Robert Kennedy's importance agreed to run would such a party do greater damage to Johnson than Wallace did to Truman. Without a potent candidate, the "dump-Johnson" movements have nowhere to go. That leaves the third possibility: making the war seem a sufficient crisis in the public mind that the electorate will turn to a Republican replacement who offers some hope of peace. What can we contribute to this possibility?

Here the confrontation strategy has some appeal. It is certainly capable of generating an aura of crisis. If

Manchester Guardian

"As a Republican I Object To Fighting Johnson's Bloody Election Campaign in Vietnam"

New Yorker cartoons are any indication, it pains the middle class to feel that the war has alienated them from their progeny. Massive draft-card burnings could convince the country that this is not war as usual. But we must be mindful of another facet of this strategy: the people must be willing to elect someone who promises something akin to our solution; we must create a sense of crisis but not alienate votes and opinions from the peaceful option. Here one must contend with the country's lack of experience with retreat—compared, say, with the Russians'. Americans continue to feel uneasy about withdrawal, even when their common sense increasingly tells them that Yankees can't hope to remake Asian societies. To put in bluntly, we have to make de-escalation and withdrawal respectable.

This is hard enough to do when "peace" wears bells, smokes pots and shouts such absurdities as "flower power." It will be worse if the President manages to link his critics to "crime in the streets" and fascism. The hippie influence the public has partially dismissed as college high jinks. They are wrong in that, of course, but what matters is how they see it, not how it is. I doubt that Provo-style tactics, if carried very far, will be as readily tolerated. We are a people who take violence seriously, especially when inflicted on innocent bystanders (again those viewed as innocent), and the village elders. This strategy, then, calls for a subtle balance: enough anger and sacrifice to arouse the nation's conscience, but great care to insure that the peace alternative is not seen as irresponsible and vindictive.

It is here that Eugene McCarthy comes in. If he and his supporters demonstrate that a dovish candidate can attract votes, he will have served as a stalking-horse, not for Robert Kennedy but for Nixon and hundreds of Republican pros who are (to put it mildly) ideologically flexible and eager to win. To be successful in this, paradoxically, McCarthy may need to be less liberal than he would like to appear. If Americans have no tradition of retreat, they do have a tradition of isolationism. Johnson played on this in his 1964 speech about Asian boys and American boys, and it must now be used against him. This means talking less about Vietnamese lives and more about American lives, less about all the beautiful things that could be done with the money wasted on the war, and more about taxes and inflation. We have given the South Vietnamese enough time (and enough equipment) to rally, if their hearts were really in it; having done that, it's time we came home. It would be, of course, exceedingly stupid of the Left to quarrel over the timing and labeling of American withdrawal.

I give such a strategy only a three-in-ten chance of success. Can anyone think of a course of action that has a higher probability?

THE NETTLES OF PRAGUE

JOHN DORNBERG

Mr. Dornberg is East European correspondent and Vienna bureau chief of Newsweek. He is the author of Schizophrenic Germany (Macmillan) and a forthcoming book on East Germany.

Vienna

East Europe's wind of change came late to Czechoslovakia. Long after revolutions in Hungary and Poland had stirred a cultural ferment, Czechoslovakia seemed gray and dormant. However, when at last liberalization began blowing across Bohemia and Slovakia, it produced a cultural blossoming unparalleled in the Communist world.

Czechoslovak films became pace setters at international festivals. The novels of outspoken and talented writers clambered up bestseller ladders at home and abroad. Prague's avant-garde painters and sculptors were publicly admired, and the abundance of new plays prompted Kenneth Tynan to call Prague the "theatre capital of Europe."

So free was the spirit that several years ago Communist apparatchiks in neighboring East Germany complained bitterly about the "intellectual poison flowing from Prague." The nettle of world communism's dogmatists, Czech intellectuals were at the same time the envy of their contemporaries in other East European capitals.

Until last spring. Then a series of seemingly innocuous events touched off a conflict, sometimes overt, sometimes covert, between intellectuals and the regime which culminated recently in the censure and expulsion of several leading writers from the Czechoslovak Communist Party and the virtual suppression of Literarni Noviny, the popular weekly journal of the Czech Writers' Union. The trouble began in February when the Czechoslovak Ministry of Culture was reorganized into two separate departments. Dr. Jiri Hajek, the man generally credited with creating a more tolerant cultural climate, remained in charge of education, while Karel Hoffmann, a doctrinaire functionary who had headed the party Central Committee's ideological commission, was named Minister of Culture.

For Czechoslovak writers, playwrights, film makers and theatre directors, the change portended a return to stricter ideological control. The party did little to dispel that notion when it appointed to Hoffmann's former post Frantisek Havlicek, also a narrow-minded dogmatist. During the following month, the Central Committee devoted two meetings in part to mobilization of "purist" ideological forces and to sharp attacks on several writers, film makers and the leading literary journals.

In May, a group of parliamentary deputies denounced two avant-garde films—Vera Chytilova's The Daisies [see The Nation, November 13] and Jan Nemec's The Feast and the Invited Guests—both of which had been denied public showings in Czechoslovakia. During the parliamentary debate, the films were lambasted as "junk and a waste of the public's money," while the two directors were accused of "trampling on the achievements of socialism." In June, when the Czechoslovak Writers' Union held its Fourth Congress in Prague, the feud broke into the open.

The three-day session was punctuated by angry exchanges between party functionaries and writers, most of whom are themselves active party members. Criticism of the leadership ranged from attacks upon the regime's pro-Arab stance in the Middle East war to plaintive condemnations of censorship. At one point there was a stand-up row between Jiri Hendrych, President of Czechoslovakia, and party leader Antonin Novotny's nominal heir apparent, and prominent writers who refused to be told by him what constituted "true socialism." The climax came in a speech by Ludvik Vaculik, 41, whose two novels, A Busy House and The Axe, deal critically with past blunders by the regime and the party. He bitterly denounced what he called variously "the power" or "ruling circles" for perverting the socialism they profess. Challenging opponents' right to call themselves Socialists, Vaculik accused the party and government of seeking only to perpetuate itself in power and denounced the regime for not having solved "a single social question within the past twenty years."

The outcome of the congress was a party-ordered reshuffle of the editorial board of Literarni Noviny and the removal of several names—notably Vaculik, novelist Jan Prochazka, and playwrights Pavel Kohout and Vaclav Havel—from the list of candidates for the Writers' Union

Central Committee. As a result, no election of new officers was held and the organization remains, to the present, nominally without leaders.

Several days after the congress, party leader Novotny himself accused the writers of propagating "coexistence with bourgeois ideology" and failing "to recognize the class struggle." That marked the start of a long hot intellectual summer. In July, authorities staged a show trial of a young writer and a sometime film producer, both accused of subversion because of their contacts with Pavel Tigrid, a Czech-American who edits a Paris-based Czechoslovak exile magazine. Several days after the trial, a Swiss journalist, the Neue Zuercher Zeitung's Andreas Kohlschuetter, reputed to have good connections with Czech intellectuals, was arrested at the Czech-Polish border, detained for twenty-nine hours and expelled from Czechoslovakia, after being deprived of several documents, among them a copy of Vaculik's speech.

Two weeks after that incident came the spectacular defection of leading Czechoslovak novelist Ladislav Mnacko, who went to Israel ostensibly to protest against his government's policies in the Middle East. Mnacko, whom the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung has called "one of the most striking figures of the lost Socialist generation—a Red Hemingway," accused the Prague regime of stifling free discussion of the Middle East war, suggested that Israel's pre-emptive strike was what Czechoslovakia should have done to Germany in 1939, and charged that anti-Semitic currents and elements dating back to the trial and execution of Czech Communist Rudolf Slansky in 1952 were still rampant in Czechoslovakia.

The party responded promptly by stripping Mnacko, whose novels have reached unprecedented popularity in Czechoslovakia, of his party membership and citizenship. In truth, his departure was motivated less by scruples and pangs of conscience than by his anger over the regime's refusal to publish his latest novel, The Taste of Power, or by the party's dismay over his decision to sell exclusive rights to the book to the conservative publisher, Fritz Molden. Nevertheless, his flight gave the dispute between regime and intellectuals world-wide notice.

The focus was sharpened several weeks later when the Sunday Times, London, published a 1,000-word "manifesto" purportedly signed by 183 Czechoslovak writers, sixty-nine artists, twenty-one film and television people, fifty-six scientists and publicists and other intellectuals and "smuggled out of the country."

The document, copyrighted by FCI—Free Central European Information, a hysterically anti-Communist London-based exile group—accused the Czech regime of "conducting a witch hunt of a pronounced Fascist character" against "the entire Czechoslovak writers' community."

It appealed to the "public and writers of the entire free and democratic world" (notably Arthur Miller, John Steinbeck, Jean-Paul Sartre, Jacques Prévert, Heinrich Böll, Günter Grass, Peter Weiss, Alberto Moravia, Bertrand Russell and John Osborne) "to rescue the spiritual freedom and fundamental rights of every independent artist threatened by the terror of state powers."

The appeal was as rabid as it was contrived, completely out of character with the views of most Czech writers and with the thrust of intellectual opinion in Prague. The document was declared spurious not only by the Czechoslovak regime but by such diversified experts as the staff of Radio Free Europe, Communist playwright Pavel Kohout, the Neue Zuercher's Andreas Kohlschuetter, American diplomats in Prague and John Steinbeck. As one Czech writer remarked to me: "Ours is a small and tightly knit community. It is inconceivable that such a manifesto could have been circulated and signed by so many people without all of us knowing about it. I know of no one who does."

Nevertheless, writers, journalists and intellectuals in the West accepted the "manifesto" and took up the cudgels for Czech artistic freedom—to the dismay and embarrassment of the Novotny regime. Faced with mounting polemics from the writers and the reaction of dogmatists who had long warned that the intellectuals were going too far, the party was forced to take action. It moved at the Central Committee's plenary meeting late in September. Hendrych, who had been severely criticized by party conservatives for being too lenient toward the intellectuals, delivered a policy statement that showed the party's determination to retain ideological control.

"The Writers' Congress," he said, "mirrored many problems of ideology, education, culture and strong pressure from abroad." It signaled the danger inherent in a weakening of the party's leading role. Over the years, different political approaches to questions of art and cultural policy, especially in relation to Communist Party guidance, had begun to crystallize within the ranks of Communist writers. Non-Marxist tendencies had not been openly opposed. Disguised as experiments and aesthetic advances, works of art alien to socialism had begun to dominate.

And that, Hendrych assured the Central Committee, would never do. "An interpretation of political activity and Socialist commitment which aims at the promotion of alien political platforms is unacceptable. Equally unacceptable is the view that Socialist democracy can be replaced by liberalism and anarchy. Its boundaries are not the same as the boundaries of bourgeois democratic freedom. . . . The great and concentrated endeavor of our society is being stabbed in the back by the preaching of freedom, democracy and humanism stripped of their class and Socialist meanings."

For two days party functionaries marched to the platform to endorse that view. Then the Central Committee voted Jan Prochazka from its ranks as a candidate member, and expelled Vaculik, novelist and playwright Ivan Klima, and translator and critic A. J. Liehm from the party for "conduct incompatible with membership." Pavel Kohout and another writer, M. Kundera, were sharply rebuked.

Worst of all, the party deprived the influential Writers' Union of its chief platform, Literarni Noviny. This audacious journal, whose circulation of 130,000 had made it the leading cultural-political-economic weekly in Czechoslovakia, was placed under the management of the Ministry of Culture, and Karel Hoffmann immediately promised that he would find a staff for the paper capable of "applying party-minded, ideological and political criteria in criticism and journalism." All but five of Literarni Noviny's nineteen staff and editorial board members were fired, and those five resigned.

One week later, a pale simulation of Literarni Noviny appeared on Prague newsstands, and the new editor, Dr. Jan Zelenka, himself a stopgap, contributed an editorial promising ideological conformity. Its former readers were soon calling the paper "tales of Hoffmann."

A new editor in chief was installed also at Kulturny Tvorba, the party's own cultural weekly. And there are persistent but as yet unconfirmed rumors that the party will also divest the Writers' Union of its control over the Ceskoslovensky Spisovatel publishing house, which enjoys almost monopolistic rights to publish the works of contemporary Czech authors and, as such, provides the Writers' Union with a solid financial base.

Most writers foresaw the party's response. "I was not the least surprised," said Vaculik. Though many intellectuals tended to see the developments as putting an end to their world ("There is nothing more they can do, they have already done everything," said a dejected former Literarni Noviny staffer), others felt that the party had been surprisingly lenient. It was a view shared by objective Western diplomatic sources, one of whom said candidly: "I am flabbergasted by the time lag between the Writers' Congress and the Central Committee's response. Moreover, there was lots of rhetoric at the Central Committee meeting, but surprisingly little activity."

Even the writers most intimately involved admitted that things could have been worse. Said one of the expelled members: "I won't starve. I'll get severance pay for being dismissed from Literarni Noviny. I have a fellowship and savings to tide me over for a while and I am sure my next book will be published without any trouble."

This points to a surprising aspect of the dispute between party and intellectuals. Despite a good deal of gratuitous hostile comment, at almost no time during the past months has there been a real conflict over literary or artistic content. Indeed, during the very week of the expulsions and the suppression of Literarni Noviny, Prague was the scene of a cacophony of sounds billed officially as the first world festival of contemporary music in a Communist country. And at the Praha Cinema just off Wenceslaus Square, the two movies which had been banned for more than a year were being shown and advertised.

What annoys the party is not what the writers have said in their plays, novels and poems but what they put into their speeches and their political essays for Literarni Noviny. The issue is not artistic freedom as such but whether, and to what extent, intellectuals may thrust themselves onto the political stage.

Like Vaculik, many of the Czech intellectuals have begun to take a second look at their society and the communism to which they have pledged allegiance. They still assert adamantly, as did Pavel Kohout recently in an open letter to Günter Grass in West Germany's Die Zeit: "I am and remain a Communist." But they are searching for new interpretations of their credo. Revelations about communism's past have made them doubt communism's present, and they have begun to question the party's tenet that the class struggle can still be made to serve as the ultimate rationale of policy.

Said Kohout: "The revelations of the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet Party, and the concurrent recognition that revolutionary might had led to an abuse of power, delivered a psychic blow to Communist artists and intellectuals. . . . But their reaction is not a negation of communism. Our generation, a team generation, was too mature to stand before the shattered fragments of our past beliefs and just break apart. With but a few exceptions, that generation realized it had only one alternative: the continuation of the revolutionary process."

As in other Communist countries, that continuing revolutionary process has found expression in a complex of economic reforms which demand new principles of efficiency, profitability and expert management. In Czechoslovakia, where de-Stalinization came late and was never carried to its logical conclusions, this had created a chasm between the old dogmatists and the reformers, between the loyal party bureaucrats who climbed the ladder of obedience, and the new generation of technocrats who are jostling them out of their jobs. The conflict pervades every sphere of Czech society.

In the case of writers and intellectuals, the party attempted to meet the strain by imposing restrictions. The free-wheeling ways of the Vaculiks, Klimas, Kohouts and Prochazkas had triggered fear in the party's top echelons. "You have no idea," one Czech Communist told me, "how many of the conservatives and dogmatists have been saying to Hendrych and Novotny: 'We told you so.'"

Many apparatchiks, moreover, are saying the same thing about the Czechoslovak economic reforms, which are still not functioning properly. For Czechoslovakia, however, and particularly for its Communist regime, these reforms are indispensable; the freedom of intellectuals and writers takes second place. Under the circumstances, total party harmony—or at least an attempt to achieve it—won over the interests of the intellectuals.

Whether the harmony will be achieved in the foreseeable future is another matter. Since the last Central Committee meeting, Prague has been bustling with rumors of significant changes, reflective of further disharmony, within the party's top echelons.

One prominent Prague journalist, himself a veteran Communist, put it to me thus:

"Probably the writers thought that progress was not fast enough. That is why so many of them went out of their way to provoke the leadership last June. But the fact that they went as far as they did is proof that we have come a long way from the days of Stalinism. We are at a crossroads. This is a very important moment for our country. It is wrong to say, as do many in the West, that Czechoslovakia is the most Stalinist country in the Communist world. Up to now things have been very free. But what of the future? For many in the party, the liberties the writers took was proof that liberalization had gone too far. They are now actively seeking different policies. If they succeed, what then. . . .?"

BOOKS & THE ARTS

When Did the Cold War Begin?

THE COLD WAR AS HISTORY. By Louis J. Halle. Harper & Row. 434 pp. $6.95.

CONTAINMENT & REVOLUTION. Edited by David Horowitz. Beacon Press. 249 pp. $5.95.

D. F. FLEMING

Mr. Fleming is the author of the two-volume work, The Cold War and Its Origins, 1917-1960 (Doubleday) and of The United States and the League of Nations, 1918-1920, The United States and the World Court, 1920-1966 (both Russell & Russell) and The United States and World Organization, 1920-1933 (AMS Press); all to be republished this year.

Containment and Revolution is a collection of seven excellent research essays on the cold war, edited by David Horowitz, a young writer who already has a remarkable publishing record. One essay by William A. Williams on "American Intervention in Russia: 1917-1920," establishes Woodrow Wilson's aversion to revolution and describes the long struggle between his desire to aid the anti-Bolsheviks and his conviction that the Russian peoples had a right to self-determination even by revolution—a basic principle that has never troubled our later leaders in dealing with Vietnam.

Other chapters, including one by Isaac Deutscher, discuss the origins and myths of the cold war, Senator Taft's critique of containment, and the myth and reality of counterinsurgency in Greece in the 1940s and again in Vietnam. This is a valuable and interesting addition to cold-war history.

The title of The Cold War as History is intriguing. The book jacket says that it is "neither a polemic nor a journalistic analysis"; it is written "from the standpoint of a vision of history." The author says it "represents the common distinction between current events and history." In the close-up view, accidents seem to predominate, but later "they come to seem inconsequential" and a pattern becomes apparent. The title "represents the aspiration to do for the Cold War what Thucydides did for the Peloponnesian War, which belonged to his own present and in which he took part."

There would seem to be a suggestion here that the fifteen books published since 1960, which have been critical of our role in the cold war, belong to the current events category. Indeed, only one of these studies is referred to in Halle's book or in its bibliography, apparently on the theory that it is not necessary to take any account of them when one comes to write about the cold war "as history."

A jacket statement by George Kennan supports the view that a true historian of the cold war has arrived: "Louis Halle has done a very rare and difficult thing: which is to look at a recent period of history as though it were a hundred years in the past. He has given us, in this serene, detached and thoughtful treatise, a view of the cold war that will have a lasting effect on the treatment of the cold war in historical literature."

Halle's qualification to be our Thucydides of the cold war (that he took part in it) is important. He was in the State Department from 1941 to 1954, dealing with Inter-American affairs from 1946 to 1951 and a member of the Policy Planning Staff from 1952 to 1954. He was a close friend of Kennan, who was at the center of things. The book, then, views the cold war as it looked from the inside in Washington. Even so, Halle achieves a high degree of objectivity.

He explains, all the way through, that Stalin was a Russian first, and that any ambition in Moscow to spread communism everywhere was, "at best, secondary." For 900 years fear had been the driving force in Russia. Halle stresses the ever-recurring invasions from all sides of the great Russian plain throughout this long period, and Russian expansionism is explained as a reaction—as a "defensive expansion."

It is made clear that Stalin did not want Communist regimes anywhere that he could not control, that he worked against them in China, Yugoslavia, Albania and Greece. He wanted only defensible frontiers and would probably have preferred more Finlands in East Europe, if the dynamics of his occupations had not enforced firm control. "It is not clear that Stalin wanted to extend the area of his dominion as far West as possible."

Yet after the war "various historical circumstances put Russia in the role of the challenger, superficially, at least, in the role of the aggressor." They had "little choice but to move as they did," but then "they compelled the United States and its allies to move in response"—back into the European vacuum. It was "a situation of irreducible dilemma."

The book is founded, diffidently but firmly, on the balance of power—the inescapable law of life, inside nations and among them—(though it is fifty-four years after Sarajevo, and one more breakdown could mean the end of great nations and small). Roosevelt is censured for never "going beyond" the concept of international organization, when it is apparently meant that he should have gone behind it. It was "not conceivable" that Moscow would have cooperated with us in the organization of a postwar world.

The great effort of Roosevelt and Hull to organize a new league of nations which would keep the peace in cooperation with the Soviet Union having been rejected under Truman, and quickly reversed, Halle naturally attaches great importance to the number of troops under arms after the war. In contrast to "the catastrophic dismantling of our armed forces," he says, Russia "did not demobilize after the War" but kept in the armed forces 5 million to 6 million men, "battle hardened," and never went below that in the postwar period.

But in Horowitz's collection, Deutscher says that before the Truman Doctrine in 1947, "the Russians had demobilized their armies so rapidly that they reduced them from 11,500,000 men at the end of the war to less than 3,000,000. Only after the formation of NATO did they start remobilizing, but they had such difficulties with their manpower that in the course of another three or four years they called to arms not more than another two million men."

Beyond Deutscher's reputation for accuracy, all reason is on his side. As President Kennedy said: "No nation in the history of battle ever suffered more than the Soviet Union in the second world war"—20 million dead, and devastation "equivalent to the destruction of this country East of Chicago." Such a ruined country, with limitless need for its decimated manpower at home, could not have remained armed to the teeth ready to march to the Channel. And Halle himself makes it clear that Moscow didn't tighten its control over East Europe, nullifying the coalition governments, until after the Truman Doctrine.

The volume's 900-year view of Russia's agonies from invasion is useful as background, but it fails to emphasize several things in recent history that made the Russian occupation of East Europe after the war "inevitable." In the terrible devastation and slaughter which Russia had suffered because of World War I, the Western interventions from 1918 to 1921, and World War II—three times since 1913—there was compulsion enough to drive the Soviets to close the invasion gates through East Europe in 1945.

The millennial explanation of Russia's control of East and Central Europe after 1945 also fails to ascribe due weight to these decisive factors:

(1) That by turning its back on the League of Nations after World War I the United States removed the great makeweight that was necessary to keep the peace. Left to lead the League, London and Paris, partly from weakness, chose to reject the cooperation of Russia and to appease the Fascist dictatorships. This long and dismal story is not in Halle's book.

(2) That the British and French Governments did turn Central and East Europe over to Hitler at Munich, opening wide his way into the Soviet Union. In several places the book shows a clear understanding of the failure of the Munich sellout. It says that Russia's military security was at stake and that the Nazi-Soviet Pact naturally followed. Yet Munich is not recognized as the great decisive turning point whose consequences could never be retrieved or evaded. Beyond the weakness with which Halle sympathizes, the Western elites did intend to let the Fascists and the Communists fight it out—to the destruction of the Reds, which was confidently expected. When Germany attacked Russia in mid-1941, the overwhelming weight of British and American military opinion predicted its destruction in from six weeks to three months.

(3) That Britain and the United States did fight a peripheral war for two years, leaving the vast weight of the war on Russia. This policy was forced by Britain. It is fairly characterized by John Baggeley (in Containment and Revolution) as a "policy of wait and see, of easy choices and leisurely exploitation." It resulted in the decision to take the long way around through North Africa and Italy, where there were few Germans, leaving the mighty German armies to grind back and forth across the face of the Soviet Union for two full years, until they were defeated.

(4) That given the circumstances there was no way to conduct the war to checkmate Russia. From his balance of power turret Halle strongly deplores the unconditional surrender policy announced by the Allies on January 24, 1943. He wanted the war conducted in such a way that neither Germany nor Japan would be really conquered, thus leaving no vacuums for Russia to fill. But the desperately beset Russians did require absolute assurance that we were with them to the end, especially since we were so long in coming to their aid. They had to know that we would not play on both sides, as Truman wanted to on July 24, 1941, "and in that way let them kill as many as possible."

After the Russians had defeated the Germans, too, Churchill yearned to get up through the nonexistent "soft underbelly" of Europe into East Europe. But there was only one way by which a return sweep of the Russians could be forestalled, by a second-front thrust through Germany no later than early 1943—with enormous casualties accepted. But Churchill had prevented that and never wanted it. Nor did we. Up to the very end the West ardently desired the Russians to keep on hammering the Germans.

This was emphatically true at the Yalta Conference in January, 1945, when the Russians were already back in East Europe. In his references to this conference Halle's lack of acquaintance with the sources is evident. He twice repeats the Yalta myth that a mortally ill Roosevelt did not know what he was doing, stating: "it is plausible that the dying Roosevelt was hardly thinking at all, that he was simply improvising his positions on the issues as they arose."

Although FDR was undoubtedly failing rapidly, the authoritative accounts of Sherwood, Byrnes and Stettinius all clearly testify that FDR held up his end of the conference notably. Even the verbatim records showed it. He may have conceded a point or two at the end because he was tired, as were the others, but he participated "on fully equal terms day after day," and he headed the grand alliance toward victory in both Europe and Asia and a co-operative peace afterward.

(5) That until July 16, 1945—the date of our first atomic test explosion—Washington urgently wanted Russia to do a major part of the land fighting against Japan. This was a prime concern at Yalta and it was Truman's main reason for going to the Potsdam Conference. He records in his Memoirs that it was the thing "most urgent in my mind," a "matter which our military chiefs were most anxious to clinch."

Halle criticizes Roosevelt for conceding gains to Russia as recompense for this deeply desired major effort in the Far East; and there is no suggestion that our first two A-bombs were dropped on Japanese cities in all haste, August 6 and 9, 1945, to try to forestall Russia's entry into the war on August 8—at the cost of nearly 200,000 Japanese lives, mostly civilians. He has not read Atomic Diplomacy: Hiroshima and Potsdam, by Gar Alperovitz, or he chooses to ignore it. Instead of regretting the bad faith of our sudden attempt to end the war just as Russia's long and painful deployment to Manchuria had been completed, after years of urging by us, he speaks of the Red Army having "spilled out" beyond the borders of "the existing Russian empire" in the Far East.

(6) That the Truman Doctrine was the declaration of the cold war which started its dynamos. Halle's account of the making of the Truman Doctrine is fascinating. Truman was not competent to write a great message, so he had to depend on the bureaucracy, "operating by negotiation and compromise among its members, to provide him with a text." The result was a hodgepodge, "badly composed," lacking coherence, putting "last things first." Worst of all, "public relations specialists," who "could not possibly supply what was needed," were added and one of them threw in the sentence: "I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities."

According to Halle, in this entirely accidental way the great Truman Doctrine was born, shaking the world by forbidding all popular revolutions thereafter, a creed to which we still cling today, at spiraling costs to ourselves. The offending sentence was "so negligently placed in the text, and so negligently composed, that it could go quite unnoticed."

Yet Mr. Truman wrote a completely different account in his Memoirs, saying that the first version was "not at all to my liking." Filled with background materials and statistics it sounded "like an investment prospectus." So he returned the draft "asking for emphasis on a declaration of general policy." That was done but the new version "seemed to me half-hearted. The key sentence, for instance, read 'I believe it should be the policy of the United States' . . . [so] I scratched out 'should' and wrote in 'must.' In several other places I did the same thing. I wanted no hedging in this speech. This was America's answer to the surge of expansion of Communist tyranny. It had to be clear and free of hesitation or double talk." He was emphatic also about every nation being "faced with a choice between alternative ways of life." He repeated this in his radio address to the nation, along with "the key sentence. . . . The line had to be sharply drawn."

Halle evidently believes that containment did succeed and that like all great world conflicts, beginning with the Napoleonic Wars, the cold war "ends with the frustration of the challenge, with its containment or defeat in one way or another."

Did it? In Containment and Revolution Deutscher's verdict is that "In truth, throughout the Cold War the West has not been able to record any significant or lasting success anywhere." In the same collection, Henry W. Berger adds impressive evidence that there was never any Soviet challenge and that most of our high officials knew it.

As history, The Cold War as History has grave deficiencies. It is mystifying that a serious historian of the cold war should begin his work with the statement: "The circumstances out of which the Cold War arose are simple enough in outline . . . the Soviet Union had suddenly, as if by sleight of hand (italics added), effected the military conquest of the Eastern half of Europe." And it is perplexing to read near the end of the book that: "The initiative in the Cold War had, from the beginning, been with Moscow. Obsessed throughout its history with the fear of foreign encirclement, it had throughout its history been pushing against the encircling powers."

A nation which had been nearly done to death on its own soil three times since 1913 cannot be said to be "obsessed" by a proclaimed encirclement, backed up by a monopoly of atomic bombs.

Yet this is a valuable addition to the literature of the cold war. It recognizes the Truman Doctrine as an effort "to establish a Pax Americana all around the globe," in "an unlimited commitment"; it exposes the myth of the Red monolith and explains the folly of extending the cold war to Asia to defend "China against Chinese, Vietnam against Vietnamese, Asia against Asians." In Asia the author sees that the United States "encircled" and pressed Russia and China together, and "under its pressure the semblance of solidarity" between them was maintained "for almost a decade"; though he would not agree that our encircling pressures on Russia in Europe were even more self-defeating and wasteful.

No one has explained better the dynamism of action and reaction which propelled the American people to the point that until after 1950 they acted "unwisely, and brought the good name of the United States into a spreading disrepute that could only weaken its influence and its cause." Halle's account of the devastation which McCarthyism wrought in the State Department and the country is particularly valuable.

The narrative ends after the Cuban missile crisis of 1962. There are excellent chapters about the Eisenhower-Dulles years, with new glimpses of the efforts of the latter "to go to the brink" and to prevent the making of peace, in Europe and Asia.

The Cold War as History closes on a very ominous note, in consonance with the author's belief that our destinies must depend on balance of power manipulations: "In the new weapons, then, lay the hope of the world, no less than its peril, as it moved on into an unknown future." We are left sitting on our H-bombs, waiting for the third and final world war, in a time when nuclear weapons are due to be achieved soon by more and more governments.

Unmaking a Village

THE VILLAGE OF BEN SUC. By Jonathan Schell. Alfred A. Knopf. 132 pp. $3.95.

JONATHAN MIRSKY

Mr. Mirsky teaches at Dartmouth College and New York University.

"To the villagers of Ben Suc the National Liberation Front was not a band of roving guerrillas but the full government of their village." Exactly—that is why, on the 8th of January, 1967, the village was depopulated and then erased by American forces. Americans finally are learning a lesson in Vietnam: a guerrilla movement ultimately succeeds not by terror or brainwashing but by out-administering the government. This means persuading villagers that guerrilla taxes are more just, and guerrilla social services more encompassing than those of the government. Once villagers know this and feel guerrilla military protection to be long lasting, the government faces two choices: admit the village is lost ("insecure") or wipe it off the face of the earth.

Jonathan Schell's remarkable and justifiably famous book, first published in The New Yorker, bleakly and with little comment details what took place at Ben Suc. It provoked outraged cries of "foul" in Vietnam and from some reviewers in America (notably Time); charges of unfairness, warping, and making a mountain out of a molehill filled the air. After all, critics pointed out, two very important NLF cadres were captured (Bernard Fall interviewed them for The New Republic); great tunnels and dugouts underlay the whole village; the place was being used to send NLF supplies up and down the

The explosive new book that is sure to reopen the Kennedy assassination case!

"With painstaking care and formidable logic, Josiah Thompson demolishes the Warren Report by building a case for three assassins and at least four bullets."

—WILLIAM A. EMERSON, JR.,
The Saturday Evening Post

"A stunning and original work."
—SYLVIA MEAGHER

"Four years after Kennedy's assassination add the name of Thompson to the list of those who have shaken the public confidence in the Warren Commission Report and place him right on top of the list . . . more careful and more powerful than the Warren Report. It was not until this book that I became clear in my mind about some kind of collaborative shooting and about the trap that had been set for the President."

—MAX LERNER, New York Post

With more than 250 photographs, drawings, and charts

SIX SECONDS IN DALLAS

By JOSIAH THOMPSON

$8.95, now at your bookstore
BERNARD GEIS ASSOCIATES

Saigon River. Plainly what happened on January 8 was not undeserved.

The man who takes most of the credit for the operation assured me, however, that Schell's account is inaccurate. War is horrible, he conceded, and all refugee operations miserable. But this one was "the most humane in the history of the world." He told me, also, that Ben Suc had never been bombed before, was a dreadful village anyway, and had no schools. The villagers, he asserted, were better off in their new refugee camp, although they were still complaining.

How true is this? Schell tells us. The ARVN occupied Ben Suc from 1958 to 1964 (despite the fact that just before the operation the briefing officer announced, with Schell listening: "... it's been solid VC since the French pulled out in '56"). In 1965 the NLF took over and that year Americans bombed the center of the village. Thereafter, "Not only the destruction but the crashing of bombs and shells nearby and in the distance made life continuously nerve-racking, with everyone tensely ready to run to a bomb shelter at a moment's notice." Indeed, leaflets dropped on Ben Suc left no question: "Do you hear the planes? Do you hear the bombs? These are the sounds of DEATH: your DEATH."

Naturally there was a school in Ben Suc. Schell saw it. The villagers told me that because they were afraid of the bombing they kept their children at home.

As for the Ben Suc itself, we know from witnesses. Schell included, what a fine place it must have been, despite assurances that the villagers are much better off as refugees. Not only did a pacification officer describe it in glowing, nearly poetic terms but we have in Schell's book a native witness:

I play the guitar, and I liked to sing at night and drink with friends—to eat fish and drink until the sun came up. I am 31 now, and was married when I was 23. I have three children. I believe in Confucius and pray to Confucius to keep me from misfortune and to send me good luck, and for peace. On most days I would get up at 6 o'clock, eat, have a bath and then go out to the fields. At midday, I would come back, have another bath, and eat, and I would have a bath again when I stopped working at night.

There are significant elements in The Village of Ben Suc which students of Vietnam should note. First is the perpetual separation of Vietcong from "the people" (who are, however, termed "hostile civilians"). To admit that they might be one and the same would shatter the colossal lie of aggression which undergirds the American effort. Certain things follow. When a solitary cyclist is mowed down by a couple of GIs they at once turn him into a "VC." But such men were also husbands and fathers and residents of Ben Suc.

A recent reviewer chided Schell for not sympathizing with the Americans' lack of control over the Vietnamese government which does many wicked things. This is a second vital element, and Schell disposes of it. The Americans went to great lengths to keep the operation a total secret from their "counterparts;" so secret, in fact, that no refugee camp could be set up in advance for fear of spilling the beans. As the briefing officer said: "I think this really ought to be quite fascinating. There's this new element of surprise. . . ."

A third element is that the Vietnamese, especially the enemy, are said to be personally very cruel, while we never employ torture. Schell describes Vietnamese officers torturing NLF suspects while an American watches. All the principals are in a small room, and the only concern shown is that Schell, as a reporter, ruins the atmosphere. Another American asks him to leave. "Only the fear of force gets results. It's the Asian mind. . . . Look—they're a thousand years behind us in this place, and we're trying to educate them up to our level."

Well, yes. We certainly are educating them. And how quickly they learn—the prostitutes, pimps, black marketeers, arrangers of elections, deserters and all the rest of our students. An American captain told Schell: "There are three categories. I can't think of the third just now, but I can say that there's no middle road in this war. Either you're with us or against us." How little time, how little time. To learn to choose sides, to kill or simply to save your own life. The Ben Suc villager who used to play the guitar told Schell in the refugee camp: "Here it is safe—there will be no bombs and artillery. The crops in my fields have all been destroyed by chemicals and my elder brother was killed by a bomb. Many people were killed when the center of the village was bombed last year. Here we are protected by the American troops."

Playing for People

THE FEDERAL THEATRE, 1935-1939. By Jane De Hart Mathews. Princeton University Press. 342 pp. $8.50.

HAROLD CLURMAN

In America every generation seems to invent itself. Tradition is an empty word, history is a dead language, the past if not just quaint is not only obsolete but wicked. This may be farfetched. Still it is true that the greatest number among us are prime forgetters. This is what the sensible Gertrude Stein meant when she said, "Everything destroys itself in the twentieth century and nothing continues." Malraux must have written: "No man can build on the void, and a civilization that breaks with the styles at its disposal soon finds itself empty handed" for people like us.

Who now remembers the Federal Theatre of 1935-39? Jane De Hart Mathews does, and has written an objective but happily not entirely dispassionate book about it. For those too young to have known that remarkable phenomenon of the thirties, and for those so old they wish to forget it or are determined to recall it only in derision, Mrs. Mathews' book offers material for fruitful meditation.

The Federal Theatre was a project of the WPA (Works Progress Administration). The project was based on the proposition that the unemployed deserved socially useful jobs. The aim of this venture was to preserve the talents of unemployed actors, directors, designers and stagehands, and to bring the results of their talents to an audience of Americans virtually untouched by commercial theatre.

It was, to begin with, a relief project, more concerned with remedying the devastating unemployment problem of the depression years than with art. But the woman appointed as director of the WPA, Hallie Flanagan, realized that the project could serve its social purpose not only by creating jobs for theatre folk but by converting it into a true theatre on a national scale.

"At its height," Mrs. Mathews tells us in her admirably documented book, "the Federal Theatre employed approximately thirteen thousand people in projects scattered over thirty-one states." Hallie Flanagan was no mere functionary: she knew theatre intimately and explored its finest manifestations everywhere. The project became a political football kicked around by various interests whose most destructive arm was represented by Congress. Hallie Flanagan's dream and accomplishment were shattered by reactionary politicians.

Here are a few of the project's accomplishments: By mid-season of 1937, Fortune magazine reported, the project had played to approximately 16 million people and over the same period took in $80,000 at an average admission price of 30c. The all-Negro Macbeth had played for 144 performances, was seen by 130,000 people, grossed $40,000, and broke a nine-year attendance record. T. S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral ran to crowded houses and was seen by a total of more than 40,000 people. The Children's Theatre piled up an attendance of more than 250,000 in its first eight months; the New York Marioulette Theatre reached 1.5 million in its first two years. John Houseman produced Doctor Faustus and Labiche's Horse Eats Hat, directed and acted by the then unknown Orson Welles. Virgil Thomson wrote music for the latter play; Abe Feder did the lighting.

The project developed a new theatre form, the Living Newspaper, of which the most memorable example was One Third of A Nation, designed by Howard Bay. Blitzstein's The Cradle Will Rock, though momentarily suppressed, still reached the stage through the determination of Orson Welles and his associates, abetted by public support. Eight hundred plays (including Shaw and O'Neill cycles) in six different languages were presented in innumerable towns most of us had never heard of, for audiences that had never before seen a curtain go up. It is an exciting record.

Some will say that any government sponsorship of theatre must always end as an impediment to artistic freedom. This may have been true during the New Deal years: "Culture!" one Congressman screamed, "what the hell—let 'em have a pick and shovel," a sentiment more discreetly echoed at the time by a New York Times editorial. Such sentiments may still hold for some citizens (didn't Harry Truman some years later declare most artists "bums"?), but it is hardly true in Sweden, France, Germany, and thus far in Britain. But this is not the issue at the moment; I am not one who seeks to "save the theatre" through propaganda for the establishment of a National Theatre.

What the Federal Theatre story indicates is that despite competition by all the mechanical media there is still a real appetite for "living" theatre in this country, which can be further whetted and developed if certain conditions are set up for the purpose—which Broadway won't and can't do. The first and essential step is to divorce the idea of theatre from the rule of entertainment for profit. Out of necessity our government in 1935 was obliged to undertake the task; the results proved that for all the opposition, hazards, pitfalls—amply illustrated in Mrs. Mathews' book—impressively creative work can be achieved.

The project also demonstrated that under truly committed, imaginative, knowledgeable leadership a rebirth of vital theatre in this country can be effected. The boards of too many of our "permanent" companies are artistic ignoramuses. If the lessons implied in Mrs. Mathews' book were followed we might in time develop a new impetus in our theatre instead of being exhilarated to the point of silly ejaculations every time a "good show" (The Little Foxes, for example) is produced.

Nation Book Marks

ALAN CHEUSE

Mr. Cheuse is a fellow in comparative literature at Rutgers University.

GAME IN HEAVEN WITH TUSSY MARX. By Piers Paul Read. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 160 pp. $4.95.

Read's approach to the novel is as refreshing as his personal mark upon it is repulsive. The "game" here is a dialogue in the anteroom of heaven among Karl Marx's daughter, a duchess and a snotty young Englishman. Below on earth people are massing for revolution. To amuse his companions, the young Englishman improvises upon the events below, invents the history of Watkinson (a party member who sells out to the CIA) and of Hereward, a leader who sells out for love, moves on to debauchery, and returns shriven to head a puritanical revolt. Tussy Marx worked for socialism but she died for love—poisoning herself when her lover turned from her. Love is the stronger drive, the genuine magnet, the young Englishman informs us by way of his narrative.

A second "game" here is with the form. The time of the discussion is indeterminate—good for Heaven—but the narrative is spaced and titled in such a way—"Five Years Later," "Ten Years Later"—that a sense of chronology is imposed on the revolutionary portions: occasionally a snippet of an unnamed Latin revolution turns up to give the sense that all this is arbitrarily invented, yet concerning more than the specific revolution below. Once there is even a reference by number to an earlier page of the book. Thus an extended jibe at left-wing sentiment becomes a jeu d'es-

Good News From INDIA

Two books which show how workable political institutions in India are being built regardless of slow economic development. This achievement may very well be applicable to all developing nations.

PARTY BUILDING IN A NEW NATION The Indian National Congress By Myron Weiner

In a country beset by caste, class, religious, and linguistic conflicts, India's National Congress party is remarkable for having provided a stable government for at least 20 years. How did the party do it? In a study of five districts in India, the author examines Indian local politics and shows how the party is going about reconciling the interests of a rural society with the need for change. Professor Weiner is senior staff member of the Center for International Studies at M.I.T. and serves as consultant on South Asia to the State Department. $11.00

THE MODERNITY OF TRADITION Political Development in India By Lloyd I. Rudolph and Susanne Hoebler Rudolph

Few institutions seem to be less amenable to the establishment of the democratic process than India's caste system. Here is an account of how a very gradual transformation of traditional institutions has helped, rather than hindered, the transition of India's peasant society to representative democracy. The authors, who are on the faculty of the University of Chicago, have done much field work in India. $8.75

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Is there a nation to have a magazine about?

Of course there is. The United States was founded on purpose, not by mindless accident. But that purpose is not served either by pigheaded obstinacy or by dropping out.

From its beginnings, shortly after the Civil War, our magazine has existed to test, to criticize, and to reaffirm the American purpose.

We have always been concerned with what America is really about. John V. Lindsay defined our role well when he called us:

"a publication which has advanced the public interest and which understands that truthful speaking by an enlightened public is essential to a nation's well-being."

will you help us broaden that discourse a little?

Fill in below the name and address of someone you like to talk to—a thoughtful person. Or better, list two or three such people. We'll send them a free copy of the NATION and ask them to join us for the year ahead.

NAME

ADDRESS

CITYSTATEZIP

NAME

ADDRESS

CITYSTATEZIP

NAME

ADDRESS

CITYSTATEZIP

YOUR NAME

ADDRESS

CITYSTATEZIP

There is no reward for this neighborly deed but we would like to send you a reprint of an article by our former publisher George Kirstein—an article which bears on what we're talking about. It's called "The Myths of the Small Magazine."

Tear out this page and send to the NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

NA-1-8-68

prit whose mechanism is more interesting than its snide contents.

THE VALE OF LAUGHTER. By Peter De Vries. Little, Brown & Co. 352 pp. $5.95.

"Call me, Ishmael . . . call me anything you want, Ish, baby," is the cultural wisecrack that opens this long narrative of the life and death of an epic practical joker. There are dozens more, such as, "Is my craft ebbing?" The answer is no. De Vries has more skills than most lampoonists of the American scene, particularly in his description of Joe Sandwich and his wife making love while plugged in to data-recording equipment. But beneath his slick surfaces the water is 2 inches deep.

Joe Sandwich was a stockbroker and liked his job. If he and his wife dressed in funny costumes to have sex it's all in the spirit of that great home remedy, laughter. Wally Hines, who narrates the last third of the book, is a pedantic expert on comedy; only after Joe has died because of his negligence, does he discover that the joker had cuckolded him. Ironical? Well, things work out so that he can use his passions in a practical, homey way. This is an adolescent book, written with the skill of an octogenarian, and it offers no redeeming social value whatsoever.

PEOPLE IN GLASS HOUSES. By Shirley Hazzard. Alfred A. Knopf. 179 pp. $4.95.

Having worked at the United Nations for ten years, Miss Hazzard would appear now to be at the job of wrecking it. Mutual characters link these eight "Portraits from Organization Life," seven of which are set in an unnamed glass structure on the East River, one in the Mediterranean. From secretaries to section heads, those who are supposed to be aiding the people of the world are all in need of assistance to the arid and depressed areas of their own souls and underdeveloped hearts. A florid departure from the prepared text of the director's speech can cause more debate than world problems; a man's "permanent" contract is not renewed; mounds of paper orders yield a mouse of action. Miss Hazzard depicts the ennui of the modern bureaucrat with pity and her mastery over the commonplace of file cabinet and cafeteria does not diminish the effect of her rage at the rise of hollow men. The first chapter begins with a torrent of jargon and the last ends with a carefully composed buck-passing letter that any modern machine might be proud of. As Pandar said to Troilus while the young knight teetered on the brink of the inhumane, "Everybody does it."

CAUGHT IN THAT MUSIC. By Seymour Epstein. The Viking Press. 307 pp. $5.95.

Against a background of New York in 1939—World's Fair, the breakup of the Federal Theatre Project, the ideological side show of the Communist Party and the drift into war—young Gould pursues a sensuous understanding of himself and his relationship to his family, friends and the world. Epstein plots the tale neatly, but in his effort to encompass the mediocre and the sublime, turns the action on crucial metaphors. They work when he is dealing with things (a piece of pastry "as big as a fielder's glove"); but not with states of being ("She revealed the raw, ugly sores of her disappointments. . . . She would meet him with her latest rage hot in her eyes, and even though they were to make love, and she would lose herself temporarily in other fires . . . the first blaze was more enduring."). Like Gould playing handball, he shows "a generous gift of muscle" and some neat tricks on his serve; but he confuses athletics with aesthetics.

TELEVISION

JOHN HORN

The great thing about Westerns is that they make life simple, and the audience knows immediately who to root for. Now the whole image has been blown sky high by the revelation that the name (Paladin), slogan ("Have Gun, Will Travel"), symbol (a chess knight) and calling card of one of television's good guys were borrowed without compensation from an automobile mechanic, who was incensed enough to sue for a share in some of the TV loot that the serial has earned.

The mechanic, Victor DeCosta of Johnston, R. I., used to dress in black and wear a fierce mustache, just as Richard Boone later did on TV. At rodeos, parades and other public events he passed out cards bearing his symbol and slogan, once again just about as Boone did later.

DeCosta brought suit, won a $150,000 verdict from a Providence jury, and then had the decision struck down by the United States Court of Appeals, an action recently upheld when the Supreme

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

JAMES N. ROSENBERG PAPERS

A distinguished collection of public and private papers from the long, rich and rewarding life of a well-known lawyer, painter and public figure. Illustrated. $10.

VINCENT MARASIA PRESS.

Mamaroneck, New York

The Bennington Review

r. p. blackmur david smith georges guy julia randall others

articles, poetry, photographs, drawings, graphics
$1 Box # 1, Bennington College, Bennington, Vt. 05201

FROM A NOVEMBER JOURNAL

In my flight jacket, hole in my sole
and maple brimstone fallen,
I'll strike for Eden.
Hawk cast, black elderberry, grow light in light snow;
question mark squirrel tail, flow at half-mast
that rhinestone veil.
Predictable hand,
feel day's eye daisy, loving you not though elegant still and frozen:
count ten on your doomsday air
and run for eleven,
knocking acorns
over inclined earth
before trying heaven
—presto, Augustinel
'love with care,
and then what you will,
do.'
Brother, upon Eden
I'll set my shoe—
but first, curious in frabjous light,
I run my hand
across the furious land of my face—oh
and hurt my hand:
It is my own kid
face I run over.
November's rough for flight in a flight jacket that partially hid two lovers.

RAYMOND ROSELIEP

Court declined to review the appeals finding.

If DeCosta failed, from lack of copy-right, to get some of the television-series money, he did win vindication. The appeals court rejected the testimony of the show's writers and producers that they had imagined the Paladin character out of thin air; details were too similar to DeCosta's characterization of a decade before the TV series began. The 59-year-old mechanic, the court said, "has had the satisfaction of proving the defendants pirates." The defendants in the suit included C.B.S., which telecast the show from 1957 to 1963, and C.B.S. Films (now C.B.S. Enterprises), which still syndicates the series.

Boone, we're happy to note, had no part in the piracy. He's still a good guy.

IN MEMORIAM

Irving Gitlin died the other week, a victim of leukemia. He was a producer of some fine documentaries for radio and television, but his importance and influence in the field of broadcasting extends far beyond the product of his keen and compassionate mind.

What I find most significant about Gitlin's career—he was only 49—is that, though apparently destined by education, inclination and temperament to a career in education, he turned to broadcasting and found in it work worthy of his talents. He did teach for a while but after four years with the Marines during World War II, joined C.B.S., where he won many honors before going on to N.B.C., then his own production company and more distinguished awards.

Many of his series or programs were mentioned in the obituaries—Out of Darkness (on mental illness), the N.B.C. White Papers, The Nation's Nightmare (on crime), and others. One of his real achievements was not.

In the 1950s, he took over a series called The Search, an investigation of man's quest for knowledge through research projects in the nation's universities, after most of the series' funds had been exhausted by others in fruitless, fiction-form experimentation. Gitlin not only brought the series back to reality; he stretched the remaining money, wangled more, reoriented the programs and produced a series that both a general audience and the intellectual community found admirable.

He dealt in the actual accomplishments and aspirations of man, and by his sensitive handling and uncompromising standards of excellence he brought much honor to broadcasting as well as to himself. He gave his audiences much more than he ever got and showed the industry where its pride and honor might be found.

ART

MAURICE GROSSER

Mr. Grosser, artist and writer, is the author of The Critic's Eye (Bobbs-Merrill).

Taranto, Italy

Taranto lies on the instep of Italy just where the heel begins, an easygoing town quite out of character with that unbridled dance, the tarantella, which bears its name. The island and two adjacent points of land on which it is built shut off a bay from the Ionian Sea to form a natural harbor. It has no famous monuments and few tourists, good seafood, wine of three colors, white, red (which is really pink) and black, and a lively and well-dressed population whose early evening promenade produces a daily and expected traffic jam. It is one of the oldest towns of Italy, begun in 708 B.C., as a Spartan colony imposed on an earlier Greek or Mycenaean settlement. It was one of the richest of the city states of Magna Graecia, later a prosperous Roman City. Today it is the principal Italian military base.

Its museum was established late, in 1907, and occupies a compact and severe structure in the center of town, a disaffected Spanish convent dedicated to S. Pasque di Baylon. The collection it displays is principally of local origin—ceramics, terra cottas, sculpture and jewelry—coming for the most part from tombs that are brought to light each time a sewer is dug or a new building constructed. In fact, the showcases are named for the streets where the objects were found—Via Messaria, D'Aquina, Via Duca dei Abruzzi (where my car was being serviced). The tombs themselves, difficult to visit because in the cellars of private houses, have, most of them, murals like the Etruscan tombs farther north. The objects they have preserved make up the most complete collection of Greek ceramics to be found outside the Archaeological Museum of Athens or possibly the British Museum, so rich a collection that there is room for only a small portion to be displayed.

Vases such as these were never intended to serve as ordinary tableware, even in a palace. They were domestic treasures, precious possessions to be proudly displayed in cabinets. Many, in fact, are decorated only on the side which was to be seen. They were art objects, costly enough to serve as prizes in the great athletic contests and honorific enough to accompany the dead on their last journey.

Taranto, provincial and rich, from the beginning imported the best. Almost no vases of local origin are to be found in tombs earlier than the 3rd century B.C. The oldest of the vases, from the end of the 8th century B.C., are decorated with linear patterns in the Geometric style. Some of them might be mistaken for the work of American Indians; a few retain the older characteristic Mycenaean shapes.

Beginning with the 7th century B.C., on to the middle of the 6th, almost all the vases come from Corinth. The geometric motifs disappear, to be replaced by motifs derived from people and animals, and there is greater variety and fantasy in the shapes—small perfume bottles, for example, in the form of rabbits, goats, feet in sandals, bulls' heads with men's faces, etc. Along with this Corinthian ware, there are also imports from the Ionian Islands, from Rhodes and Chios, and a considerable collection of the rarest of all Grecian ware, pottery from Sparta.

Before Lycurgus took over, Sparta was a Greek city state like any other, and like many others made and exported its local art. Very little of the pottery has survived. It has been found only here in Taranto, in Cyrene in North Africa—another Spartan colony—and in Sparta itself. The clay of the vessels is pale gray and very fine, the pottery walls extremely thin. The shapes are sparse and sober. There are bowls decorated with fish and geese, a cup with Zeus and his eagle and, particularly beautiful, a two-handled cup with no decoration at all save a broad band of black and the natural elegance of its proportions.

Somewhere between 575 and 550 B.C. the Attic imports begin to appear and quickly they take over the market. The oldest of these are still, like the Corinthian, in the black figured style—that is the figures are in black silhouettes on the red or tan background of fired clay. But the Attic decorations are more lively with much finer detail—cups with tiny dancing satyrs, or banquets with the diners reclining on high couches, feeding from small tables placed below them, and watching the cavorting en-

AS I COME HOME

The players cry
"Reason" in Hamlet
 And it is a ghost.
 My own face
 Shuffles at the windowpane.
 Whatever I look through
 Is deception—clear as that Ghostly player crying
"Reason" when I hear "Revenge."
 And murder is loose
 On the broad highway,
 My family digging for Shelter as I come home,
 Saying,
 I give you this gift
 Of reason.

HARVEY SHAPIRO

tertainers. Three big jars, all from the same tomb, are marked with the symbol of Athens—Athene leaning on her staff beside a column on which is perched a rooster. These jars, according to the inscriptions on them and the scenes of sport depicted, were prizes awarded for wrestling in the quadrennial Athenian games. Since there are three, it is reasonable to suppose that the defunct to whom the jars belonged held the wrestling championship for twelve years.

The red figured style, where the background is painted black and the figures are left in the natural color of the clay, came in about 530 B.C. and henceforth was adopted as standard technique. Around 450, the white figured style appeared and lasted only till the end of the century. All the white figured vases have the same shape, a sort of cylindrical bottle with a foot called a lekythos, and the scenes depicted on them—Oedipus and the Sphinx, a group of mourning women, and so on—seem to indicate that they were made only for funerary purposes. The drawing is in black on a white ground. To judge from the character of the line, it was apparently executed with a Chinese-style conical brush held at right angles to the surface. Here is the high point of Greek vase painting. The drawing has an economy and a precision found only in the finest Chinese scrolls, and furnishes one of the few hints we have as to how classical Greek painting might have looked.

At this point in the collection, from one room to the next, the work on display loses all character and quality. The preceding vases are all imports from Greece itself. The pottery one comes to now is of local origin and quite inferior. Taranto has begun at length to manufacture its own. The end of the 4th century B.C. is the critical date. From that point on the shapes are less interesting and the drawing hasty and florid. Signed pieces disappear, to be replaced by mass production. The same degeneration occurs in the vases made in Greece itself. Perhaps the Tarantine factories had forced the mainland workshops into mass production too. At any rate, the classical tradition of ceramics is now dead, and its epicene survivors, here and in Greece, are equally inferior.

Then, quite unexpectedly, a new, unclassical style appears, a revival as sudden and as radical as our own modern art, with vigorous new shapes and bright new colors. The first of such pieces shown at Taranto were found near Gnatia—molded black ware with raised patterns picked out with color. And next, even more striking and handsome, a set of 2nd-century polychromes found near Cannossa—tall vases in bright colors, pink, blue-green and white, enhanced by touches of gold, on a pale terra-cotta ground, and decorated with little figures both in the round and raised in bas-relief. The vases are of strange proportions, graced with a sort of folk-art elegance and completely without Attic influence. The style is perhaps of Alexandrian origin; examples have been found in that vicinity. At any rate it is clearly part of that renaissance in art called Hellenistic, which abandoned the classical forms to pursue a humane realism and a delineation of motion, a renaissance which is responsible for such marvelous still existing works as the little jockey in the Athens museum or, in the museum at Rabat, the bronze head of a youth said to represent King Juba II, son-in-law to Anthony and Cleopatra. This renaissance is particularly well represented in the Taranto museum's collection of terra cottas.

It is more than likely that most of the figurines we know as Tanagras are actually from Taranto. Its terra-cotta production was enormous. The museum possesses a complete collection, from the 7th century B.C. down to Imperial Rome—some 40,000 examples, and not only the objects themselves but even the molds from which they were cast. The earlier are all cult objects: ex-votos, figures of the gods, of Demeter, of Kore, of Dionysius and the two Dioscuri, heroes of Spartan origin held in much honor here; images of the dead, and replicas of fruit and vegetables to be used as offerings. The very earliest were individually made, but by the 6th century, mass production had begun. The figures were cast from molds but then, perhaps, retouched, for some are signed. Much of this early work is commonplace. A few pieces, like an archaic fragment of the thighs and torso of a warrior, are extremely beautiful. The really wonderful ones are later—Hellenistic—and made not as cult objects but as objets d'art—little figures in the

SOVIET UNION and EASTERN EUROPE

(Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Yugoslavia)

Enjoy the trip of a lifetime with one of these wonder tours planned by America's foremost specialists. Here's a wide range of itineraries fitting every taste and budget. Specify folder you want.

- Russian Language Seminars in the USSR, 21-day tours from $645 complete.
- 8-week Russian Language program in the USSR, providing UNIVERSITY CREDIT.
- Eastern Capitals Tours, 6 countries, weekly departures. From $111 complete.
- Russia-Siberia-Mongolia Tour. Escorted departure, July 30th.
- Scandinavia and East Europe.
- Medical Treatment in the USSR, from $111 for 20 days.
- Group and individual tours.
- We obtain visas.

Afton Tours, Inc.

1776 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10019

Phone: (212) 757-9595

WRITERS

N. Y. publisher wants books on art subjects, fiction, nonfiction. No fee for professional opinion. FREE: Brochures that show how your book can be published, publicized, sold; contracts. Write Dept. 147A

EXPOSITION PRESS INC.
 388 Park Ave. So., New York, N. Y. 10017

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

1-8-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
 $1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS!

ALL change of address notices, orders for subscriptions and other correspondence, should be sent to:

THE NATION, 222 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

Tanagra style, tiny ladies with their beautifully coifed small heads, moving in voluminous gowns which conceal of the body everything except its grace and carriage. Such dressmaking as this, and such depiction of speed and motion, are to be found nowhere else in classical antiquity.

To supplement this show of grace there is the most complete array of Greek and Roman jewelry I have seen—diadems composed of pointed pink sea shells, of oak and laurel leaves imitated in thin gold; one diadem with gold and enamel flowers poised on springs which shivered as the wearer moved; earrings with birds, with geese, with dolphins; silver and bronze mirrors whose backs bear scenes with figures in high relief; pins, brooches, pendants, rings and bracelets, more precious in their design than in their gold and stones. There are also some fine Roman mosaics and some sculpture—an Eros in the Praxiteles style, with cool transparent flesh; a sarcophagus from the time of Hadrian—imported from an Athenian workshop: it is in Pentelic marble—deep cut with illustrations from the Trojan War. Venice has a similar one from the same workshop. Also a head of the young Augustus with those markedly outstanding ears which seem to have been a characteristic of the Julian clan.

There is also a display of treasures—hoards of coins found buried in the ground or plastered up in a wall, hidden away from relatives and thieves and then forgotten. These are mostly in the coins of Taranto and the nearby cities and are stamped with the Tarantine youth on a dolphin, the wheat head of Mesapontum, the bull of Sybaris, the tripod of Croton. There is a Byzantine treasure, an Arab treasure, and even a 19th-century treasure marked by the heads of Queen Victoria and Louis Philippe. The most touching one was found in the tomb of a child—a rusted bronze piggy bank containing a treasure of tiny silver obols, none larger than the cross section of a pea.

LETTERS (Continued from page 34)

sit-in protesting university cooperation with Selective Service, earlier in 1966, he praised the students in the face of nearly unanimous faculty attack. Before and after, he had been active in left-wing campus activities. His scholarship, likewise, has not been characterized by deference. His work on American colonial history has attempted to reconstruct a distinctive "ideology of the inarticulate," in a department dominated by historians (such as colonial historian Daniel Boorstin) oriented to finding in America's past a history of ideological consensus. McNeil, however, has stated that the judgment against Lemisch was a scholarly one and (his remark notwithstanding) that Lemisch's politics were never "mentioned . . . during the deliberations." When questioned further he has stressed the "confidentiality" of these proceedings. Lemisch is at present on a one-year terminal appointment.

Is a political firing alien to the present spirit of the University of Chicago? Three months after the sit-in, Soja Mentschikoff, senior professor of law, stated: "I consider any member of the faculty . . . who urged students to participate in the sit-in in the Administration Building as lacking judgment . . . In connection with any appointment, this evidence of lack of judgment would be a factor that I personally would weigh." . . .

At about the same time, Daniel Boorstin wrote in a nationally syndicated column that "reputable institutions" had been over-tolerant of dissenting professors. Perhaps most revealing of the Chicago faculty's attitude to dissidence, discussions with Staughton Lynd concerning a one-year appointment at Chicago were discontinued in the summer of 1967, after he made a public statement in support of Lemisch—which some of Lynd's prospective employers called evidence of "bad judgment." . . .

The same attitude toward dissidence extends to students, both present and prospective. A second, nonobstructive sit-in in 1967 led to the suspension of fifty-eight students. Earlier, an applicant to the university who mentioned activist inclinations, and said that his father had been fired for political reasons during the McCarthy period, was rejected after then Admissions Director Charles O'Connell wrote in his file, "We have enough kids here who cause trouble," and, "You can see what kind of a family he comes from." . . . O'Connell is now Dean of Students.

Accusations of political repression at the University of Chicago tend to be discounted because of Chicago's reputation as a libertarian institution. Yet the list is growing of Chicago dissidents who have been quietly smashed by their colleagues or the administration. To them—if not to the professors who bask in the conflict-free atmosphere maintained by these very acts of repression—it is increasingly apparent that Chicago's libertarian reputation is no longer deserved.

Christopher Z. Hobson demise of the parties

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: There isn't much that an ordinary citizen can do for his country other than try to be a good citizen, and, on occasion, congratulate those whose power to influence public opinion is great, and who use it to strike at the sappers who undermine our traditional democratic institutions.

Your publication, Dec. 11, of the article by Democratic Cong. George E. Brown, Jr., of the 29th California district, "I Am Tired of Your Gimmicks," is worthy of such congratulation, as is your editorial, "John Wayne's Green Beret" and its exposure as fake and fraud by Variety. . . .

It is encouraging to note that Mr. Brown detects "some faint sign that the American two-party system may . . . present to the electorate a reasoned choice of policies in next year's election." I believe there is a rapidly mounting public conviction that, unless the major parties do re-establish adherence to principles of political morality by which they may be distinguished and disciplined, we shall witness the demise of our long experiment of government by representatives of parties which once were meaningful political commitments, alike to the elected and the electorate. . . .

Charles H. Meacham

Crossword Puzzle No. 1231

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 12 across Ebb and flow, but not like Washington's sometime follower. (11,7)
- 9 Was Falstaff so constrained in his role? (8)
- 10 Concerning the meat display? (6)
- 11 Came across fragments of minerals in the sky. (7)
- 12 See 1 across
- 14 See 23 down
- 15 The first could be the last, but one could help another. (8)
- 17 Drop screen. (8)
- 20 Paper resembling the outside of 10, un-noted. (6)
- 22 Works hard at making music? (7)
- 24 See 3 down
- 26 What happened to things last month? (6)
- 27 See 6 down
- 28 This first with the checker match results, or not allowed to participate! (11)

DOWN:

- 2 One has to keep the speaker in sight, but another type would never pass the speed course. (3, 6)
- 3 and 24 across Made by one who failed to lock the proverbial barn door? (5,2,7)
- 4 Acts agreeable, but isn't very alert. (4)
- 5 Pirate stronghold, more than one being dry. (7)

6 and 27 across How some daily papers come out for the play? (5, 2, 6)

- 7 A New York ball player is in the wrong age bracket, but might still show life. (6)
- 8 Fish to catch, somewhat like rock. (6)
- 16 The character of the mail needs to be sorted. (9)
- 18 The trouble with one who weaves? (6)
- 19 Goes along with the lover and the poet—of imagination all compact, according to Shakespeare. (7)
- 20 This sort of slave is needed to carry your belongings. (7)
- 21 Sounds antithetical to wind? False! (6)
- 23, 14 across and 13 down Not what vaporizers are intended to give, though it might be needed for a start. (1,4,4,2,5)
- 25 Game for plungers? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1230

ACROSS: 1 Fudge; 4 Babylonia; 10 Almanac; 11 and 12 Time table; 13 Rest; 16 Allowed; 17 Extends; 19 Enchant; 22 Drifter; 24 and 26 Plumbing; 29 Impious; 30 Troikas; 31 and 25 Tierra del Fuego; 32 Larva. DOWN: 1 First rate; 2 and 24 down Decimal point; 3 Edam; 4 and 28 Body and soul; 5 Braille; 6 Lump; 7 Nankeen; 8 Ascot; 14 Tweak; 15 Strip; 18 Saragossa; 20 Crumple; 21 Trussed; 22 Digital; 23 Thicker; 27 and 9 Poor Richard.

PERSONALS

THE UNIVERSITY OF LEEDS BROTHERTON LIBRARY

Applicants are invited for the post of UNIVERSITY LIBRARIAN and KEEPER OF THE BROTHERTON COLLECTION at a salary of not less than £3,750, vacant on the pending retirement of Mr. B. F. Page.

Applications (16 copies), stating age, qualifications and experience, together with the names of three referees, should reach the Registrar and Secretary, The University, Leeds 2, England (from whom further particulars may be obtained), not later than 31st January 1968. Applicants overseas may apply in the first instance by cable, naming three referees, preferably in the United Kingdom. In reply, please quote 68/63/1.

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

PEACE IS A HUMAN RIGHT.
Metal License size & Make Love—Not War $1.25, 2/$2; Get Out of Vietnam (Dayglow) 25c, 12 kinds/$2; Peace Pencils, 7 kinds, 25/$1.00 Plentysm, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

PHYSICIAN AND LAYMAN wanted to select war-injured children for evacuation to U.S. for surgery. Minimum 6 months each. Adequate stipend. Contact Mrs. Smith, Committee of Responsibility, 60 Madison Avenue, N.Y. (212) 889-4210.

McCarthy in '68, Reagan & Lassie in '68, Johnson for Ex-President RFK in '68, Dump Johnson in '68, Kill for Peace king-size bumper strips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802, Chicago, Illinois 60690

MALE, early 20's, to act as companion and tutor to 21-year-old young man with partial disability for one year in the Southern California area. Well paid. Interesting opportunity for social and education contacts. Must be mature, responsible person with social skills. Preferably background in Psychology. Write to: Child Development Lab., 16 Blossom Street, Boston, Mass. 02114.

IF YOU ARE 30-60, if you live in NYC, and if you are occasionally lonesome and would enjoy stimulating, interesting companionship, write for information to: TWOgether Associates, Dept. 16, 38 East 57 St., N.Y.C.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

COLUMBIA STEREO TAPE CLUB

now offers you

ANY 5 STEREO TAPES FREE

Value up to $46.75 at regular Club prices

If you begin your membership by purchasing just one tape now, and agree to purchase as few as five additional selections during the coming year, then the 50th tape you buy will be offered FREE!

5110. The Supremes Sing Rodgers & Hart. 12 songs. 10 in all.

5840. "An All Time Great Screen Musical" Variety.

5733. Benjamin's Greatest Hits. 12 songs. 10 in all.

5880. Plus: When It's Over, Love Him. Happiness On Me.

FREE-if you join now

Just drop the end of the tape over this reel, start your recorder, and watch it thread itself! Unique Scotch process automatically threads up tape of any thickness, releases freely on rewind.

5233. ANDY WILLIAMS — Born Free. Somewhere My Love. etc.

5358. HERB ALPERT — THE TIJUANA BRASS — Sounds Like. 12 songs.

5486. FRANK SINATRA — The World We Knew (Over And Over). 10 in all.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5840. Plus: When It's Over, Love Him. Happiness On Me.

3782. Musical fantasy for the young at heart.

5540. Also: Pride, William Tell, etc.

5370. Plus: We Love to Boogie, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

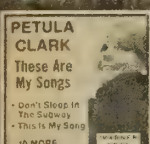

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

5178. Plus: What My Heart Sings, etc.

THERE MUST BE A REASON WHY the famous Columbia Stereo Tape Club sells more pre-recorded 4-track stereo tapes than any store in the country! It's because so many thousands of tape recorder owners find Club membership the easy and economical way to get all the tapes they want! And to introduce you to the many benefits of membership, you may select any five of the stereo tapes shown here, and we'll send them to you FREE! That's right... 5 FREE STEREO TAPES, and all you need do is purchase one tape now at the regular Club price, and agree to purchase as few as five more tapes during the coming year. In short, at the end of a year, you'll have at least eleven brand-new stereo tapes, and you'll have paid for only six!

HOW THE CLUB OPERATES: Each month you'll receive your free copy of the Club's magazine which describes and displays tapes for many different listening interests and from many different manufacturers. You may accept the regular selection for the field of music in which you are primarily interested, or take any of the scores of other tapes offered you, or take no tape at all that month.

TAPES SENT ON CREDIT. Upon enrollment, the Club will open a charge account in your name... and that means that you'll pay for the tapes you want only after you've received them and are enjoying them. The tapes you want will be mailed and billed to you at the regular Club price of $7.95 (occasional Original Cast recordings somewhat higher), plus a small mailing and handling charge.

YOU GET MORE FREE TAPES! Once you've completed your enrollment agreement, you'll get a stereo tape of your choice FREE for every two tapes you purchase!

SEND NO MONEY NOW! Just fill in and mail the coupon today! Your five FREE tapes and your first selection will soon be in your home for you to enjoy for years to come!

Note: All tapes offered by the Club must be played back on 4-track stereo equipment.

APO, FPO addressees: write for special offer

COLUMBIA STEREO TAPE CLUB • Terre Haute, Indiana

SEND NO MONEY—JUST MAIL COUPON

COLUMBIA STEREO TAPE CLUB
Terre Haute, Indiana 47808

I AM BUYING
THIS TAPE NOW
(fill in number)

Please enroll me as a member of the Club. I've indicated at the right the five tapes I wish to receive FREE. I've also indicated the tape I am buying now as my first selection, for which I will be billed $7.95, plus postage and handling. Include the self-threading take-up reel FREE.

ALSO SEND THESE 5 TAPES — FREE!

My main musical interest is (check one):
☐ CLASSICAL ☐ POPULAR

In addition to the first selection I am buying now, I agree to purchase five additional selections during the coming year... and I may cancel membership at any time thereafter. If I continue, I am to receive a stereo tape of my choice FREE for every two additional selections I accept.

Name.....
(Please Print) First Name Initial Last Name

Address.....

City..... State..... Zip.....

418-3/49

THE LOS ANGELES TIMES PHIL KERBY

THE NATION

JANUARY 15, 1968 35 cents

JAN 18 1968

PROTEST, POWER and THE FUTURE OF POLITICS

CAREY McWILLIAMS

The Advancement School North Carolina
Kills Its Dream DAVID COOPER

JAPAN IN ASIA'S FUTURE

W. MACMAHON BALL

After 50 Years . . .
Communist Dreams and Soviet Reality

DAVID JOHNSKY / EDWARD J. BROWN / JOHN BERGER

5-21-68R PL5-149
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Draft resisters

Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR SIRs: Readers of "After the Mobilization: The Goals of Dissent" by Lawrence Grauman, Jr. (The Nation, Dec. 11) may be interested to know that growing numbers within the intellectual and academic communities are publicly declaring their support for draft resisters, as did the 300 persons involved in the Conscientious Resistance action at the Justice Department on Oct. 20.

Over 1,500 persons have joined Robert McAfee Brown, Alexander Calder, William Sloane Coffin, Noam Chomsky, Paul Goodman, Arthur Miller, Ashley Montagu, Philip Roth and many other distinguished figures in signing "A Call to Resist Illegitimate Authority" which urges "open resistance to the war and the draft." RESIST, the group formed around the statement, has undertaken the job of developing a network of local adult groups which will encourage and support draft resistance throughout the nation. We are already in contact with fifty groups.

Our other immediate major objective is launching a resistance defense fund to defend those resisters who are being picked off by government in what Prof. Franz Schurmann of the University of California at Berkeley describes as "a national policy of creeping and selective repression." Besides dozens of draft-age resisters whose induction is being accelerated, several over-30 academics have been reclassified 1-A after having returned their draft cards. An evening with Norman Mailer, Robert Lowell, Noam Chomsky, Tom Hayden and others is scheduled at Town Hall in New York on Jan. 14 to raise money for support of draft resistance.

Anyone wishing information on adult support groups for draft resistance in their area should write to Room 4, 763 Massachusetts Avenue, Cambridge, Mass., 02139.

Paul Lauter, National Director, RESIST grateful Hungarian

Amherst, Mass.

DEAR SIRs: As one of the former editors of the Hungarian Literary Review mentioned by name in Robert Major's letter [The Nation, Nov. 27] . . . I feel it is necessary to correct some of the more misleading statements of this letter. Mr. Major "must report" that the editors of the Literary Review "have been aware" of the presence of the CIA in that institution "for ten years"; that they were subjected to a complete Congress for Cultural Freedom dictatorship in the person of the then chief executive, Michael Josselson; that they had to "obey" his "commands" and that—horribile dictu!—"Mr. Josselson was never content with the intensity of cold-war spirit the Literary Review displayed and threatened it with the withdrawal of funds if its anti-Communist propaganda did not become louder." Apart from hearsay, Mr. Major's main evidence is based on one particular issue of a Hungarian monthly, Látóhatár, (Horizon) published in Munich in 1961. Regretfully however, Mr. Major fails to mention that the editors—and sole contributors, two in number—of the said issue of Látóhatár had returned to Hungary soon after the publication of their pamphlet and, having thus "unmasked," in the best possible Agitprop tradition, their former friends and foes became—and still are—the loyal propagandists of the official party line.

The truth is that wherever the funds came from or whatever disagreements we had among ourselves or with Mr. Josselson, the editorial policy was neither influenced nor dictated, let alone commanded, by anyone but our conscience. The truth is that we edited and published an

(Continued on page 84)

EDITORIALS

The Second Centennial

That the American Republic is young is one of those half-truths that becomes incontrovertible by repetition. Actually, ours is not only the most powerful of republics but probably the oldest in continuity of tenure. Yet in terms of the European history which is also part of our history, ours is not an old country. In 1976 it will be celebrating only its second centennial. The event is close to our present year of troubles. This is an election year; four years later, another Presidential, and then the second centennial.

One thing is certain: it will be far different from the first. Henry Adams looked at the primitive dynamo-electric machinery of the period (it would be another five years before Thomas A. Edison began generating commercial power in New York City) and speculated on the third law of thermodynamics, which deals with the increasing unavailability of heat energy (but the secrets of the atom were still unknown). The medieval period was held together by faith in the Virgin, Adams thought; he was less sure about what had held the American Republic together for a century and enabled it to survive a devastating war. Yet the spirit of the age was on the whole optimistic. Even the terrible financial panic of 1873 had not inflicted a lasting trauma.

We cannot say as much for ourselves. As one year ends and another begins, a publicly hopeful spirit is an obligation that custom has imposed on commentators, whatever hangups and hangovers they may endure in private. But 1967 was an exception, the only one that most of us can remember. Those who not only harbored, but expressed, grave doubts were not professional pessimists. The Nation's "Sense of Crisis" editorial of November 13, 1967, was a reflection of a growing apprehension not about this or that surmountable threat but about our ability as a people to cope with the harsh realities of the age, to admit and correct errors, to escape the hubris that had brought ruin on nations less fortunate, or less wise, than ours. The Wall Street Journal's November 8 report on "Capital Malaise," about which we commented on December 4 ("Scavengers of the Press"), made painful reading because it expressed truths which were in themselves painful.

And what now? This, with a Washington January 1, 1968, dateline: "We are in deep trouble as a people. And history is not going to deal kindly with a rich nation that will not tax itself to cure its miseries." That was John W. Gardner speaking, a Republican, though Lyndon B. Johnson's Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. Marjorie Hunter, the New York Times reporter who wrote the story, commented on the contrast between the annual flow of glowing reports on the state of the nation as the year wanes, and the frustration of probably most, if not all, of the members of the Cabinet over the budget squeeze at a time of severe domestic ills—the incredibly rapid decay of the cities, urban riots and the threat of more to come, the rising crime rate, surface traffic congestion mounting faster than roads can be built, dangerous traffic congestion around the major airports, water and air pollution, the shortage of doctors and nurses, spiraling medical costs and the obsolescence of a large part of the nation's hospital facilities, and all the other symptoms of a society that is sick, knows it is sick, and can think of nothing but crowding as much pleasure into individual and family living as can be bought for cash or credit. Whatever may betide, we should honor Gardner for sparing us the platitudes and speaking his mind without looking over his shoulder at the President or anyone else who might find his observations unpleasant.

Even the humorists have stopped laughing—at least those who always had something serious to say while they were being funny—people like Dick Gregory, that is, rather than Bob Hope. E. B. White is one of these borderline commentators whom it is perilous for a nation to take lightly, and in the next to the last 1967 issue of The New York Times he let us have it. "What happened?" he asked. "What went sour? What did I do wrong? Who's to blame?" "I am," White concluded. "I am to blame." In a sense that is true; none of us is free from guilt, either as individuals or in our connections with institutions. But an indictment so broad becomes inactionable. Surely the young man who goes to jail in protest against the Vietnamese War is not as blameworthy as the President of the United States who gratuitously pushed us deep into that abominable conflict. Some distinctions are in order.

"I believe," says Mr. White, "our principles are sound and good." Fine: but if we give only lip service to those good principles, how can we expect to be saved? If we are obstinate hypocrites, should we be saved? Economic self-interest, with every man for himself, was not such a bad idea in 1776; America was a big open country with a wide-open frontier. But this is our day, not Thomas Jefferson's. If, then, we value the Republic, we must change with the times. We must take a more critical look at the technology that we now revere perhaps more than is good either for it or for us, since the bulk of it is devoted to weaponry and its product advances are in the realm of mass murder. If we can make this effort, our second centennial may still be something to be proud of. If we cannot, there may be no second centennial.

What We Do Not Need

No doubt suffering from year's-end fatigue, the generally perceptive James Reston offers a suggestion which should be promptly and firmly rejected. In essence he proposes, since the parties and candidates have let us down, that a government of national union be formed. This is precisely what the country does not need.

Since the end of World War II we have had a form of coalition government — in the sense, that is, of a strongly supported "bipartisan" foreign policy. This bipartisan concept is largely responsible for the fact that we now find it so difficult to reverse or modify a policy which has had strong support from both sides of the Congress for twenty years (see article p. 71). But we have had a form of coalition government in a more specific sense since 1960. President Kennedy named two Republicans to key Cabi-

IN THIS ISSUE

January 15, 1968

EDITORIALS

66

ARTICLES

71 Protest, Power and the Future of Politics

Carey McWilliams

77 The Advancement School:

North Carolina Kills Its Dream

David Cooper

80 Los Angeles Times:

Most Likely To Succeed

Phil Kerby

82 Japan in Asia's Future

W. Macmahon Ball

BOOKS & THE ARTS

85 Communist Dreams and Soviet Reality

David Joravsky

86 Stories of a Soviet Writer

Edward J. Brown

88 In the Beginning There Was Art

John Berger

92 Theatre

Harold Clurman

93 Tragic Cakewalk

Julius Novick

94 Films

Robert Hatch

95 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, MICHAEL GOLDMAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign ☐ Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old ☐ well ☐ their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and ☐ Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 3

net posts: Douglas Dillon to the Treasury, Robert S. McNamara to Defense. President Johnson has two Republicans in the Cabinet: McNamara and John W. Gardner. Under Kennedy, and even more under Johnson, Sen. Everett Dirksen, nominally the Republican leader in the Senate, has served as an ardent Administration spokesman on critical foreign policy issues. In general, Johnson has relied heavily on Republican support for his policies in Vietnam; he has enjoyed the endorsements of such GOP leaders as General Eisenhower, Richard M. Nixon, and, until recently at least, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

When President Roosevelt formed what was in effect a coalition government by adding Stimson and Knox to the Cabinet, it was for an excellent reason: to fight and win a world war that was clearly in the offing. The need now is not to fight and win a world war but to avoid one. What is needed now is not consensus but conflict; a clash of opinion, live options. Sen. Eugene McCarthy has said that he hopes to end what he calls the electorate's "joyless spirit—a mood of frustration . . . the sense of political helplessness." Ending that frustration is the commanding national political priority.

Mr. Reston has said as much himself in his column of December 10 entitled "The Fatalism of American Politics," in which he inveighed against a system that may offer the voters a "choice" between President Johnson and Richard M. Nixon. The people have not "abdicated," as Arthur Miller suggested recently; they have simply not had a choice. The major interest groups, like the voters generally, are frustrated because their leadership, as in the case of AFL-CIO, is heavily committed to the President. But we now know, thanks to Dr. George Gallup (January 2) that 43 per cent of labor's membership regards the Vietnamese War as an error. Much the same state of affairs prevails in other mass organizations. "Total consensus," as August Heckscher pointed out in a recent article in The American Scholar, "and total war constitute, in the last analysis, an ugly and inseparable pair." The nearer we have come to total consensus among the leadership elements, the nearer we have come to total war. The remedy is to end what Emmet John Hughes has called "the great disfranchisement" (Newsweek, January 8). A Presidential encounter among Johnson, Nixon and Wallace, though a national political disaster, would reflect in a way a "national union" or consensus approach on the one key issue, the war. But that trio of candidates would not produce unity; it would sow the seeds of profound disunity and dissension. "The most obvious way to make democracy work," as Mr. Heckscher sensibly concludes, "... would be to get the question of Vietnam openly and fairly into the political campaign, so that the voters might have a choice of policy."

The Year of Japan's Emergence

After twenty years of skillfully avoiding the spotlight in Asian and world affairs, without making a single false move, Japan is now beginning to emerge from the wings. During the period of economic recovery after World War II, Japan adopted a cautious and tactful approach in its foreign policy. But now that the booming Japanese economy is making headlines all over the world, its diplomacy is gathering momentum. "There can be no doubt today of the potential Japanese presence," writes Jon Halliday in New Left Review (July-August, 1967). "From Calcutta to Sakhalin and down to Tasmania, Japan is on the scene—in economic matters already very much an independent agent. The logic of this must produce its political effect." And, indeed, this effect is now being registered.

The rapid economic recovery of Japan is, like that of West Germany, one of those "miracles" that, on close scrutiny, is less miraculous than it has been made out to be. First of all, the Korean War was an economic windfall; Japan is thought to have made more than $2 billion out of this U.S. "police action." By 1951, Japan's industrial output was already more than equal to what it had been twenty years before; like West Germany, it has benefited from "the generosity of victors."

Then the war in Vietnam came along just in time to add real zip to the Japanese economy which had begun to lag a bit. Directly or indirectly, Japan earned $1 billion from the war in 1967. Buoyed up by this increased business, Japan's annual growth rate soared to 7.5 per cent in 1966. But the war in Vietnam has also given an enormous impetus to the South Korean economy and in the two years since diplomatic relations were restored between Japan and South Korea, Japan has practically replaced the United States as the No. 1 outside power in the South Korean economy. And all this time Japan has, of course, been keeping defense costs at a minimum while enjoying the protection of the American "nuclear umbrella." For example, whereas defense costs have been about 6.5 per cent of GNP in Great Britain, they have, until recently, been only about 1.27 per cent in Japan. Today Japan is about to become the third industrial power in the world. It is the only capitalist country in which the United States does not dominate either the oil, steel, automobile or electronic industries. It has a thoroughly rationalized economic system in which state initiative has given the bureaucracy a powerful role in the government; state control over both the accumulation and investment of capital has generated a financial tradition and a banking system quite different from anything in the West. The visionary Herman Kahn has suggested that around the turn of the century Japan will pass the United States in GNP per capita.

From the outset Japan has been a key factor in this country's "strategic thinking," although it is seldom mentioned in the public debate. In a recent interview, General Eisenhower referred briefly to the significance of Japan in relation to Vietnam and then added, as an aside, "probably the less said about that right now the better." Were we to be explicit about the extent to which Japan figures in our strategic thinking on Vietnam, it might inflame Japanese opinion and create a general uneasiness throughout Southeast Asia. For Washington has thought of Japan not merely as a "partner" in Asia but as a potential stand-in or military surrogate for us once the war is over. "No concern of the United States in the Pacific," to quote from the recent statement by fourteen scholars on the war (The New York Times, December 20), "is more vital than that Japan's emerging initiative in foreign policy should be exercised in such a way as to utilize her enormous potentials in support of world peace and prosperity." In a sense, we have been fighting in Vietnam until Japan was in a position, and of a mind, to take over some of our "responsibilities" in the Pacific. In the meantime, so the argument has run, South Vietnam must not be permitted to fall into "unfriendly hands," since if this were to happen, Japan might be denied access to the markets and raw materials of Southeast Asia and the sea lanes to Japan might be endangered. In effect, what we have done is to underwrite Japan's position in the "co-prosperity sphere" for which it fought World War II.

But rather acute problems have arisen. For one thing, the Japanese people are clearly anti-war (see article p. 82) and are not eager to see Japan rearmed. For another, the Vietnamese War has subjected the Japanese, as Keyes Beech noted in a dispatch to the Chicago Daily News (November 28), to a great emotional strain. They have been making so much money out of the war that they have now begun to fear what might happen if it were to end. A committee of inquiry that was sent recently to South Vietnam reported on the possible "detrimental influences" that might result from peace talks (Washington Star, May 10, 1967). As an offset, the Japanese Government has begun to talk about the necessity of rearming. Already it is being suggested that the Japanese must overcome their "nuclear allergy," and the Minister of Education has suggested that pupils at the primary and junior high school levels should be taught "defense consciousness."

More recently, Premier Sato told the Japanese that they must accept the presence of nuclear arms on their soil if they want to regain control of Okinawa. There is agitation to substitute the words "army," "navy" and "air force" for the euphemistic "Self-Defense Forces" and to elevate the Japanese Defense Agency to the status of a full-fledged ministry. Actually many of the weapons used in the SDF arsenals right now are "dual weapons"—that is, they can be fitted with conventional or atomic warheads. More and more, right-wing officers in Japan are saying that Japan's "first line of defense" is the 38th Parallel in Korea and the 17th Parallel in Vietnam. Clearly, Washington is encouraging the Japanese to subvert the Constitution we imposed on them, Article 9 of which forbids the maintenance of land, sea and air forces. Because even today Japan's "self-defense forces," combined, constitute the largest non-Communist military force in Asia.

No doubt we have thought that Japan, as a junior partner, would protect our interests as well as its own. But Japan, which is celebrating the centennial of the Meiji Restoration, is beginning to think about Japanese interests. In the end, will the partner outgrow the partnership? In trying to contain China, have we made it difficult to contain Japan? If Washington has any misgivings on this score, it has not voiced them. But even now the renewal of the Security Agreement, which will be up for discussion in 1970, has begun to cast a slight cloud on U.S. Japanese relations. Before then, no doubt, the Japanese will want to improve their bargaining position.

A Gun (or Two) in Every Home

Everyone has heard about the Minutemen, those quaint characters who confuse 1776 with 1968 and feel sure that if enough firearms are put in the hands of staunch Americans the Republic can be saved. The guns are to be used on the Communists, who have infiltrated almost everything, and who, at some juncture, not too far off, will have to be stopped with cold steel and hot lead. Most rational Americans tend to dismiss the Minutemen and similar vigilante groups as the lunatic fringe of patriotism. This attitude may be too complacent. The conviction that guns will cure the country's ills is gaining currency in what Richard Hofstadter calls the paranoid style in American politics.

A grand jury in Nashville, Tenn., has just come up with the recommendation that a gun is as indispensable in the American home as a refrigerator and self-cleaning oven, and spiritually far more important. The citizens must arm, and both amateur and professional police must be recruited in great numbers. Addressing the Chicago City Council, Boss Daley promised that nothing would be allowed to disturb the deliberations of the Democrats during the coming hot summer. He got loud cheers and a standing ovation, and an assurance that if 5,000 more policemen were needed, the council would see that he got them.

In fact, there is a boom both on policemen and on do-it-yourself shooting in the name of law and order. In New York City the head of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association has been assailing the Mayor because he has not consented to add another 5,000 men to the force. In Miami, Police Chief Walter E. Headley defended his "new" get-tough policy in the Negro district, and area in which fifty-eight crimes of violence were allegedly committed over the Christmas weekend. The Chief's remedy was shotguns, police dogs and a stop-and-frisk ordinance. The five-member police commission includes one Negro; she expressed some concern about the stop-and-frisk law. Another member criticized the Chief's "inflammatory" manner. "We don't mind being accused of police brutality," the Chief commented. "They haven't seen anything yet."

Later, the Miami office of the American Civil Liberties Union said it would seek an injunction in federal court against Headley's plan, but the Chief is very popular in white Miami, where he rides on horseback in the Orange Bowl parades. He argues, also, that in his way he is an integrationist: 10 per cent of the Miami police force is now Negro.

At the year-end meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, a speaker at one of the conferences on riots and urban mass violence suggested that what was needed was not more repression but study of such factors as racism, status-quo power, methods of achieving a just society, and similar aspects of social conflict. But why bother with such subtleties? A gun in every home, and a tough pair of cops in every squad car, are much simpler, much faster, and much more appealing to the he-man psychology of the TV-conditioned public. Of course it won't work, but it will satisfy a lot of tough-minded citizens while it is failing.

A Little Union-Busting?

It seems hard to believe, but some 60,000 copper workers have been on strike since July, 1967, and the end is not in sight. The union accepted a proposal by the Administration for a joint fact-finding board, but the industry turned it down. Essentially, this is a strike to secure for copper workers standards comparable to those prevailing in rubber, automobiles, aluminum and other industries. The background is that one of the few surviving left-wing unions, the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, waged a well-nigh ruinous fight for years with the United Steelworkers, much to the pleasure of the industry; but when the two unions finally merged the strike began promptly. In all, twenty-six unions are involved in the present strike, although the Steelworkers are predominant. The unions are demanding joint negotiations on a company-by-company basis, and a common termination date.

The strike has cut perhaps 75 per cent of domestic copper production, but enough of the metal flows in from Canada, Chile, Peru, Zambia, the Congo and other places (in addition to domestic sources of copper scrap) so that fabrication can continue without placing insupportable strains on the producers. Phelps-Dodge, Anaconda, Kennecott and American Smelting & Refining do not live from hand to mouth, as a lot of the workers do.

All in all, the outlook is unpleasant. Consumer prices rose almost 3 per cent in 1967 and far more in some fields; medical costs, for instance, were almost 8 per cent higher in November than a year earlier. Then, Social Security takes a sizable bite out of the worker's pay, and while this is for his long-term benefit, it is, as everyone knows, hardly more than a simulacrum of real social security. As in the case of executives, it must be supplemented by pensions. The men are less interested in wage increases, which they know will be swallowed up by rising taxes and the cost of living, than in job security and retirement benefits. They keep on fighting for these vital needs. In the meantime, what the strike does in a copper town like Bisbee, Ariz., (population about 10,000) is no small matter. The economy limps along with the loss of $1 million a month in payroll income.

If 1968 should produce a Congress less friendly to labor than last year's legislature, some managements might think they saw a golden opportunity to keep wages and fringe benefits down and profits up. If so, more troubles will be added to those that LBJ already has. It is something for him to think about, and the sooner the better.

The Class Struggle On TV

We are all aware that though the United States is a perfect democracy, we do have economic classes. Rightly regarded, this is one of the glories of our free-enterprise system, since it impels the inhabitants of the ghetto to strive to get out of it and live in luxury apartments. In one respect, however, we have until recently been virtually a classless society. Television has been the democratic form of entertainment for all, ranging from the family on welfare to the wealthy household, convinced that its taxes should not be paying for the welfare television sets. All alike have laughed synchronously at the same jokes from the same comedians, and hated the wicked Reds who were shooting at our boys in Vietnam.

Now an advertising section folded into The New York Times reminds us that technology never pauses and is about to provide the denizens of the slums with an additional incentive to become industrialists. "New York needs help," the insertion declares, and most New Yorkers will agree. However, the present jeremiad isn't over crime in the streets or hippies or air pollution: it's poor TV reception—ghosts, double images, "snow," flip-flopping and similar horrors. The solution is to let the masses continue to get their TV through the air, while the classes receive it via coaxial cable, which is not subject to radio frequency interference and video noise.

Ten thousand New Yorkers are already enjoying this boon. Manhattan Island has been divided for cable TV between Manhattan Cable Television, which has the franchise south of East 86th and West 79th, and Teleprompter, which operates north of that boundary. Teleprompter will therefore be serving Negro and Puerto Rican Harlem, but since cable TV costs $19.95 for installation and $5 a month thereafter for a single outlet, it is not likely that facilities will be overtaxed in the ghetto. On the other hand, we are assured by Mr. Armand Lindenbaum, president of Pease and Elliman, Inc., that prospective luxury apartment tenants will soon be turning up their noses at buildings that are not equipped with cable TV.

Perfect pictures are not all that the fortunate cable patrons can look forward to. Turn the VHF tuning dial of your receiver. Even in New York City, which is pretty well saturated with TV, you will note that only seven of these twelve precious channels produce a picture. Cable TV has eliminated the intolerable waste. Since there is no question of inter-city interference, cable TV provides "Weatherama" on one of these channels, continuous news on another, stock market reports on a third ("It's like having a stock ticker in your living room") and other necessities of the good life. And that's only a beginning. One of these closed-circuit channels will tell cable TV patrons where to eat and what shows to go to, and guide them to all the glamorous happenings of the metropolis. "Over the horizon," we are assured, "are the possibilities of many additional services to be available via cable—ordering tonight's dinner from the supermarket, retrieving information from a computer center, banking by electronics and many another wonder."

Obviously that $5 a month is only part of the income that the TV cable capitalists expect to harvest. The pair of wires that now brings telephone service into your home is likened to a one-horse bridge path, while the coaxial cable is a six-lane highway opened up between you and some high-powered sales interests. The latter are not small operators: Manhattan Cable Television, for instance, is partly owned by Time/Life. Already 5 million viewers in 1,800 communities throughout the United States are patrons of cable TV. Soon a pair of extended rabbit ears or, worse, an outside antenna, will be a mark of social disgrace. Only one thing Harlem and Park Avenue will still have in common—the commercials. That is the one form of interference that cable TV cannot eliminate.

PROTEST, POWER AND THE FUTURE OF POLITICS

CAREY McWILLIAMS

A preoccupation with power—black power, student power, flower power, poor power, “the power structure”—is the most striking aspect of the American political scene at the moment. Oddly enough, obsession with power goes hand in hand with a fear of power. Some of the New Left groups that talk the toughest about power are extremely reluctant to see power operate in institutional form; within their own organizations, they shun “hierarchies” and formally structured relations of authority. What the preoccupation with power reflects, essentially, is a deep-seated, pervasive feeling of powerlessness. The feeling is not restricted to particular groups; most citizens, a majority perhaps, are bedeviled by it. “A feeling of having no choice,” Mary McCarthy has noticed, “is becoming more and more widespread in American life.”

So intense is the feeling of powerlessness that it has given rise to “anti-movements” and “anti-politics.” Instead of building new, strong, viable organizations through which to exercise political power, the tendency—at least on the Left—has been to move in the reverse direction, that is, to reject the instruments of politics. Discussion has been superseded by “uproar,” debate by demonstrations, dialogue by confrontation, civil disobedience by overt resistance. Often in the past, young voters have bade “farewell to reform” and then turned to radical politics; this time they have swung toward no politics at all. The idea of government by and through elected representatives is seriously questioned by some and indignantly rejected by others. The very process of politics has come under direct attack from young and old alike.

Apart from increasing evidence of this active disaffection, there is among those who have by no means despaired of politics a widespread anxiety about what Walter Lippmann has called “the rot of the American political system.” On November 10, N.B.C. presented an analysis of voter attitudes on the 1968 election, and found that most voters had little faith that any major candidate for the Presidency could master either of the two major problems we face (war and race), and worse, seemed to feel that the electorate was being denied live options on most issues. The survey indicated “a stunning lack of confidence in the President and in his political opponents.” A mountain of supporting evidence might be cited. Yet despite the active disaffection and the mounting general concern, little attention has been focused on what it is that accounts basically for the malfunctioning of the political system. The problem has two aspects. Power has been concentrated in our society in such a way, and to such a degree, that normal political processes are perhaps no longer able to cope with it. But one can't be sure of that because if certain specific weaknesses in the political system not directly related to the concentration of power, were remedied (at the moment they are not widely recognized, much less discussed) the reform might go far to remove the “rot” from the system.

On the first aspect, that of power, Thomas C. Cochran, the economic historian, has reminded us that “the modern centralized, militarized, and welfare-directed state” did not come into being overnight; it is the result of a complex internal evolution. Not consciously planned, it is a response to fears: first of internal economic collapse; second of external dangers and “enemies.” The New Deal, a war against impending economic collapse, was fought as any war is fought. Emergency agencies, with extraordinary powers, came into being overnight; crash programs were rushed into motion; executive decisions took precedence over cumbersome legislative processes; and more and more power was vested in the Presidency. At the same time, and as part of the same process, economic power was increasingly concentrated. On the eve of World War II, a study made by a group including six members of President Roosevelt's Cabinet (“The Structure of the American Economy,” 1939), expressed, even then, growing alarm at the political consequences of tightly held economic power.

The concentration of power became much tighter after we entered World War II. Under the stress of rapid mobilization, a remarkable fusion of economic and political power took place; more accurately, perhaps, a fusion of economic and administrative or Executive power. This had been true also in World War I, but unlike the procedure after 1918, the war-making machine of World War II was never fully dismantled. The swift onset of the cold war, then the fighting in Korea and Vietnam, set the pattern for a permanent war economy. The rapid pace of military technology, which began to diverge sharply from civilian advances, created a political rationale for continuous research and improvement in weapons systems and the like. Nuclear weapons and virtually instantaneous delivery systems authorized an ever-larger permanent military establishment; in any future war, it was said, there would be “no time to mobilize.” In the past, industries had “converted” to war production and then “reconverted” to peacetime production. After 1945 new defense industries came into being specifically to manufacture military hardware. At the same time the magnitude of the military budget revolutionized government finance. Defense-related expenditures will this year probably exceed $100 billion. In a recent survey, the AP referred to the Pentagon as wielding “the mightiest concentration of economic power in the world today.”

In his famous farewell address, General Eisenhower expressed misgivings about our ability to control “the military-industrial complex” by normal political processes. More recently, the same concern has been more specifically voiced by others. “The huge size of military budgets,” said Dr. Arthur F. Burns, "and incomplete disclosure concerning their management, carry with them the dangers of political abuse"—as by building military stockpiles of certain raw materials to maintain price levels during periods of overproduction or of stepping up defense spending as an offset to declining employment. Dr. Charles J. Hitch, an expert on defense planning, now president of the University of California, has made a similar observation: "Certainly the defense budget is a large and powerful tool for the government, and one is tempted to seek its uses to solve an array of problems. . . . Defense spending has become a substantial and more or less normal factor in the economic reckoning of many American businesses."

Senator Fulbright spoke most soberly on this point in the Senate on December 13:

More and more our economy, our government and our universities are adapting themselves to the requirements of continuing war—total war, limited war and cold war. The struggle against militarism into which we were drawn twenty-six years ago has become permanent, and for the sake of conducting it, we are making ourselves into a militarized society. . . . For all the inadvertency of its creation and the innocent intentions of its participants, it [the military-industrial-academic complex] has become a powerful new force for the perpetuation of foreign military commitments, for the introduction and expansion of expensive weapons systems and, as a result, for the militarization of large segments of our national life. Most interest groups are counterbalanced by other interest groups, but the defense complex is so much larger than any other that there is no effective counterweight to it except concern as to its impact on the part of some of our citizens and a few of our leaders, none of whom have material incentive to offer.

For this reason, the defense complex has not been challenged by either party; in fact both have been about equally responsible for it. But it is doubtful that the growth of the complex could have been arrested even if one of the major parties had been willing to incur the risk of such a stand. And it is doubtful today that the Republican Party can bring itself to challenge the disastrous course of present policies, not because it is blind to the dangers or fails to appreciate the political possibilities in capitalizing on the existing discontent, but because power is now so bipartisan in structure that the opposition party cannot, apparently, muster the resources or the will to make the effort. James Reston notes, moreover, that the powerful Eastern Establishment in the GOP is by no means unanimously displeased with Johnson and his policies.

As the militarization of the society has proceeded, the power of the Congress relative to the Presidency has steadily declined. The recent report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on "National Commitments" (November 20) points out that the last twenty years have seen a nearly complete reversal of the positions of the Executive and legislative branches in the area of foreign affairs. Dr. Ruhl Bartlett, of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, told the committee that "the greatest danger to democracy in the United States and to the freedom of its people and to their welfare—as far as

The discussion of the crisis in the American political system, begun last week with Eldon Kenworthy's "Peace Politics: A Calculus for '68," and extended by this comment, will be pursued further next week with an article by Edward Schneier of Princeton University, "Toward a New Politics: A Look Beyond the 1968 Elections."
Editors

foreign affairs are concerned—is the erosion of legislative authority and oversight and the growth of a vast pyramid of centralized power in the Executive branch of the government." Dr. Edgar Eugene Robinson of Stanford suggested in a recent speech that the acquisition by the President of immense power over foreign affairs during the last twenty years means that the Constitution is outdated. "There is no possibility," he says, "of real change in the President's foreign policy except by removal . . . by death, resignation, impeachment or defeat at the polls." What in his view makes this development particularly dangerous is the dexterity with which the President can fuse two constitutional functions: his role as commander in chief and his responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs. Once war has become an instrument of national policy, it is hard to tell which role a President is playing. If his foreign policy is challenged, he can always assert his powers as commander in chief, and these powers are almost unlimited. (See, also, Sen. Frank Church's speech, October 29, on "President and Congress in Foreign Policy: The Threat to Constitutional Government.")

The process by which political and economic power have been concentrated through expansion of the war-making machine has been hastened by a series of post-war "revolutions": the organizational revolution, the scientific and technological revolution, the cybernetic revolution and, most notably, the communications revolution. As Dr. Robinson also pointed out, the communications revolution has made it possible for a new Presidential order, decision or proclamation to be carried instantaneously by radio and television. "Consequently, the effectiveness of that action is amplified millions of times by the miracle of swift communication."

Over the past twenty years the power of appropriation, which is supposed to be the bedrock of Congressional control, has been seriously eroded. A study of how the military budget has been handled in successive Congresses since the end of World War II would demonstrate that it is now firmly controlled by the Executive. And the military budget is today so immense, particularly if expenditures for NASA and the AEC are included, that the power to manipulate it conveys, as a side effect, power to shape the whole national budget.

The fallacy in the guns-and-butter proposition, as Dr. Burns has pointed out, is that "Financial transactions and the price system are merely mechanisms for putting a nation's resources to work and for distributing what is produced among people and their government. The resources that we devote to national defense are not available for making consumer goods or for adding to the stock of industrial equipment or for public uses in the sphere of education, health, or urban development. To the extent that we allocate labor, materials, and capital to national defense, we cannot satisfy our desires for other things. . . . Bombs or missiles add nothing to a nation's capacity to produce, while new equipment serves to augment production in the future. The real cost of the defense sector consists, therefore, not only of the civilian goods and services that are currently foregone on its account; it includes also an element of growth that could have been achieved through larger investment in human or business capital." In fact a former member of President Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers, Dr. Paul McCracken, has expressed the opinion that the Executive's seizure of decision-making has resulted in a federal budget whose expenditures, in the technical sense, are now out of control.

Any erosion of the power of Congress is an erosion of the power of the people. Given a society in which for a period of twenty years—almost the span of a generation—the real power of decision has been increasingly ceded to the President, it is not hard to account for the prevalent sense of "powerlessness." Just as the ghetto dweller feels that he lives in "occupied territory," so many people come to feel that they have been "displaced" from their role as electors. A force which they cannot control or directly influence has taken charge of their lives and destinies. "There are many signs," writes A. H. Halsey (New Society, October 26), "from love-ins in the Haight-Ashbury district of San Francisco to the 'privitization' of affluent workers . . . that a theory of the impotence of politics is being accepted." If the country has in fact been "occupied" by a power not sanctioned by the Constitution, then it must be "liberated." But given the degree to which power has been concentrated, can the direction of policy be reversed by conventional political means? In such a situation, public protests become increasingly directed against the symbols of power, and that has the effect of diverting energies from the political process and, at the same time, discrediting it.

Herblock, The Washington Post

"I'm Afraid To Look"

THE NATION/January 15, 1968

In the nature of things, it is difficult for "anti-movements" to cooperate with movements—of any kind. The objectives, the sense of tactics, the style of action, are different or divergent. That some of the "anti-movements" share with the infinitely larger movement of "concerned" and "dissatisfied" citizens the short-term objective of stopping the war does not mean that they see the war in the same terms or that they agree on other objectives. The "anti-movement" of Negro nationalists does not even share the short-term objective of stopping the war (at least, it is not for them a priority objective). And, to complicate matters, the larger movement is itself not well organized and lacks sufficient program.

By and large, "anti-movements" are not elated when a dove defeats a hawk; they have lost confidence in the political process as it now exists—not without reason—and they want to discredit it, the better, no doubt, to fill the political vacuum with a new politics. If the "anti-movements" openly espoused revolutionary objectives, then a measure of "parallel" politics might be possible (it may still be, depending on developments). But as of now, the Black Nationalists and the New Activists, as William Appleman Williams has observed, "have no vision of a Socialist commonwealth, let alone even the beginnings of serious proposals to create and govern such a society." They seem less concerned with the concentration of power, and the growing political vacuum which could set the stage for an American fascism, than with the hateful discrepancy between liberal ideals and liberal practice. They give little thought to the possibility that something about the functioning of a capitalist economy may lead to the concentration of power. The heroes of the "anti-movements" are Debray and Che Guevara, not Gramsci who thought that the proper place to find those who aspired to lead revolutionary movements was in the reading rooms of public libraries. Because they are not really concerned with the political consequences of particular protests and demonstrations, they discount polls which show that certain recent demonstrations have stimulated a reaction and strengthened the President's hand. This, of course, is a logical attitude for those who have lost confidence in the political process. But it carries a distressing echo of the "social fascism" line that the Communist Party pursued in the early 1930s.

However, the "anti-movements" have had some highly desirable political consequences. The stress on personal commitment, on values, on life styles, the exposure of liberal pretense, have released new energies, focused attention on particular issues, and pointed up the relation between morality and politics. One of the only means whereby individuals can make what they think and feel relevant in a society in which power is highly concentrated is to stress the morality—or immorality—of public policies. But it is precisely in such a period that as Iris Murdoch has noted, "political moralizing comes to be thought of as an idle idealism, a sort of utopianizing which is just a relief from looking at unpleasant facts." This was the position into which many cold-war liberals were driven, or into which they retreated, when they decided that there was little point in attempting to bring moral judgments to bear in the field of foreign policy. Today many of these same individuals have recoiled in horror from the consequences of the "crackpot realism" of Dulles and Acheson and Rusk. For this shift in attitude, the "anti-movements" are entitled to some credit. But if we are to answer the cynic in ourselves, moral judgments, as Miss Murdoch stresses, must be realistic enough to be political judgments as well. For the ultimate cynicism is to conclude that politics is a futile game. Such a conclusion severs the relation between morality and politics. To stress the immorality of the war in Vietnam, while rejecting the possibility of stopping it by political means, is self-defeating. Before anyone declared politics obsolete, he should at least try to identify the rot which has brought such discredit upon the institution.

• • •

Perhaps the most important single cause of the rot has been adherence to a bipartisan foreign policy. Politics does not stop at the water's edge. In today's world, one might well say that it begins there. The American party system had its origins in a dispute over foreign policy. The bipartisan concept dates from Roosevelt's determination to secure ratification of the UN charter by obtaining Republican support in advance. But the cold war came along almost before the Charter had been ratified, and what had been projected as a temporary expedient crystallized as a national dogma. The policy that resulted has been one of preserving the status quo, of pushing American economic expansion throughout the world under cover of a rigid "anti-Communist" ideology. At the same time the fear of communism—in part real, in part concocted—made it relatively easy to wrest cold-war appropriations from Congress, particularly military appropriations. Since the major interest groups all benefited directly or indirectly—if not evenly—they became adherents to bipartisan cold-war policies and the country, enjoying the prolonged boom, acquiesced.

Given the generally conservative cast of successive postwar Congresses, the emphasis on military spending in support of mostly reactionary cold-war policies won majority bipartisan support. For one thing, it was a way of keeping domestic spending for welfare and other purposes under control. Then, as military spending increased, the influence of the military on foreign policy also increased, as did the power of the President. The public hearings which the Senate Foreign Relations Committee staged in 1966 are generally conceded to represent the first significant attempt by that committee in the post-war period to regain some of the power it once possessed. Not to debate foreign policy assumptions and alternatives was, in today's world, to forgo significant debate on domestic issues as well. It was as though both parties had agreed to a twenty-year moratorium on significant politics. Today the rot that this moratorium produced is all too evident.

But there are signs—and they are multiplying—that the bipartisan consensus is breaking up. Senator Morton's dramatic announcement last summer—"I was wrong. Our country has been painted into a corner out there. There's going to have to be a change"—was an event of major political importance. Since then, as Don Oberdorfer points out in The New York Times Magazine (December 17), the "wobble" on Capitol Hill has become increasingly evident. "The summer and fall of 1967 have been a time of switching . . . a scurrying in many directions, in search of a stance that took account of the growing distaste for the war." The splendid spadework on Vietnam undertaken by a 29-year-old freshman Republican, Rep. Donald W. Riegle, Jr., and some of his colleagues is a sign that the twenty-year infatuation with bipartisan cold-war policies is beginning to lose its appeal to Republicans. Never before have so many dissenting voices begun to link foreign affairs with domestic politics (Dr. Martin Luther King is an example), which suggests that in the end the crisis in domestic affairs will force a reconsideration of foreign policy. But even as the ferment spreads, efforts are made to reimpose the "consensus," to choke off partisan debate before it gets started. General Eisenhower has said that any Republican who departs from the official line on Vietnam "will have me to contend with. . . . That's one of the few things that would start me off on a series of stump speeches across the nation"—a statement not calculated to encourage the Republicans to offer an alternative policy and program. However, increasing numbers of Republicans continue to "wobble."

Adherence to a bipartisan foreign policy was made all the easier when the Left collapsed after World War II. By Left, I mean all those elements that might have been disposed to challenge the assumptions on which the cold-war policy rested. Twenty years of systematic redbaiting, conducted not by private but by government agencies, and financed by public funds, gravely distorted the political spectrum; it shifted the center of gravity in both parties well to the right. The Left, in the European sense, was never strong here; during the McCarthy phase it ceased to exist. Nor was this merely a matter of disrupting certain organizations; currents of "undesirable" critical opinion were driven underground, individuals censored their own thoughts, organizations purged their own ranks.

The collapse of the old Left in the postwar period meant that the liberals of the Democratic Party were subject to no pressure or competition except from conservative or right-wing sources (much the same state of affairs prevailed in the trade union movement). The official liberalism of the Democratic Party, which was really "the new conservatism," lived off the store of ideas that had been developed in the 1930s. It responded to new issues and new problems by offering "more of the same," that is, extending the programs of the New Deal.

More important, the collapse of the Left has deprived us all of a comprehensive critique of American society, its values, its direction, its performance. The New Deal was not based on any carefully thought-out assumptions; its programs were mostly improvisations. The continued failure of the liberal Democrats to provide a serious alternative to the "reformism" of the early progressive movement had the effect of minimizing ideological differences of all kinds, including those between Democrats and Republicans. Both parties professed the same values, the same purposes, essentially the same policies. Both parties have accepted the ideology of "free enterprise," joined in the "American celebration," and endorsed the objectives of an expansionist foreign policy. Both have pushed the new American imperium. No partisan challenge has been offered to the Administration's assertion of a right of unilateral military intervention wherever it feels that vital "interests" have been threatened.

The collapse of the Left is an essential key to explaining the rot because the absence of ideological differences has been the historic weakness of American politics. Not only has the American Left contributed to this weakness; the lack of a consistent ideological drive explains the feebleness of the Left itself. "The American Left," as Michael Davie points out, "has always been more eccentric than effective. In Europe, men have had to battle for the establishment of their basic rights, and have needed a theory of drastic social change to go to war with." But not here. As Tom Hayden, one of the leaders of the New Left observes: "How do you act as a revolutionary against a nation-state that celebrates your values while betraying their substance?" Even in the fiercest American struggles, everyone of major political importance has believed in the same basic things. "The mainstream of the American political tradition," to quote Davie again, "thus flows between firm banks (though it is not yet clear whether they can contain the Negro revolution) and features a steady belief in the sanctity of private property, the importance of economic individualism, and the unifying influence of greed. . . . Outside Portugal, Marx has had less influence in the United States than on any country in the Western world. . . . The most wretched victims of the American system [are kept] safely in the mainstream of the American political tradition—convinced that only luck or geography, never the system itself, stand between them and all-American prosperity." Al Capone once said to Claud Cockburn that "This American system of ours . . . gives to each and every one of us a great opportunity if we only seize it with both hands and make the most of it." Capone's view is still shared by most Americans. That it was never really true Indians and Negroes and others can testify, but it seemed to be true until fairly recent times. In the past, a debilitated American Left tried to mount a critique of the prevailing ideology, but the collapse of the Left in the postwar period silenced this type of criticism precisely when it was most needed.

The abdication of the Left in the postwar period, and the failure of the New Left thus far to fill the vacuum, have meant that the idea of a radical politics and the function it can serve in our kind of political system has been forgotten. Radical political pressures played a role in bringing the Republican Party into being. Radical political pressures also helped to shape the New Deal. Radical politics revived the labor movement in the 1930s. Recently J. H. Plumb reviewed a collection of papers by American planners on environmental problems. In not one of these papers, he noted, had thought been given to the kind of politics that would be needed if any of the plans were to win a fair hearing. What he said has direct relevance to the rot in the political system:

Environment problems get too easily abstracted from social problems, and social problems from their historical roots.

How can planning work in a society which has sharp social divisions due to disparity in wealth as well as differences in color? How can planning work in a society in which profit, personal or corporate, must be a more urgent motive than control or conservation?

So long as society is structured as it is there will be slums. . . . No amount of thinking about environment, no amount of planning the optimum space and minimal communal facilities can be effective without political action, and that means political action of a radical nature.

The history of the last hundred years shouts that fact aloud. Human beings are like carrion crows, not Christians. They will not give up what they have to the poor, they have to be scared before they will disgorge.

A radical politics, whether organized as a party or as a movement, is needed today—as it has always been needed—to goad the two major parties, to offer a general critique of the society, and to give political expression to the discontents that can gain a hearing in neither major party. The New Left may meet this need; it has not done so to date.

A secondary but relevant explanation of the rot is that the major parties are hopelessly old-fashioned. On essential matters they have changed little in the last century. At the national level they are loosely organized. They spend a pittance on research and planning, and even less on education. They rally briefly during national elections but for the rest of the time are "demobilized" and lethargic. This slackness of organization mirrors the attitude of most voters, who are content to limit their political enterprise to the ritual act of voting every two years—when they bother to vote. The professionals who run the parties do not encourage any greater activity. The parties engage the active support of perhaps not more than 3 to 5 per cent of the membership. There was a time when various organizations and interest groups participated directly in political decision-making, but this pluralistic pattern has almost vanished, and today most of the interest groups are long since "integrated" into the power structure, i.e., they are more dependent on the party in power than it is on them. The New Left groups, therefore, quite properly attempt to build new bases of local power which may eventually acquire enough votes or enough "disruptive" power to engage the major parties and particular state and local administrations in meaningful bargaining. Even if this were to occur, however, national political decisions would still need to be made, national priorities established, and for that purpose well-organized national parties are indispensable.

At the national level, both major parties are still loosely organized coalitions formed for the purpose of conducting campaigns. The Republican coalition, established at the time of the Civil War, was ascendant until the successful New Deal coalition was put together in 1932. Since then, the Republicans have been unable or unwilling to form a new coalition and the New Deal coalition is now disintegrating. At the moment it would be difficult to say which party is the more sharply divided internally. Neither seems able to confront the new issues (too risky) or appeal to the new constituencies which have emerged since 1932 (to do so, just now, would endanger what is left of the old coalition). Yet recent polls show that a large—perhaps a third or more—and steadily increasing percentage of the electorate is dissatisfied with the candidates and programs and styles of both parties and therefore disinclined to participate actively in politics.

Instead of addressing themselves to the new issues and the new constituencies, both parties evade their responsibilities by resort to excessive “personality politics,” TV-style (with the result that rising campaign costs threaten to make the Senate once more the “millionaire’s club” that it was in the 1890s). The effect of all this is to encourage the feeling of “powerlessness” and enforce the conviction that political action is futile. It needs to be stressed that whereas at one time national coalition parties functioned reasonably well, today’s problems are much more complex, the resistances to be overcome are much greater and the concentration of power is formidable. To make politics alive once more, national parties must be coherently and purposefully organized, and they must command enough energy, not merely to secure adoption of new programs but to make certain that they are properly administered. Neither party today is so qualified.

A related cause of the rot is the failure of the Republican Party to function as an opposition party. Since 1932 it has been obvious that the two-party system was endangered by the failure of the GOP to offer effective opposition by urging alternative programs and policies. It was generally assumed in 1952 that President Eisenhower would reorganize the party which had been, even then, much too long out of power. He had the prestige and the power, but he showed not the slightest interest in the problem, and a great opportunity was lost. The Goldwater explosion of 1964 was the logical consequence of failure to renovate the party and, judging by recent events, the need is still there.

The party system has been further weakened by a new situation. A combination of factors, with heavy emphasis on the mass media, has made a measure of “direct democracy” possible. Representative government is at best slow, cumbersome, exasperating. Nowadays many decisions must be made quickly if they are to be effective. Let’s say that the mayor announces the immediate closing of a city hospital. There isn’t time to distribute leaflets, interview officials, petition the parties, organize a campaign. So those opposing the closure chain themselves to the office furniture, after first giving the TV news rooms notice of time and place. A vast audience is immediately alerted, with little effort, at minimal expense.

In a sense, the new media become a substitute for the party. Often official reaction is swift and responsive; whereas when petitioners go through channels, elected officials can stall, appoint commissions, order investigations, etc. A pamphlet by John Morris on “Direct Democracy,” published recently in London, explains the theory. The universal defect of representative democracy, so the argument goes, is the formation of controlling elites. Such government lets the people vote periodically for politicians or for parties, but seldom for policies. This, of course, merely echoes Michels’ cynical comment: “The one right which the people reserve is the ridiculous privilege of choosing from time to time a new set of masters.” Representative government was once a necessity; people had to send representatives to the capital. But modern communications have made a degree of direct democracy possible and people are beginning to like it. Polls have somewhat replaced primaries as a means of registering voter preference. Experiments are being made to test the possibility of “instant” opinion polls by the use of computer techniques. Up to a point, there is much to be said for direct democracy and we shall see more of it; but it cannot substitute for partisan debate on significant issues, much less for representative government which extends and clarifies the partisan debate and, in the end, should resolve it. Direct democracy can stimulate and supplement representative government; it can never replace it.

• • •

Given the extent of the rot that currently besets the American political system—and given the degree to which power is concentrated—it is not surprising that many people feel powerless, or that they have lost confidence in politics or are voicing doubts about representative government and liberal political institutions. Nor is it surprising that many young people have turned to “anti-movements” of one kind or another and taken to the streets to air their grievances and express their frustrations. What is surprising, given these factors, is the way in which “concerned” and “dissatisfied” citizens have tried to find new but democratic ways of expressing their judgments and preferences, with no aid and little encouragement from either party. It was not until the President began to escalate the war in 1965 that serious misgivings about it arose. Until then it had seemed merely another “police action” in furtherance of cold-war policies which had been pursued by both parties for twenty years without serious question or opposition. But once Mr. Johnson suggested the need for an increase in taxes, once it became clear that the war had been “Americanized,” once the manpower requirements and the casualties began to increase, public dismay mounted rapidly. It took a quantum leap early in the summer. Between July and September, the percentage of the public supporting the war dropped 14 points; between September and October it declined a further 11 per cent.

Now, in part as a reaction to certain recent demonstrations, opinion seems to be shifting back a bit in support of the Administration. But during the last two years, there has been a sharp increase in concern and it has found expression through a variety of ingenious devices and forms in spite of the political rot. Most of these forms had to be improvised. Abhorrence of the war has found expression in advertisements, petitions, pamphlets, art exhibits, poetry readings, sit-ins, teach-ins, pray-ins, and all manner of protests and demonstrations. Criticism has been voiced in newspaper polls, and in informal referenda. Students have been polled; professional organizations have canvassed their members; faculties have done the same. In Cambridge, Mass., and San Francisco, the issue has been forced on the ballot with results that under the circumstances have been truly impressive. What this rising protest lacked, until recently, was any semblance of national political leadership; and what it still lacks, in general, is a sustained political emphasis. In a way, it represents a kind of "anti-politics" since neither political party has, to date, seen fit to respond to it.

All the same, the prospects for a reversal of policy, for a redirection of American power, are not nearly as bleak as they have been pictured. An enormous volatility, as yet unexpressed, just might ignite in 1968. In any case, it would be a sad mistake to write off the political prospects as unrealistic and improvise a kind of guerrilla "anti-politics" until an attempt was made to overcome the rot in the political system and to infuse it with an energy equivalent to what now finds expression in demonstrations and protests, many of which lack direct political relevance. It may be impossible, in the end, to cope with the concentration of power that exists today by normal political processes, but we shall never know until we give the system a chance to function. It is not a question of either/or but of both, a great deal more of both. Action protests can be combined with radical politics; action protests can also be combined with conventional politics. But action protests without politics will not stop the war, much less reverse the direction of American policy, much less open the structural changes needed by American society. The task of those who are concerned with these objectives, then, is to concentrate, for a change, on the political problems.

THE ADVANCEMENT SCHOOL

NORTH CAROLINA KILLS ITS DREAM

DAVID COOPER

Mr. Cooper is state capital correspondent and political writer for The Winston-Salem Journal.

A year ago, the North Carolina Advancement School in Winston-Salem bustled with activity as talented young educators worked with eager eighth-grade public school students from all sections of North Carolina in an effort to find new ways of motivating "underachievers." Begun by former Gov. Terry Sanford in 1964, the Advancement School received national praise and was regarded as one of the most exciting educational experiments in America. The New York Times, Time, The Christian Science Monitor and the Saturday Review carried glowing stories; C.B.S. and N.B.C. sent camera teams to the school and reported its work over national television.

More important, the innovations used by the school's instructors appeared to work. Youngsters who seemed destined to become dropouts got "turned on" and became excited about their studies. The principals of the schools from which the 2,400 boys were drawn reported that 75 per cent improved their grades when they returned to their home classrooms, and that 90 per cent showed "markedly improved attitudes" about schools and studies.

But despite the country-wide excitement it created, despite its apparent successes, the future of the Advancement School is shaky. It stood vacant last fall, without students, classes or instructors. During last spring and summer, it had been crippled, if not killed, by some state and local politicians. Most observers and all of North Carolina's major daily newspapers blamed a state-level educational bureaucracy that at best showed no interest in the school, and at worst was intent on throttling innovations in education that might point to inadequacies in its own work. The North Carolina state government, under Sanford's successor, Gov. Dan Moore, planned to continue the school. Its new director has just reopened the project with a totally new staff and about 100 students. Few of those familiar with the school think it can generate again the excitement it once had or be a vigorous prober for new ideas.

The story of the Advancement School's decline is one of political intrigue. It could also be a harbinger of what lies ahead for the other educational innovations that abound in the country. One of the chief functions of the many new approaches is to search for new ways of teaching, new structures in education, new materials and new ideas. The whole thrust of such programs implies a criticism of existing educational institutions. How receptive, then, will the present authorities be toward an agency whose very role may involve criticism of the establishment? North Carolina's experience with the Advancement School may provide some answers.

Sanford ran in 1960 almost solely on a program pledged to improving North Carolina's public education. He conceived the Advancement School in 1963 toward the end of his term as Governor. Sanford, the youngest governor the state had ever had, brought a new excitement and energy to the office that impressed even his political foes. The main thrust of his educational improvement program was achieved in 1961, when he got the state legislature to impose new taxes to finance substantial increases for the school system. Most of the money went for teacher pay raises, but Sanford also launched a number of innovative programs, of which the Advancement School was one. "The mystery of the age is not the moon," Sanford wrote later in his book, But What About the People?; it is motivation." Reinforcing the Governor's general concern about "underachievers" was the fact that North Carolina had one of the highest school dropout rates in the nation. Thirty-five per cent of the state's fifth graders could be expected not to complete high school.

Armed with an $80,000 grant from the U.S. Office of Education, Sanford and his associates in the Governor's office began planning ways to meet the problem. Sanford brought in Harold Howe III, now U.S. Commissioner of Advancement in Philadelphia

Next week, The Nation will carry an article by Farnum Gray describing the experiences of the Advancement School, under its director, Peter Bittenwieser, in the urban ghetto conditions of Philadelphia.

Education, to help with the planning. Officials of the state educational establishment took part in the sessions.

Weeks of discussions and conferences produced the idea of a residence school for selected public school students at which various new ways of motivating pupils could be tried. To head the school, Howe brought Dr. Gordon L. McAndrew from California, where he was in charge of an Oakland city project designed to upgrade educational opportunities for 3,500 slum children.

Sanford created the Learning Institute of North Carolina (LINC) with Howe as its director; it was to be a semi-public agency designed to investigate new ways of helping local school units experiment in education. The Advancement School was to be LINC's major project.

A combination of federal, state and foundation funds was used to finance the school. The Carnegie Foundation put up $500,000; the state and federal governments each put in about $1.5 million for the school's first three years of operations. Since the state legislature was not in session, Sanford secured the state funds through budget transfers which later angered some lawmakers.

The state government finances all public schools in North Carolina. Policy for the schools is set by a State Board of Education, appointed by the governor, and an elected Superintendent of Public Instruction exercises much of the authority for overseeing operations.

To help the Advancement School become the innovator and catalyst Sanford envisioned, the school was made independent of the state education bureaucracy. The decision was supported at the time by Dr. Charles F. Carroll, the superintendent, and Dallas Herring, chairman of the board of education. Both were, with Sanford, founders of LINC and members of its board of directors. State funds for the Advancement School were funneled through the budget of the board of education.

In his book, Sanford says that LINC and the Advancement School "were almost killed at birth" by the state auditor, Henry Bridges, also an elected state official. Bridges, Sanford said, felt state funds could not legally be used for the Advancement School, despite an attorney general's ruling that they could. "I wanted to blast away," Sanford said, but instead negotiations with Bridges finally persuaded the auditor to drop his objections. Bridges, a member of the state Democratic Party's "old guard," was to emerge later in a final controversial episode involving McAndrew and the school's funds.

Winston-Salem leased an abandoned hospital to the school for $1 a year; and it opened its doors in the fall of 1964. McAndrew had recruited a staff of young, imaginative instructors from Northern states. Students were recommended by their home-town principals and the school was totally desegregated.

Instructors were willing to try almost any kind of technique in an effort to motivate the students, who came for three-month periods. For example, and English teacher roped the legs of two of his students together to show his class the workings of conjunctions. Special visual aid materials were used. Students often went on field trips. For the first several years, many public schoolteachers were brought to the school as part of the experiment.

In January, 1965, Sanford went out of office, but the new Governor, Dan Moore, was generally committed to retaining Sanford's programs. The Advancement School's first troubles began when the 1965 legislature convened a month after Moore took office. Legislators, irked by Sanford's transfer of funds without their authorization, almost killed the school off then and there by failing to supply it with state funds for the 1965-67 budget period. Moore's aides urged legislators not to drop the school, and it finally gained at least temporary safety. Legislators, however, authorized the Governor and a state budget commission to abolish the school after another year's operations if they felt it was not successful.

When the year was up, both the board of education and the Governor urged that the school be continued and funds were allocated to run it until the 1967 legislature convened.

In the period between the 1965 and 1967 legislatures, however, behind-the-scenes maneuvers set the stage for the school's eventual downfall. Board of education chairman Herring, Superintendent Carroll, the Governor and the board of education were all committed to "freedom of choice" in school desegregation. Herring became furious with McAndrew when the Advancement School director, in a speech to local school officials, suggested that "freedom of choice" was often a dodge to perpetuate segregation.

Howe went to Washington as Commissioner of Education, where his school desegregation guidelines soon made his name anathema to most Southern politicians, including Herring and Carroll. McAndrew succeeded him as director of LINC, and the Advancement School directorship went to a youthful New Yorker, Peter Bittenwieser. The fact that Bittenwieser was on the board of directors of the legal defense fund for the NAACP did not endear the school to some political leaders.

When N.B.C. broadcast a story on the Advancement School one Sunday evening, the footage dealt extensively with a skit on a theme similar to West Side Story. The show was hardly over when McAndrew got a call from Herring, a casket manufacturer in Rose Hill, population 1,300. "My God, Gordon, what's going on up at that school?" said Herring.

And then there was the seaman. The school's business manager was T. J. Van Metre, a retired Navy admiral. In mid or late 1966, Van Metre ran to Herring with a tale of "rampant homosexuality" and other immoral conduct at the school. Herring reported to Governor Moore, who in turn dispatched William C. Friday, president of the Consolidated University of North Carolina, to investigate. Neither Friday nor a later team of school superintendents could confirm Van Metre's tattle. As an insider, however, he enjoyed wide credence.

Since the Advancement School was not itself a state agency, it had to depend on some agency of state officials to seek funds for it from the legislature. This had been done by the board of education. However, in September, 1966, the board announced that it had decided not to request funds to continue the school beyond July 1, 1967. Herring and Carroll gave no public reason for the decision. Despite repeated invitations, neither state official had ever visited the school. Carroll said that he did not know enough about the school to state whether it should or should not be continued.

When the legislature convened last February, funds for the school were not included in the budget proposals presented by Governor Moore for the board of education. However, in reply to questions, the Governor said he would favor continuing the school if the state board endorsed the idea. McAndrew and Battenwieser wanted the school continued as an independent agency, if possible, but were willing to have it placed under the board of education if that would assure its survival. They did not want their venture to be under state Superintendent Carroll, whom they regarded as a foe of innovation in education.

Republicans had captured five of Winston-Salem's seven legislative seats in the 1966 elections, and the school's future quickly became a political issue. All the Republicans backed a bill to continue the school as an independent agency; the two Democrats supported a measure to place it under the board of education. Finally, in March, the board of education endorsed a rather nebulous program calling for an expanded attack on underachievement with Carroll in charge. Herring implied that the Advancement School under McAndrew and Battenwieser had not followed the school's original mandate to find the "causes of underachievement." The two youthful educators made it clear they were more interested in doing something about a problem known to exist than in piling up research. Battenwieser criticized the board's position. Herring replied publicly: "Peter Battenwieser has an educational philosophy which most North Carolina educators don't share." He did not elaborate.

In the end, the legislature ignored the board's proposal and placed the school, with no expanded program, under the board of education. It appropriated $1 million to run the school from July 1, 1967, until July 1, 1969. This final legislative decision did not come until late last June. By that time, Battenwieser and almost all the school staff had become weary of hanging on a limb. Battenwieser and most of his colleagues accepted an offer from Philadelphia to establish a similar school there. Other staff members scattered to other jobs, some to a program for underachievers established by school officials in Charlotte, N.C.

In September, the board of education hired Dr. John N. Bridgman, director of elementary education in Wilmington, N.C., as the school's new director. Bridgman, a native of North Carolina, admitted having trouble hiring a staff and said that the school would run for the present on a limited basis. Its future role is unclear.

McAndrew and Battenwieser were back in controversy in September, when state auditor Bridges released a report on a special audit of the school, which had been requested by the board of education. Bridges said he found that

The Keys of Learning

McAndrew and Battenwieser spent a total of $4,100 in school petty cash funds through their personal bank accounts. Battenwieser and McAndrew, approached by Bridges while he was making the audit, had offered to document their use of the funds to the auditor's satisfaction, but Bridges released the document without accepting their offer.

The LINC board of directors gave McAndrew a leave of absence and asked him and Battenwieser to itemize their expenditures. Both men provided affidavits and other documentation. Later, the board reinstated McAndrew and cleared both men of any misuse of the funds.

Also last fall, the board of education secured an advisory opinion from the state attorney general's office to prevent LINC from distributing to the state's public schools materials developed at the Advancement School under an $85,000 grant from the Carnegie Corporation. The advisory opinion went so far as to declare that no person, firm or individual, other than the board of education or the superintendent of public instruction, could approach local schools about curriculum, material or experimentation. LINC finally obtained use of the materials after its board of directors, headed by Governor Moore, asked the board of education to release them. The Carnegie Corporation, disturbed by the affair, released an unusual statement from New York calling the Advancement School and LINC "among the most far-reaching and useful educational programs in America."

But Battenwieser may have raised a bigger question last April in a lengthy address to a Winston-Salem civic club. "At issue," Battenwieser said, "is whether significant innovation—with its implied criticism of current educational practices—can come from within the public school bureaucracy. The state board of education feels it can. We at the Advancement School feel it cannot."

MOST LIKELY TO SUCCEED

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

In mid-September, 1958, the Los Angeles Times sniffed disaster in the air. In a lead editorial, the paper warned: "Threatening liberty in California seems as irrational as denying the existence of the Sierra Madre. This is the appearance. Nevertheless, there is the threat."

Among other frights, the Times predicted that "the two-party system would collapse," if the disaster struck. Moreover, the editorial continued, "It is hard to believe that Republicans and Democrats . . . will let their liberty go by default. . . . An impatient observer might say, 'Let them enjoy their lapse. It will teach them to be vigilant next time. . . .' But we have shown there probably wouldn't be a next time for vigilance: that is, a next time soon enough for this generation to recapture its liberty. . . ."

This classic of its genre was whopped up by the Times in anticipation of William F. Knowland's defeat for governor of California by Edmund G. Brown. The Times in 1958 was that kind of newspaper, hard-boiled, myopically reactionary and self-serving, with opinion slopping over from the editorial page into the news columns. Above all, the Times was provincial. The immensely prosperous paper had a three-man Washington bureau and only one foreign correspondent. Since Harrison Gray Otis, the founding dinosaur of the Times dynasty, bought the paper in 1881, its achievements had been amply recognized. Despite occasional lapses into grace, it could be counted upon to appear on every list of most deplorable newspapers put together by any gathering of newspaper men indulging in this melancholy diversion. The Times employed talented men, but they already lacked the freedom that the paper predicted would disappear in the catastrophic wake of a Democratic administration in Sacramento.

During the next decade, liberty, the Sierra Madre and the paper all survived its apocalyptic vision. In 1960, when Otis Chandler, then 33, succeeded his father, publisher Norman Chandler, (who had succeeded his father, Harry Chandler, who had succeeded his father-in-law, Harrison Gray Otis), this accession to authority was not unexpected. Prophetic fellow workers in 1953 had tabbed him "the man most likely to succeed" when he began a tour of duty in the paper's various departments that is the customary routine for publishers' sons. But this switch of publishers proved to be the first and most significant change in the metamorphosis of the Times. Today, it turns up regularly on any list of the nation's ten best newspapers.

Before he became publisher, Otis Chandler gave little indication that he would depart from the sanctified tradition of the family. He started with the advantages of money and position. Stanford, where he was educated, and the Air Force, in which he served, are institutions not designed to subvert these values. In her acerbic, maternal way, Dorothy Chandler, his mother, once remarked to Newsweek: "I was very surprised when Otis came out of the Air Force and went to work." Others of the family were also astonished—and less pleasantly so, as time went on.

One morning in March, 1961, conservative readers were gratified to see in the Times the first of a series on the John Birch Society and Robert Welch. Their pleasure turned to surprise and their surprise to anger. The series was factual, informative and critical and after it had run its course, the Times excommunicated the society and its chief from proper, conservative ranks. This piece of subversion caused a division within the Chandlers. Mrs. Philip Chandler, a member of the Birch Society, found the editorial among the least agreeable political comments she had read that year. Philip Chandler, Otis' uncle, soon thereafter resigned as vice president of the Times Mirror Company to devote his attention to another family enterprise. He said his move had "no connection at all" with the series, but while he was not in substantial agreement with the society ("or I would be a member, which I am not"), he found that in general its members "are a group of fine people."

Critical mail poured in from Birch members and their adherents, and the Times's steady circulation growth began to slow. The fuss soon abated, however, and the paper continued to amass readers—by a phenomenal 61 per cent during the week in the past seven years and 30 per cent on Sunday. Its daily circulation (856,621) is exceeded only by the tabloid New York Daily News (2,074,621), the combined editions of The Wall Street Journal (1,115,000) and The New York Times (963,130). On Sunday, the Los Angeles Times's circulation (1,145,695) ranks third behind the News (3,099,658) and The New York Times (1,588,091). The Los Angeles Times had moved ahead of The New York Times, but the latter regained its position on the death of the Herald Tribune. In total advertising lineage (108.9 million lines in 1966), the Los Angeles Times leads all other U.S. newspapers by a wide margin and has done so for a decade.

The paper is emerging as the West Coast counterpart of The New York Times, and it is not inconceivable that long before Otis Chandler is ready to retire it could become the chief competitor of The New York Times as a national newspaper. (It is an ironic possibility that the New York paper's abortive experiment with a West Coast edition was in part responsible for the transfusion of editorial zeal that has reinvigorated the Los Angeles Times.) That feat would be accomplished by three elements: money, will and ability. The cash is available (The Times Mirror Company grossed more than $255 million in 1966 from the paper and other publishing ventures, and its income was up again in 1967), the intent is plain, and the ability is suggested by the record.

No other newspaper in the country has so thoroughly parted from an undistinguished past. No other newspaper, not even the Times of New York, has a richer base from which to operate—the five coastal counties stretching 216 miles from Santa Barbara to San Diego. Half of California's 20 million population is concentrated in this strip, which the Times dominates journalistically. Los Angeles is 2,474 airline miles from New York, and the Times does not share the disability of dailies on the East Coast, where even Washington's powerful Post operates under the shadow of The New York Times.

The new publisher's first move was to raise the level of his paper's national and international coverage. The changes were extensive. In place of the three-man bureau, the Times now has fourteen Washington correspondents. Chandler supplanted the one lonely foreign correspondent with fourteen, and assigned a man to the United Nations in New York. He set up seven domestic news bureaus, staffed by nine correspondents, to supplement the wire services with specialized reporting. In addition, the Times, in conjunction with The Washington Post, founded the Times-Post News Service in 1962 as the only national rival in this field to The New York Times. The news service editor, stationed in Washington, selects fifty to seventy-five dispatches daily from the domestic and foreign news flow of the two papers, and sends this wide range of fact and analysis to 211 subscribers on every continent, including 135 in the United States and Canada. The Los Angeles Times Syndicate distributes columns and other features to 1,000 newspapers in forty countries.

If the Times is to become a national newspaper comparable to The New York Times, it must compete in the areas of national and international reporting, and the Los Angeles paper has lavished most of its attention to date in this direction. Both domestic and foreign services will be strengthened steadily; a bureau will be opened in Rome this year. The paper shares a general weakness of the American press in neglecting Canada. One Los Angeles editor offered the cliché: "Nothing ever happens up there."

Money (the Times's editorial budget has more than doubled since 1960 and reached $9 million last year) can create a large newspaper, but money alone cannot guarantee quality. That requires talent, and the Times has lured to its pages some of the best in the newspaper—and magazine—field. Magazines have long used newspapers as a recruiting ground; the Times is conscientiously returning the favor, taking top people from Time, Newsweek, The Saturday Evening Post and other publications by matching, and sometimes exceeding, their salary scales. Other attractions are personal recognition through bylines, in contrast to the anonymous group journalism of the news weeklies, and greater freedom. "No member of the staff [now more than 400; The New York Times news staff numbers 842] has carte blanche at the Times," says editor Nick B. Williams, "but on the other hand, editors in this office don't think they automatically know more about the story than the man on the scene." News-magazine correspondents complain habitually of the strange mutations their reports undergo in the home office.

The Times has ranged far for talent. James Bellows, last editor of the New York Herald Tribune, was brought to Los Angeles as associate editor, and perhaps heir apparent to Williams. Robert J. Donovan, chief of the Tribune's Washington bureau, switched to head of the Times bureau there. Three other Tribune correspondents accompanied him. Osgood Caruthers, formerly of The New York Times, is now the Los Angeles Times man in Bonn; and Richard Reston, James Reston's son, is the Moscow bureau chief. National news editor Edwin O. Guthman, a Pulitzer Prize winner, came to Los Angeles from Seattle. He had also been Robert F. Kennedy's press aide. Another Pulitzer Prize winner, Jack Nelson, left The Atlanta Constitution to join the Times. The Denver Post contributed a third Pulitzer winner, its cartoonist Paul Conrad. Joe Alex Morris, Jr., is now stationed in Beirut, and Stanley Meisler in Nairobi (both contribute to The Nation).

While the Times covers major news stories in detail, the paper devotes increasing attention to interpretation, and has no plans to compete with The New York Times as a journal of record. The Los Angeles editors feel, for example, that D. J. R. Bruckner's and Jack Nelson's interpretive reports from the Midwest and the South tell more about those regions than blow-by-blow descriptions of isolated events. The Times's foreign correspondents similarly leave to the wire service most of the breaking news and concentrate on its significance. (They often draw a thin line between subjective personal opinion and professional evaluation, but objectivity has always been more myth than fact. Selection of the "facts" is itself a form of interpretation.)

The weakness of the paper, one critic complains, is its failure to come to grips with its own community; or, as another put it, "When is the Times going to establish a Los Angeles bureau?" Los Angeles, like all other great urban conglomerations, is afflicted with foul air, race conflicts, slums, traffic snarls and sleazy, unplanned growth. Except when a ghetto erupts, such problems have usually been neglected by most newspapers. It is easier and less hazardous for local editors to denounce Bobby Baker than to expose corruption in their own communities. For whatever reason, this has been partly true of the Times, but it is becoming less so. Last spring, the paper exposed connections between two municipal commissions and the real estate developers, and later documented conflicts of interest in another city board [see The Nation, June 12 and November 6, 1967]. As a result, the Los Angeles county grand jury on December 28 indicted City Human Relations Commissioner Keith Smith, Harbor Commissioner George D. Watson and former Harbor Commissioners Karl L. Rundberg and Robert N. Starr for bribery. In addition, Smith was charged with perjury and Watson with criminal conflict of interest. Also named in the bribery indictments was the late president of the Harbor Commission, Pietro Di Carlo, who drowned in the Los Angeles harbor November 7. The jury accused him of accepting two bribes from Smith. Police listed Di Carlo's death as an accident. While no newspaper can neglect its own doorstep and achieve overall distinction, the Frederick G. Bonfils rule no longer applies. Bonfils said in the twenties that a dog fight in Denver (he was involved in many) was more important to Denver Post readers than a war in Europe. The atom bomb did a lot to change that.

With the help of Gov. Ronald Reagan and the activist students—who are collaborating in a melodrama to stimulate public interest in the subject—the Times gives close attention to education. No other paper in the country reports this subject more consistently, more fully, or more ably. Under the proprietary watchfulness of Dorothy Chandler, the arts get broader and more critical coverage than ever before in the Times. The paper's astringent music critic, Martin Bernheimer, brought from the Saturday Review, is a new experience for Los Angeles. His predecessor distinguished himself principally as a foe of Stravinsky, who survived the tiny slings and arrows.

The transformation of the Times is nowhere more evident than in the editorial section, which used to consist chiefly of ringing harangues for the Republican Party. In contrast, and representative of the new approach, was a recent, brilliantly written essay on race relations. The Times asked: "Do we believe that our revolution, as Jefferson perceived and as Lincoln proclaimed, was a movement for the spiritual freedom of man, unbounded by geography, race or culture? Or do we believe that our revolution was for whites only?"

The paper reveals a growing sophistication toward its old bête noire, Reds in Hollywood. West, its new Sunday magazine, published a sympathetic where-are-they-now? piece on the "Hollywood Ten." A dead-pan put-on of film society, called "The Hollywood Establishment," recently enlivened West's pages.

The Times still for the most part supports Republican candidates, although the days of its Pavlovian response to the 20th century are over. With a bow toward Otis the founder, the paper endorsed Barry Goldwater and later Ronald Reagan, but did so tepidly enough to risk its Republican franchise. Reagan and the Times are now living apart, and their incompatibility may reach a divorce court.

The Times restricts its own opinion to two columns running down one side of the editorial page, and opens seven columns daily and twenty-two on Sunday to interpretive articles by staff members, outside experts and a mixed bag of columns. These range from Walter Lippmann to William F. Buckley, Jr., with Joseph Kraft, Max Lerner, Joseph Alsop, Raymond Moley and a variety of others somewhere between. Drew Pearson is tossed in frequently to add roughage, except when he is tossed out as being a little too rough.

The paper, perhaps too self-conscious of its past, nibbles at its targets, but rarely bites. Teeth are supplied occasionally in the letters columns, where the best testimonials to the new Times come from its devout enemies. One fierce lady, feeling the conservative Pasadena ground reeling under her low-heel walkers, wrote: "The Times is now the Fabian mouthpiece of libertines, libidinous louts, and printers of pandering lies, determined to destroy the dignity and sense of decency which Americans, formerly, revered as indices of manhood, separated from bestiality." The Times might consider dipping its pen now and again in that lady's ink.

JAPAN IN ASIA'S FUTURE

W. MACMAHON BALL

Mr. Ball is on the political science faculty of the University of Melbourne. In 1946 and 1947, he was Australian Minister to Japan. He is the author of Nationalism and Communism in East Asia.

How is America's present policy in Vietnam likely to affect Japan's future policy toward America? How carefully have the makers of American policy considered this? What role do they hope or expect Japan to play in Asia's future?

It seems certain that Japan must in its own right be a leading power in East Asia. The Japanese are the most highly educated people in Asia, much better educated than many Western peoples. They are skilled in science and technology, organization and management. Unlike many Asian nations they are remarkably homogeneous in race, religion, language and culture. They have a sense of national unity that somehow transcends the endless din of personal, factional and party conflicts.

Japan's economic recovery and growth over the past fifteen years is one of the most impressive achievements in the world's economic history. Japan has now surpassed France, West Germany and Britain in the production of steel and of motor vehicles. In 1967 its shipbuilding led the world for the twelfth successive year. All this has given the Japanese Government and people a confidence that their country can play a key role in the future of Asia. The big question, of course, is whether the role they want to play is the one the United States wants them to play.

There is lately a marked contrast between Japan's readiness to make bold international economic commitments and its reluctance to make political or military commitments. On the economic front Japan has joined the Organization for European Cooperation and Development (OECD), and agreed, as a member of the Development Assistance Committee, to lift its foreign aid to 1 per cent of its gross national product. The government has convened in Tokyo conferences of those in charge of economic affairs in Southeast Asian countries. It has shown initiative in searching for ways to restore Indonesia's economy. It has matched the American contribution of $200 million to the Asian Development Bank, has promised $100 million to its special agricultural fund.

But on the political and military fronts the story is different. Prime Minister Eisaku Sato has expressed his government's sympathy with U.S. objectives in Vietnam. He has said that it would be unreasonable to expect America to suspend the bombing of North Vietnam without some "reciprocal assurance" from Hanoi. Yet it might be misleading to take Mr. Sato's soothing statements as a sure indication of Japan's future foreign policy. They are an understandable response to present American and domestic pressures. There has been a strong and growing domestic demand that America should return to Japan the civilian administration of Okinawa. Perhaps Mr. Sato felt that his chance of getting this major concession from Washington would be enhanced if he expressed his general sympathy with America's cause in Vietnam. He was too hopeful.

It is also understandable that Americans in high places may be impatient with Japan's evident reluctance to give economic aid, and adamant opposition to giving any military aid, to the government of South Vietnam. In American eyes Japan is trying to have its cake and eat it. The Japanese Government is content to shelter under the U.S. nuclear umbrella, but not willing to spend even 1.5 per cent of its gross national product on defense. Meanwhile, the Japanese find that providing many of America's needs in Vietnam is a highly profitable business.

It is not certain that Mr. Sato has full authority to declare Japan's foreign policy. This is said not because his Liberal Democratic Party suffered a marked setback at the general election last January, for the Socialist opposition also lost votes. It is because many factions of his own ruling party, as well as the great majority of the parties in opposition, are so deeply opposed to any active support for the military containment of China. Indeed Mr. Sato has sometimes seemed to be at odds with Mr. Miki, his Foreign Minister, who has publicly described the Vietnamese War as "a civil war," and insisted that its basic cause is the failure of successive governments of South Vietnam to take constructive measures to relieve the poverty of the people. Mr. Rusk hardly shares this view. The Japanese Government's attitude toward the Asian Pacific Conference (ASPAC) illustrates its general approach to what Mr. Miki calls the "Asia-Pacific Sphere." When the original sponsors of ASPAC asked Japan to join, since its presence would clearly give the new organization a prestige it would otherwise lack, Japan made it a condition of joining that ASPAC must be concerned only with cooperative efforts to stimulate economic development in East Asia, and be in no sense an anti-Communist or anti-Peking alliance. Only after these conditions were satisfied did Japan take part in the first conference in June, 1966. It is reliably reported that at the second conference last year the Japanese delegation declined to sign the draft communiqué until direct warnings about communism and indirect warnings about China had been deleted.

It is hard to get a clear picture of the role Japan wants for itself in East Asia from what the party leaders say, for what they say tends to change, at least in emphasis and tone, with every shift in the balance of factional power within these parties. Despite the difficulties, I think it possible to generalize about how most Japanese feel and think on certain basic issues. I believe it impossible for any Japanese Government to carry out a foreign policy that contravenes these feelings and thoughts.

The Japanese feel increasing concern about China's ambitions. For some years the split between Chinese and Russian Communists has created a series of dilemmas for the Japanese Communist Party, which is trying to be neutral but is now much closer to the Russians than to the Chinese. Many Japanese Socialists, notably the more idealistic among them, have been dismayed by the Chinese nuclear explosions, and by the turmoil of the cultural revolution. Yet I believe it would be a profound mistake for the West to jump to the conclusion that the anxieties of the Japanese will bring their view of China into focus with the American official view. The Japanese evaluation is that, however unlimited China's declared ambitions may be, its real ambitions are limited, and can be accommodated without any real or present danger to Japan's national interests.

The human sympathies of the Japanese are not with the Americans but with those Vietnamese who are targets of American firepower. The British sociologist, R. P. Dore, has summed it up this way: "A good many Japanese . . . have seen the war as a battle between white men armed with big planes throwing big bombs at underdog Asians—and people with Mongolian features at that—who squat down to eat rice out of bowls with chopsticks, and might, but for the grace of God, be themselves." It is inconceivable that America can win the sympathetic support of the Japanese people for its military policy in Vietnam.

Sympathies for fellow Asians reinforce the alarm of the Japanese for their own safety. They fear that even a limited conventional war between America and China or America and the Soviet Union would almost certainly embroil Japan. Above all, they fear a nuclear war that might obliterate their nation.

The Japanese believe they understand the Chinese—and other Asians—better than Westerners can. They fundamentally disagree with the present American strategy toward China. The Japanese Government knows how much it has depended and continues to depend on the friendship of the United States, but it is tending to insist with increasing confidence that its economic, political and military policies must be formulated in Tokyo, not in Washington. It is nearly unthinkable that Japan will join other non-Communist Asian countries in a military alliance against China in particular or communism in general.

It would be foolish to pretend that Japan's attitude toward its own military security is clear-cut and consistent. Ever since the peace treaty, and the defense treaty with America in 1957, which was amended and extended for ten years in 1960, Japanese leaders have had great difficulty in explaining why they have self-defense forces, and since they do have them, why they spend a decreasing percentage of gross national product in maintaining them. It seems that Japanese Governments have made an important distinction between the safety of Japan and the containment of communism. On balance they are reassured by the kind of treaty that brings Japan within the shelter of the American nuclear deterrent. But it is quite another thing to have the sort of security treaty that may involve Japan, against its own judgment, in an American-led war against communism. Japan would not welcome any extension of communism in Asia, but it believes that Western military intervention to contain China involves unacceptable costs and risks, and is in any case unlikely to succeed. When the renewal of the security treaty with America was being debated with such excitement in 1960, the most important single issue was whether America was to have the right to operate from its bases in Japan without the consent of the Japanese Government. The American Government was ready to agree to use the bases for operations in the Far East only "after consultation with" the Japanese Government, but would not agree to use them only "with the consent of" the Japanese Government.

Can Japan expect to enjoy the protection of the American nuclear deterrent without the obligation to give moral, material and perhaps military support to America's objectives in East Asia? That is what the Japanese want to be able to do. They argue that Japanese economic and technical aid to the non-Communist countries of Southeast Asia can do more than military intervention to help these countries maintain their independence. This is the sort of argument that cannot be proved right or wrong in advance. The important thing is that it expresses a consensus of Japanese feeling.

In the last few years the Japanese leaders have gained the confidence to make it clear, however politely, that they want to make their own assessments of what is happening in Asia, and to decide for themselves the role they want to play. It is a leading role, but not a military one. That is not because the Japanese leaders are pacifists; it is because they do not see the present dangers in Asia as threats of military aggression, and therefore feel they cannot be effectively met by military measures.

I think that Japan's leaders believe that peace between Asia and the West is Japan's first national interest. I think the West would be wise to respect Japan's judgment about how Japan can best help achieve this objective.

LETTERS (Continued from page 66)

independent, democratic. European fortnightly of high literary and artistic value that raised its voice, among other things, against totalitarianism, against racial discrimination, in Little Rock or in Kiev and for writers and intellectuals thrown into jail in South Africa or in Hungary, in Spain or in the Soviet Union. . . . Perhaps the time has come to set the record straight, at least as far as the relationship between Hungarian émigré intellectuals and the Congress for Cultural Freedom is concerned. . . . it must be said, it seems to me, quite emphatically, that the CCF performed an important and successful human, moral and organizational function in regard to a very large number of Hungarian intellectuals, students, artists, musicians and writers when it was most needed, namely, during the first and frightening yet unforgettable years of their exile.

Tamas Aczél

North Dakota resolves

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIR: From the endless oyster bed which back issues of the Congressional Record seems to be, I found another pearl the other night. I think it well worth consideration by the assorted skinny-dippers who fret about the "rigid extremism" of wording like that of San Francisco's Proposition "P" regarding Vietnam (which managed a sizable roll-up despite almost 100 per cent opposition by the press).

Here is the pearl:

Resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota to the Committee on Foreign Relations—Senate Resolution 1 (1951), Cong. Record, p. 908, 1951.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota, that the Congress and the President of the United States are respectfully urged to take immediate action for the following purposes:

1. To withdraw all troops and military personnel from Korea;
2. To recognize the principle that no political or military commitment with respect to foreign policy that may involve the lives of Americans is binding upon the people of the United States unless it is first approved by the Congress; . . .
5. To provide the people of the United States with realistic information so that public opinion may crystallize in the form of a unified and unselfish foreign policy that history will applaud, and
6. To disassociate ourselves from the Korean policy which has brought to our youth the tragedies of war without a candid recognition of the existence of a state of war, a policy which has made us the policemen of the United Nations without the United Nations assuming full responsibility for the eventualities of police action, a policy which risks war without first determining whether the objectives sought are worth the risk, or a willingness to accept the risk when encountered;

That a copy of this resolution be signed by the President and Secretary of the State Senate and sent to the President of the United States, Secretary of State and to each Congressman and Senator from North Dakota.

Ray Schnell, Pres. of Senate
W. J. Trout, Sec'y Senate 1951

I submit that the Senate of North Dakota has not of recent decades been noted for outlandish left-wing behavior—nor even in the forgotten past of 1951 was it a hotbed of radical irresponsibility. . . . Helen Hosmer

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Communist Dreams and Soviet Reality

THE UNFINISHED REVOLUTION: Russia 1917-1967. By Isaac Deutscher. Oxford University Press. 115 pp. $3.75.

DAVID JORAVSKY

Mr. Joravsky teaches history at Northwestern University. He is the author of Soviet Marxism and Natural Science (Columbia University Press).

Despair occasionally threatened Isaac Deutscher's dream of revolutionary salvation. The Russo-Chinese conflict provoked an especially poisonous reflection: "Arrogant bureaucratic oligarchies, incorrigible in their national narrow-mindedness and egoism, cannot be expected to work out any rational solution of this or any other conflict; still less lay stable foundations for a socialist commonwealth of nations." (The Unfinished Revolution, p. 108). Yet Deutscher kept his faith in the proletarian internationalism that would save the world from war.

Similarly with the other dreams that inspired the October Revolution. Deutscher virtually ruled out the possibility that any of them will be brought to life by the Communist governments: not direct democracy, and certainly not the withering away of the state; not workers and peasants running their own factories and farms, and certainly not the free distribution of goods according to each man's notion of his own needs; not the true marriage of intellectual and folk culture, and certainly not the fusion of manual, mental and managerial functions in superbly versatile new men. Yet Deutscher continued to cherish these Marxist dreams, insisting that somehow or other a revolutionary transformation will make them real.

Because of this faith he could neither remain a Communist (he quit in 1932), nor join "the enemy camp," nor sink into quiet skepticism. He maintained his faith by working at history, the literary art that may not neglect the known facts. That is not unusual. Many people keep a variety of faiths by working at history, but they usually huddle together in schools, acquiring thus a captive audience, a guaranteed income, and constant reassurance from one another's endless demonstrations that the grand old faith is supported by the known facts, which only seem to be chaotic and subversive. Deutscher was unusual in being a free lance, not only financially but intellectually. Indeed I am forced to call him unique. I cannot think of one other recent student of the Russian Revolution who has worked on the assumption that the original Communist dreams have been in process of realization.

This is the first of two issues on some of the many books published in connection with the fiftieth anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution. Next week's issue will contain reviews by Donald Fanger on Bulgakov, Simon Karlinsky on Pasternak, Mark R. Hillegas on Zamiatin and Katayev, and Helen Yglesias on works by Ehrenburg, Semyonovna Ginzburg and Chukovskaya.

Soviet historians long ago changed the dreams to suit current political needs, and for the most part their art has shocked readers into disbelief by deliberately ignoring known facts. Communists outside the Soviet Union have shrunk from a detailed study of their favorite revolution, or they have written in the Soviet style, redefining the original dreams to the point of disappearance and blandly ignoring inconvenient facts. (See, most notably, the histories of Andrew Rothstein and Louis Aragon.) Most non-Communist writers have nourished their faiths by polemics, endless demonstrations that the Bolsheviks were power-mad demagogues who never believed the dreams they preached, or fanatics who quickly turned into demagogues. None of these schools took kindly to Isaac Deutscher. For the most part they ignored him.

Some non-Communists resemble the 16th-century politiques, who helped end the wars of religion by extricating themselves from religious faith. For the politiques the truth or falsity of religious beliefs mattered very little; the important thing was to get rival believers to live in peace. Humane skeptics of this type have been Isaac Deutscher's most sympathetic audience. They read him as they read Graham Greene, an author who turns a fearfully odd creed into something understandable, not frightening, even quaintly appealing. In short, Deutscher's books have not provoked thought as much as they have stirred sentiments, hostile among cold warriors, friendly among neutrals, and condescending among sophisticates, who think of Deutscher as the last surviving specimen of an extinct species.

Any condescension that may be appropriate here should not be directed at Deutscher. His books do contain powerful stimulus for thought, but they have been kept from the audience that would respond. In Communist countries his biography of Stalin and his three-volume monument to Trotsky would provoke furious argument about the contrast between Communist dreams and Communist reality. So they are banned. Deutscher consoled himself with the conviction that some day the revolution would be revitalized, and that his books would then find their proper audience. He never seriously considered the possibility that Soviet Communists might share with Spanish Catholics or American nationalists a permanent aversion to critical self-examination. Of course he recognized the abundant evidence of such an aversion up to now; he was an honest scholar. But he systematically ascribed it to the "arrogant bureaucratic oligarchy," a transient product of historical circumstances, not to communism as such.

Deutscher had a very simple method for absorbing subversive facts without overturning his faith. He blamed them on the Russian past or on the world situation or on some other circumstances extraneous to communism. Whatever he admired he credited to the ideals of Marxism, or the heroic qualities of the proletariat or some other essential element of communism. He resembled the better Christian scholars, who do not shrink from telling the most repulsive facts of their church's history because they distinguish between the church militant, which is of this world and shares its imperfections, and the church triumphant, which is perfect, as we shall all see if we live long enough. Malraux made this analogy at the time of the blood purge, and Deutscher quotes him with obvious sympathy: "'Just as the Inquisition did not detract from the fundamental dignity of Christianity, so the Moscow trials do not detract from the fundamental dignity of Communism.'" (The Prophet Outcast, p. 370.)

A smile or a groan will not deliver the sophisticate from metaphysical distinctions of this type. He cannot speak of communism—whether ideology, movement, government or all three—without defining it. Even if his definition runs to several volumes of historical discourse he is bound to distinguish between the persistent or essential characteristics of his subject and its transient or accidental ones. Thus the distinction between the church triumphant and the church militant, between essential communism and its accidental features, appears in the typical non-Communist history as it does in Deutscher's, only reversed.

The typical non-Communist begins by emphasizing the authoritarian aspects of Marxist ideology and the tyrannical fury that Lenin displayed in pre-revolutionary factional quarrels. To this essential heritage he joins the accident of Russian collapse in the First World War, and returns to essentials: the armed seizure of power, the suppression of rival parties and of dissent within the Bolshevik Party, the triumph of Stalinism with its blood purges and concentration camps and, most of all, the frenzied building of an industrial-military complex. These are the essentials of communism to the typical non-Communist. All contrary evidence is brushed aside or explained away as sucker bait, or historical accident or—considering the changes since Stalin died—the incipient dissolution of communism.

It is as if a historian of Protestantism brushed aside the appeal to individual conscience, calling it demagoguery or utopian nonsense, and declared the essential characteristic of Protestantism to be the subjection of individual consciences to absolute state churches or church states. In 1567 this would have been a plausible argument. Or in 1867, when another revolutionary outburst in France had led once again to Napoleonic monarchy, it would have been plausible to point and exclaim: There is the essential result of the democratic revolution, not the Jacobin republic, and certainly not Babeuf's society of equals.

It was Isaac Deutscher's great service to remind anyone who would listen that the military-industrial strength of the Russian or the Chinese state is not the only, or even the most important, indication of the essence of communism. He was sure that the dreams of subject people throwing off their oppressors, of workers running their own factories, while the state withered away and the nations rejoiced in friendly diversity, that these dreams would reassert their power, as the Protestant dream of free conscience continually reasserted itself from the Hussite Wars through the Puritan Revolution. (He makes this explicit comparison in The Unfinished Revolution, pp. 109-11, though he obscures it somewhat by Marxist clichés about the Ref-ormation.)

Metaphysical faith is required for such a conviction, as it is for the opposed belief of the typical anti-Communist, who is willing to concede only this much hope for red regimes, that they may evolve into something like his own. The simple truth is that we don't know for sure who is moving toward what goal (if there is any goal), because we can't be sure (until the story is ended and no one is left to tell it) what has been essence and what accident.

Those who favor scientific history, rather than storytelling by and for the faithful, must recognize that their prospects are not very bright. Hardly any historians make a serious effort to observe the basic rule of scientific inquiry: to imagine what facts would disprove their pet beliefs, and to go look for such facts. At best the average historian worries about the inconvenient facts that infidels may use against him, and he looks for such facts in the writings of infidels. If the community of scholars is sufficiently large and sufficiently divided in its rival faiths, the resulting disputes may drive metaphysical beliefs toward precise definition and empirical test—or the scholars may be driven toward bewildered despair. The world community of scholars studying communism is very large, and it seems to be sufficiently divided in its rival faiths: varieties of communism versus varieties of anti-communism, with a few politiques hunting for neutral ground in between. The trouble is that nearly all of these scholars are agreed in one crucial aspect of their otherwise different faiths. They have an overwhelming tendency to assume that communism is what has prevailed in Communist movements and regimes during the past half century: totalitarian mobilization of backward nations for the murderous game of international politics.

Most scholars brush aside or explain away the fact that the Communist revolution began, as the democratic and the Protestant did, with "the dazzling blaze of a great vision" (The Prophet Armed, p. 318), promising perfect freedom and brotherhood. Deutscher spent his life reminding us of that fact, which is crucial to an understanding of 1917 in Russia, when all varieties of realistic politicians lost control of the lower classes. (Was this an accident or an essential foreshadowing of a century of total war?) Deutscher stressed the original dreams because he was sure that they are not utopian, that future Communists will revive them. We should amend his "will revive" to "may revive," and begin our studies with this insight.

Stories of a Soviet Writer

ENVY AND OTHER WORKS. By Yuri Olesha. Translated, with an Introduction by Andrew R. MacAndrew. Doubleday-Ancor. 288 pp. $1.45 paper.

LOVE AND OTHER STORIES. By Yuri Olesha. Translated, with an Introduction by Robert Payne. Washington Square Press. 230 pp. $4.95.

EDWARD J. BROWN

Mr. Brown is chairman of the Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures at Indiana University. His most recent book is Stankevich and His Moscow Circle: 1830-1840 (Stanford University Press).

These two volumes offer the hope that, after long neglect, a brilliantly original Soviet artist will not be without honor, at least among strangers. Olesha's reputation suffered grim vicissitudes in his own country. For twenty years he was practically forgotten, though he is now established among the intellectual elite as a writer whose works contain intimations of greatness. His career was a casualty of the brutal pressures engendered by dictatorship. He was a "Soviet writer" for thirty years, yet he wrote little; all his important prose can be encompassed in one single thin volume.

Olesha's novel Envy and his short stories present philosophical problems, psychological studies and social commentary, embodied in symbolic situations or childlike images. The story "Liompa" counterposes a tiny boy, whose impressions of the world have not yet been organized as concepts and given "names," and a dying old man, whose sense impressions, as they weaken and recede, seem to leave behind only the abstract husks of their "names." For the child, all sense impressions are vivid and exciting because they are new and uncategorized and each can be dealt with as itself, directly; for the dying man, sensual experience is the very life that is leaving him. A somewhat older boy symbolizes what the tiny one will become: he is building a model airplane and he uses measurements, charts and tables. The story pronounces no judgment, it "prefers" neither the cerebral nor the sensual; it simply develops in the death of old Ponomarev and the eager life of his young visitor ("Grandpa! Your coffin's just come!"), a brief symbolic statement on the growth and decline of the conscious life.

In the story "Love," the hero Shuvalov is puzzled by the problem of knowledge.

"Do your senses convey a correct picture of the world to you?" he asks a color-blind friend, and receives the confident answer: "The whole world except for certain color details." But because Shuvalov is in love he attends precisely to the "color details," ignoring the categories established by form and line. The force of love even suspends the law of gravity, and in a dream Isaac Newton calls him to account for this.

"The Cherry Stone" is about the familiar anguish of unrequited love, and it mingles epistemology with social concern. The young man is an inhabitant of the "country of Attention and Imagination," where the mind creates a new world of experience out of the simplest reality, just by paying attention to it; he knows the lilac color and bony texture of stones, and how soft and elongated shadows are in the last moments of an afternoon.

The novel Envy was an immediate success when it appeared in 1927. Even the party critics were delighted at the spectacle of Kavalero, a character who is a derelict poet, a defender of the past and an individualist, consumed with impotent envy of the new Socialist man. But Olesha's symbolism was more richly tiered than they at first realized. Kavalero speaks for all those who find themselves at odds with the brave new world of organizations and organization men, and the novel's social message is deliberately ambivalent. Its form and its devices are boldly original. Sexual symbolism of a clearly "Freudian" provenance is central to its method. The relationship of Kavalero to the commissar who has rescued him from an urban gutter is a confused homosexual attachment, an experience of both hatred and intense love. In order to lend depth to his central characters Olesha employs a variety of narrative devices: dreams, formal reports and interviews, a fairy tale, inner monologues, letters and memoranda, reminiscences. The prose is sensitive and rich with imagery. It offers the translator both opportunity and danger.

Mr. MacAndrew's volume is clearly the better of the two books under review. In addition to Envy and the important short stories, it includes Olesha's play A List of Assets, and his speech at the First Congress of Soviet Writers in 1934, a document of compelling historical and cultural interest. Lapses from accuracy are few and minor; yet MacAndrew often fails to convey an adequate sense of style. The subtle poetry in Olesha's prose can be lost easily unless special pains are taken to reproduce it in translation. MacAndrew occasionally omits phrases or simplifies passages. Perhaps an editor tampered with his work and, in "normalizing" his English, suppressed Olesha's cadences. But the translator does

BLACK MAN IN WHITE AMERICA

FREE BUT NOT EQUAL

The Midwest and the Negro during the Civil War

V. Jacque Voegeli

Draws on records of congressional debates, government documents, correspondence, diaries and newspaper editorials to show how the onset of the war at first intensified anti-Negro sentiment in the Midwest. This attitude only gradually gave way to the acceptance of emancipation, the use of Negro soldiers, and the granting of limited freedom to Negroes in the "American Heartland." Mr. Voegeli is assistant professor of history at Vanderbilt University. $4.95

BLACK CHICAGO

The Making of a Negro Ghetto, 1890-1920

Allan H. Spear

"For a black Chicagoan, Black Chicago is an almost heartbreaking book."—HOYT W. FULLER, Book Week. "... gives an objective analysis that heightens the significance of this timely volume." — ROBERT C. WEAVER, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. "Brilliant, incisive and unusually perceptive." — AUGUST MEIER. $7.50

The Leopard's Spots: Scientific Attitudes toward Race in America, 1815-59. by William Stanton. $4.00; paper $1.95

Slavery: A Problem in American Institutional and Intellectual Life. by Stanley M. Elkins. $5.00

The First Emancipation: The Abolition of Slavery in the North. by Arthur Zilversmit. $6.95.

Negro Politicians: The Rise of Negro Politics in Chicago. by Harold F. Gosnell, with a New Introduction by James Q. Wilson. paper $2.95

Slavery in the Americas: A Comparative Study of Cuba and Virginia. by Herbert S. Klein. $6.95

Images of the Negro in American Literature. Edited by Seymour L. Gross and John Edward Hardy. $6.50; paper $2.95

Shadow of the Plantation. by Charles S. Johnson, with an Introduction by Robert E. Park. paper $1.95

The Negro Family in the United States. by E. Franklin Frazier. Revised and Abridged Edition with a New Foreword by Nathan Glazer. $6.00; paper $2.45

Created Equal?: The Complete Lincoln-Douglas Debates of 1858. Edited and with an Introduction by Paul M. Angle. $8.50

Deep South: A Study of Social Class and Color Caste in a Southern City. by Allison Davis, Burleigh B. Gardner, and Mary R. Gardner. $7.00; paper $2.95

Urban Blues. by Charles Keil. $4.95

The Negro Population of Chicago: A Study of Residential Succession. by Otis Dudley Duncan and Beverly Duncan. $6.00

The Death of Slavery: United States, 1837-65. by Elbert B. Smith. $5.00

North of Slavery: The Negro in the Free States, 1790-1860. by Leon F. Litwack. $6.00; paper $2.45

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

nevertheless provide a generally accurate account of what Olesha said.

No such statement can be made of the second volume. Love and Other Stories contains a translation of Envy which, as Mr. Payne points out, is not his work. It was published thirty years ago at a time when relative ignorance of Russian was widespread, if not excusable, among translators. Linguistic gaucherie is revealed in the first sentence: "In the bathroom in the morning he sings out aloud." When Kavalero describes with acerbic irony the great man's groin and its remarkable pubic adornment, our translator speaks of the "lower part of his stomach," indeed of his "adorable tummy." Something far worse than prudery is in evidence here.

Inaccuracies abound, and they mutilate the novel. When Babichev's rebellious brother, Ivan, is interrogated by the GPU, the following dialogue occurs: "You called yourself a king?" "Yes, a king of vulgarians." Here the translator destroys both sense and character when Ivan, a grotesque original in speech, thought and manner, is made to call himself "the king of platitudes." Olesha delights in visual images that shatter the optical stereotypes: sunlight reflected in a brass bowl, or broken into its full spectrum of color by a mother-of-pearl button. Sight for him is a source of wonder and delight. At sunset a bearded gypsy in a blue vest carries a bright brass bowl on his shoulder. The day moves away on the gypsy's shoulder. What remains of this optical surprise in a translation which says, flatly: "The day was receding behind the gypsy's shoulder"?

Payne's own versions of Olesha are superior to the translation of Envy which he saw fit to include. Yet he too is capable of distorting both meaning and image. When the lovelorn young man in "The Cherry Stone" hides his cherry pit, his "seed," in the ground in memory of his love, Payne has it that he is "hiding a family in the ground." In the same story he mistranslates 3:15 o'clock as 4:20, and thereby spoils the point of a scene and ruins a metaphor. One shudders at the many possibilities offered in these translations to symbol hunters and close readers who will have no way of knowing what Olesha wrote.

Many more examples of this sort could be given. The Russian Library edited by Payne, to which this volume belongs, is making available some excellent works, among them Osip Mandelstam's poetry, Gogol's "Correspondence with Friends," the complete plays of Vladimir Mayakovsky. Such an impressive list ought certainly to add prestige to both editor and publisher. One hopes that the translations will be adequate.

and spiritual future of their country. The most farseeing envisaged this future as Socialist. They recognized that the autocracy had to be destroyed and none wished to imitate in Russia the ruthless and soulless capitalism of the West. They disagreed about means and particular aims. Some placed their faith in the character of the Russian peasant, others in industrialization, some in permanent revolution, a few in unorthodox religion, but all of them were aware of the strange dynamic of the Russian situation: their backwardness had become the very condition of their seizing a future, far in advance of the rest of Europe. They could transcend the European present, the present of the dehumanized bourgeoisie. Instead of present, they had past and future. Instead of compromises, they had extremes. Instead of limited possibilities, they had open prophecies.

Given this formulation, the interests of the visual artists were exactly as one might expect: an enthusiastic rediscovery of pre-European Russian art coupled with a search for the most advanced, the most modern means of expression.

(It might seem that there was a similar pattern of interest in the West: enthusiasm for the "primitive" accompanied by sophisticated innovation. But for the West the "primitive" belonged to foreign, exotic cultures and consequently there was little accompanying sense of continuity and destiny.)

In the Beginning There Was Art

JOHN BERGER

Mr. Berger writes regularly on art for New Society (London). His most recent published work is A Fortunate Man (Holt, Rinehart & Winston). This article and an earlier one, "Neizvestny & the New Art" (The Nation, November 21, 1966) will form part of a work to be published this year by Pantheon. Art and Revolution: An Essay on Neizvestny and The Role of the Artist in the U.S.S.R.

Why, for a few years before and after 1917, was there a movement in the Russian visual arts which, for its creativity, confidence, engagement in life and synthesizing power has so far remained unique in the history of modern art? Why do certain works and ideas, created in Russia between 1917 and 1923, still seem to refer to the future now?

Up to 1917, Russia was still politically an absolutist state without democratic liberties. It was still awaiting the transformations which in the other industrialized countries had been brought about by bourgeois revolutions. Yet the Russian bourgeoisie as a whole remained timid, unrevolutionary, and only mildly reformist in respect of the autocracy. (The fact that a few unusually intelligent individuals patronized the arts on such a scale, and in such a remarkably farsighted way, may be connected with the weakness and lack of vision of the bourgeoisie as a whole; had they been members of a class in which they could believe as a force, they might well have directed their vision and energy into political and financial organization.)

At the same time the Russian proletariat, formed in the relatively few (compared to Western Europe) but very large-scale factories and industrial centers, was quickly becoming one of the most militant and revolutionary in Europe. The revolution of 1905 suggested that the revolutionary force of the workers was overtaking and outbidding that of the bourgeoisie before the latter had established the necessary conditions for their own proper economic development. Twelve years later, the two revolutions of 1917 proved that this was indeed the case.

At this period Russian artists, as members of the Russian intelligentsia, were, by definition, concerned with the political

The modern means of expression were supplied by cubism. I cannot here give a full study of the historical meaning of cubism: it must suffice to point out that cubism rejected the way of seeing, the approach to reality which originated in the Renaissance and had continued as the basis of art ever since. Cubism, in other words, marked in its own field the end of precisely that era—the era of capitalism, bourgeois individuality, utilitarianism—which Russia, it seemed, was about to transcend without ever having entered. And it marked it, not nostalgically but triumphantly by revealing new, more open and more complex possibilities.

Apollinaire wrote in 1914:

*Où donc est tombée ma jeunesse
Tu vois que flambe l'avenir
Sache que je parle aujourd'hui
Pour annoncer au monde entier
Qu'enfin est né l'art de prédire.*

In 1921 Malevich wrote: "Cubism and futurism were the revolutionary forms in art, foreshadowing the revolution in political and economic life of 1917."

It was the conjunction of the cubist example and the revolutionary possibilities in Russia which made the Russian art of this period unique.

One might argue that it was remarkable but not unique. From about 1905 onward, a sense of radical change was beginning to inspire avant-garde artists in other countries: the Futurists in Italy; the De Stijl group in Holland; Der Blaue Reiter in Germany; the Vorticists in England. But there was a significant difference of emphasis, largely due to the fact that for the Russian artists their own bourgeoisie was relatively unimportant as an obstacle. Hence there was no need either to shock the bourgeois or to accept his categories. The Russians exhibited none of the destructive frenzy of the Italian Futurists. (So-called Russian "Futurism" was informed by a quite different and far more rational and constructive spirit.) They seemed free from the tendency to moral absolutism which characterized the Dutch movement. And they were seldom introspective—in the same dark sense as the Germans: there was no retreat inward from the consequences of politics.

The works of Malevich, Lissitzky, Kandinsky, Tatlin, Pevsner, Rodchenko, differ a great deal from one another in spirit. At one extreme Tatlin denied the difference between art and any other productive activity; at the opposite extreme Kandinsky believed that art was valid only if it followed a mysterious and idealistic "inner necessity." Yet despite their differences, all had one attitude in common—and it is this which, at that period, can be defined as specifically Russian. All believed in the profound influence that art could have on individual and social development: all believed in the social role of art.

Yet their social consciousness was affirmative rather than critical. They saw themselves as already representing the liberated future. This liberation meant the breaking down of all divisions between classes, professions, disciplines and previous bureaucratic categories. Their works were like hinged doors, connecting activity with activity; art with engineering; music with painting; poetry with design; fine art with propaganda; photographs with typography; diagrams with action; the studio with the street.

Kandinsky was ideologically the most aloof of these artists, but this is how he wrote about his feelings when he was working in Germany in 1910:

"The corruptive separation of one art from another, and furthermore of 'art' from folk art and children's art from 'ethnography,' the firmly established walls between what I considered to be related or even identical manifestations, in a word, the synthetic relationships, gave me no peace. Today it may well appear strange that for a long time I could find no helpers, no means, simply not enough interest for this idea."

A great deal of what was produced or planned around the year 1917

Just published

CHE GUEVARA SPEAKS

Speeches, articles, interviews and letters spanning Guevara's career from 1959 victory of Cuban Revolution to his death in Bolivia. Subjects include his views on guerrilla warfare, agrarian reform, economic planning and incentives, the artist's role in society, modern imperialism, revolutionary morality, the Vietnam war; his farewell letters to his parents and to Fidel Castro. 159 pp.

Cloth: $4.50

Paperback: $1.95

Merit Publishers

873 Broadway

N.Y., N.Y. 10003

One of the most courageous books ever written by a politician-in-office about his own party and its leaders . . .

FOR THE FIRST TIME UNDER ONE COVER

a definitive history and analysis of the United States involvement in Vietnam

ERNEST GRUENING,

EDITOR OF THE NATION from 1929-1934, progressive Senator from Alaska since 1958, offers a "third alternative" to military victory or abandonment which may result in peace for Vietnam.

Journalistic in style, VIETNAM FOLLY was prepared and researched with scholars' care. It includes illustrations, source notes, an excellent index, and a complete appendix of pertinent historical documents.

THE NATIONAL PRESS

128 C Street, Northeast

Washington, D.C. 20002

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION invites you to sign a New Year's letter to Mr. McNamara:

You are not quit of history yet. No man is, who leaves high office in time of trial. What you do and say matters very much to this country. It can matter to the world, and to our future in the world.

For like it or not the United States today is at the center of a world-wide armed camp. You have been the chief engineer of that massive system of armaments. You have spoken often and suggestively of restraint in the use of that immense mobilized power, most directly in your last major speech in Canada.

When your new appointment to the World Bank was announced, we said of you:

"He should have resigned and stated his reasons."

We went on to say:

"That this is almost unthinkable is a commentary on the state of American politics. If McNamara could not override the taboo against resignation on grounds of principle, who can? Such resignations are vital from the standpoint of an informed, functioning democracy."

To this we now add, Mr. McNamara, that you took your oath of office to the American people, not to the present Administration.

We call on you to speak now about the policies that have launched this country into war in Vietnam, and which even now are breeding new agonies in future Vietnams.

The facts point inescapably to one conclusion: the United States has chosen a wrong road in Vietnam. It is a road that has led from what in the beginning was a highly questionable intervention, to what is now unquestionably a war of American aggression.

SUGGESTION TO THOSE WHO READ THIS LETTER: Tear out the top half and send it, preferably with your own comments, to:

Hon. Robert S. McNamara
Secretary of Defense
Washington, D.C.

P.S. Let us know if you want additional copies of this letter. We'd be happy to oblige.

The war is now an American war, which Americans must end.

Eldon Kenworthy speaks to this point in our last week's issue:

"Americans continue to feel uneasy about withdrawal, even when their common sense increasingly tells them that Yankees can't hope to remake Asian societies. To put it bluntly, we have to make de-escalation and withdrawal respectable."

Mr. Kenworthy goes on to observe that even an "intermediate stage of enclaves, as in Galbraith's recent proposal," would help reverse policies which are now widening, not limiting, a tragically mistaken war. It is the lack of positive action, a lack decried by the Secretary-General of the U.N., by the Pope, and by the more informed segments of our own population, that has brought the peace movement to acts of rage and frustration. Do you truly not believe that this protest springs from unredressed grievance? We ask you to speak to this point.

Adlai Stevenson's life came to an end before he had a chance to speak out forthrightly on administration policies it had been his job to defend. He left us, as a result, a confused legacy.

Mr. McNamara, we ask you to answer this letter, and we have published it so others may join in the call. You know, as we know, that there are ways to reverse the policies that led to our armed invasion of South Vietnam. We want your views as you leave your post, and we believe no man of your honor would make a covenant to be silent.

Sincerely,

THE NATION and _____

Send us the names of three friends whom you want to receive our last issue of The NATION. We'll send you a free copy of J. K. Galbraith's new report, HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM.

The NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue,
New York, N.Y. 10014

has been lost. Much of it was ephemeral. Yet the paintings and constructions which did survive, the very notion of the artist-engineer, the polytechnic art training and research programs worked out by Kandinsky (first for Moscow and later for the Bauhaus in Germany), the startlingly new typography and format of books and posters, the combined use of poetry and visual images, the example of ideograms like Lissitzky's poster "Beat The Whites with the Red Wedge" as well as drawings of monuments which were never put up because of lack of resources, stage designs for the Meyerhold Theatre, the accounts of agit-prop trains in which artists toured the country to explain graphically and verbally what was happening and what was necessary, entirely original experiments with exhibition techniques, the planning by artists of public celebrations such as the formalized re-enactment in October, 1918 of the revolution in front of the Winter Palace, the extremism of artists like Tatlin who, faced with the country's basic problems of survival, abandoned art to apply his visual experience and intelligence to the designing of stoves (maximum heat with minimum fuel), the energy that couples and uncouples Mayakovsky's poetry:

*We will smash the old world wildly
we will thunder
a new myth over the world.
We will trample the fence
of time beneath our feet.
We will make a musical scale of the rainbow.
Roses and dreams
debased by poets will unfold
in a new light for the delight of our eyes
the eyes of big children.
We will invent new roses
roses of capitals with petals of squares*

All this, seen as a threat by some and liberation by others, served notice to the rest of Europe that the role of the artist in the coming world would be very different.

Some of the "leftist" theories can easily be criticized for their oversimplification. The artist-engineer is only one kind of artist: there are also artist-philosophers. The work of art and the machine product are not precisely the same. Yet their overestimation of the machine is understandable enough in the context; the idea of industrialization had acquired a lyrical power, for it seemed to offer a way of avoiding, instead of suffering and enduring, a whole phase of history. The same lyricism is in Lenin's slogan that communism is electrification plus the soviets.

More important than the exaggeration of the leftists was their prophetic vision. Cubism has destroyed the existing formal means in art: the categories within the canvas or sculpture. They proceeded to destroy the wider categories as between different media and as between the artist and the public for his art. No artists had ever lived and worked as they did. Their example rendered the Professional Painter and Sculptor (professional in the sense of belonging to one of the middle-class liberal professions) as obsolete as the fin de siècle bohemian or the artiste maudit. Mayakovsky wrote:

*To work in a factory blacken your face with smoke then at leisure later to flap bleary eyelids at other men's luxuries—
what is the good of that?
Wipe the old out of our hearts!
Enough of penny truths!
The streets our brushes
the squares our palettes.
The thousand-paged book of time says nothing about the days of revolution.
Futurists, dreamers, poets, come out into the street.*

Their vision has been criticized as being naively remote from the actual social reality. What can Tatlin's "Monument to the Third International" mean to a peasant with a wooden plough? The majority of the Soviet population were peasants at an extremely low cultural level. Yet what does the existence of the Third International—quite regardless of any monument—mean to such a peasant? There is often a tendency to expect the artist to solve, as if by magic, problems whose solutions depend upon there being more factories, schoolteachers, road makers, radio engineers. If Gabo's radio station had been built, Tatlin's monument would have made sense more quickly.

There is always a danger that the relative freedom of art can render it meaningless. Yet it is this same freedom which allows art, and art alone, to express and preserve the profoundest expectation of a period. It is part of the nature of man to expect more than he can immediately achieve. His expectations are never independent of necessity, but the necessary should never be confused with the immediate. Philip O'Connor writes, in his Journal: "Art deals only with what is, and by intensity extracts therefrom for the shaping of what will be, which is the essence of what should be—given perfect extraction."

Academicism has to be founded upon a hierarchy of established categories: it needs them for the application of its general and purely theoretical laws. It also needs them, administratively, for

SOVIET UNION and EASTERN EUROPE

(Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Yugoslavia)

Enjoy the trip of a lifetime with one of these wonder tours planned by America's foremost specialists. Here's a wide range of itineraries fitting every taste and budget. Specify folder you want.

- Russian Language Seminars in the USSR, 21-day tours from $645 complete.
- 8-week Russian Language program in the USSR, providing UNIVERSITY CREDIT.
- Eastern Capitals Tours, 11 countries, weekly departures. From $111 complete.
- Russia-Siberia-Mongolia Tour, Escorted departure, July 30th.
- Scandinavia and East Europe.
- Medical Treatment in the USSR, from $211 for 20 days.
- Group and individual tours.
- We obtain visas.

Afton Tours, Inc.

1776 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10019

Phone: (212) 757-9595

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum. It has already been selected for an anthology to be published by Atheneum next Spring.

Single copies—15c
25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

HOLD THAT DATE

January 19 at 6:30 P.M.

DINNER IN TRIBUTE TO JOHN J. ABT who for 35 years has used the law to serve the cause of freedom.

Grand Ballroom, Hotel Roosevelt
For reservations Call—TR 4-2600 or write to:

John Abt Dinner Committee
133 West 72 Street, Room 703
New York, N.Y. 10023

the working of its system of rewards and restraints. For a few years after 1917 the condition of Russian art was the very antithesis of that which had preceded it for nearly two centuries. "We have taken by storm the Bastille of the Academy," claimed the students. For a few years artists served the state on their own initiative in a context of maximum freedom. Soon a very similar academicism was to be reimposed.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

"All the world's a stage." Perhaps it is because I have always regarded the world as "the wide and universal theatre" that I have so long been able to endure continual playgoing. Perhaps on this account, too, my idea of theatre has become so extended that I find the pleasantest evenings in occasions which are not usually included in that category. Thus the most agreeable moments of my recent visits to the playhouses have been at Roy Dotrice's one-man show of Brief Lives and at evenings of the Paul Taylor Dance Company. Unfortunately neither of these pleasures is any longer on Broadway (Brief Lives might have fared better in some less ostentatious locale), but I must not fail to speak of them, however briefly.

Roy Dotrice, an actor unfamiliar to me despite my many English journeys, has had extensive experience of both modern and "classic" roles: Edward IV, Caliban, Caesar and Hotspur. He is not a star, but a very fine actor. In Brief Lives he presents a "character" of 74; since a man of that age in the 17th century must have seemed preternaturally ancient, Dotrice, who is 42, is quite right in playing John Aubrey as if he were 100.

The action of the "play" takes place in lodgings in Dirty Lane, Bloomsbury, in 1697, the year of the old man's death. Born in 1624, Aubrey was a student at Oxford, and still a young man after the Civil War which restored Charles II to the throne of England. He spent most of his life collecting scholarly information and scandalous gossip, the best of which is contained in his Lives. Patrick Garland, credited as the author of the "play"—an arrangement of material from the Lives—tells us that Aubrey has only lately begun to be recognized as England's first serious biographer, one who can take his place alongside Pepys.

Brief Lives not only gives a glimpse of the ordinary mode of living during the Restoration, and of the times which preceded it—way back to Jacobean and Elizabethan days, about which Aubrey retails anecdotes which have come down to him from chronicles and older cronies—but communicates to the audience a sense of being an intimate witness of the related events and a close companion of the folk engaged in them. We see, touch and taste them!

The room, designed by Julia Oman, in which Dotrice-Aubrey shuffles about, cooking and eating his meals, cursing the squalling baby next door, yelling at coachmen on the street below, burrowing in his books, is in itself palpable history. Squalor and wit, rascality and canny observation, obscenity and refinement, innocent brutishness and pithiness of expression, the absence of hygiene and respect for cultural values, above all a texture of pullulating humanity are conveyed in every part of these Brief Lives, and not least in Roy Dotrice's consummately delightful performance.

Paul Taylor has learned how to turn the movement of modern dance into ballet—for which some may scorn him, but not I. His choreography, in which he has trained a small and attractive group of young dancers, is clear, clean, modestly incisive and humorous. His scope may be considered small but the precision and health, the lack of strain or false apocalypticism in his art are refreshing and somehow restful without being in the least soft. If at any past time Taylor's work may have been found lacking in form, the complaint can no longer be made.

On the evidence of his The Journey of the Fifth Horse (I do not know his earlier play Harry, Noon and Night) Ronald Ribman is something more than a "promising" dramatist. His latest piece, The Ceremony of Innocence, does not alter my estimation of him but strikes me as a detour on the road to his further development.

Ribman has sought here to write something approaching a traditional tragedy: the tragedy of a saintly ruler who attempts to use and impose humane reason on his state, so that it may not engage in the wasteful, senseless slaughter of war. The ruler is Ethelred, Anglo-Saxon King of England (986-1016). Nearly all the events of The Ceremony of Innocence, except that there was a war between the English and the Danes at that time, are fabrications. Why Ribman chose Ethelred as a hero I cannot guess, nor do I care. But in assaying a tragic theme one must write to the measure of great characters in a manner both personal and significant.

Ribman's play is literate enough, and the spectacle of a man struggling against the tide of history (which is usually a record of folly) is certainly disheartening, but it is an oft-repeated tale to which one must bring either new insight or new language. Otherwise one is sure to be swamped in a wave of banality or to become afflicted by "a plague of words." To think of this play as having any sharp relevance to the present world situation is to be pathetically ingenuous.

The Ceremony of Innocence is a dramatist's exercise (wholly sincere), but its ambition is misplaced. An author can say more by not trying to say so much. The production at American Place Theatre is impressively designed by Kert Lundell and well costumed by Willa Kim. The best feature of the evening is the generally good cast under Arthur Seidelman's direction, notably Donald Madden, an American actor who speaks and "reads" well without any Anglicized affectation and who seems to have grown considerably since his impetuous earlier ventures as Mark Antony and Hamlet.

Another exercise—this one a director's—is Joseph Papp's Hamlet at the Public Theater. It is a Hellzapoppin' Hamlet which aims to be funny and to elucidate the play in all its ambiguities for a mod audience.

The text is cut to one hour and forty minutes, and is sliced and rearranged for a series of vaudevillesque turns, each of them done as a demonstration of the play's dramatic meaning and for their own jocular sake.

Thus Hamlet wakes up in a coffinlike bed in handcuffs, and Horatio, dressed in concentration camp garb, is in chains throughout. (Isn't Denmark a prison?) Horatio, a constant cameraman, is killed. (The friendly intellectual observer always gets the dirty end of the stick.) Ophelia doesn't drown; instead she is killed by Hamlet—a symbolic truth.

Claudius reads the original Player King's lines (not bad) and he sleeps through the early part of the Play scene (good). Hamlet is at times his father's puppet. (This doesn't work.) Ophelia is something of a sexy dish. (Acceptable, if not wholly original.) She sings the songs of her madness nightclub fashion. (Possible, but though the evening's Ophelia—April Shawhan—has a fetching figure, she does not make the words intelligible.) Almost everything is spoken colloquially at breakneck speed: action takes precedence over poetry.

There is plenty of horseplay and extravagant nonsense—perhaps to prove that Shakespeare was not above such things in his roughhouse theatre. Hamlet as the Gravedigger speaks in a Puerto Rican accent to replace the country speech of the original. "To be or not to be" gets similar treatment.

There are a number of amusing moments: for example, Hamlet's unmistakable pass at Ophelia, interrupted by Polonius and followed by her lines "O my lord, my lord! I have been so frightened," which play well as embarrassed excuses by a girl almost caught in the hay by her father. The characterization of Claudius as a grinning, gun-toting junta politician (engagingly acted by Ralph Waite) is a happy conceit. Many of the sight gags and japes prove duds; they are titillating at times—for instance when Claudius overhears Polonius' address to Laertes and murmurs "Right!" at the most Philistine bits of advice.

Still these games or Pop art variations on a theme become wearisome after fifty minutes. And if the "experiment" is to be taken at all seriously, it should be pointed out that (a) the play would be entirely unintelligible to a person not previously well acquainted with the material; and (b) to make the points of a play clear is not the same thing as making the play clear.

When Meyerhold in Moscow staged The Inspector General and Ostrovsky's The Forest in a manner all his own (disapproved by officialdom), his inventions were not only exhilarating but illuminating in each parallel to the original dramatic action, the result being an entirely coherent play. This, for all the occasional fun and scenic ingenuity, is not true of Papp's Hamlet, but I would not for a moment dream of becoming indignant over it. In fact, considering the hard work and amiable quality of Martin Sheen as Hamlet, and the spirited attack by the company as a whole, I must confess that I could submit myself to this Hamlet much more easily than to many of the star-studded productions I have seen.

Tragic Cakewalk

JULIUS NOVICK

The players, said Hamlet, are the abstract and brief chronicles of the time; but this country's resident professional theatres, for all their devotion to Shakespeare, have failed to take the hint. Whatever is going on right now in the Great Society has been reflected only rarely on their chastely subsidized stages, which have been consecrated to Twelfth Night, The Importance of Being Earnest, and other plays which may perhaps bore the subscribers, but are unlikely to offend them. And so the audience for the resident professional theatre has been limited to that 1 per cent or so of the population that is interested in genteel culture seeking.

One of the few resident-theatre magazines who is seriously concerned about this situation is Mrs. Zelda Fichandler, the founder of the Arena Stage in Washington, D. C. She has said:

If we seek the Negro audience, America's new proletariat, we should integrate our acting companies and seek out plays that speak to Negro concerns. If we want high school and college-age audiences, we must compete with films in terms of the vividness and size of our work, its tempo and color, its immediacy of themes. If we wish to attract what Herbert Marcuse, the professor of philosophy at the University of California, calls "the new working class"—engineers, technicians, researchers and teachers—who are not economically depressed but sensorially dead, then we must attract them with the directness of our work, its abrasion, its physical energy, its source within life itself. . . .

Mrs. Fichandler has had the courage to put her theatre where her mouth is. The Arena Stage is currently offering the world premiere of The Great White Hope, a play by Howard Sackler based on the life of Jack Johnson, the first Negro heavyweight champion, who was hounded out of the country (or so Mr. Sackler has it) by the white power structure. Whether The Great White Hope is actually attracting Negroes, students and "the new working class" I am by no means sure—at the matinee I attended just before Christmas, the audience looked as genteel and stodgy as usual—but the production has all the qualities Mrs. Fichandler calls for in the passage quoted above.

Mr. Sackler has written a great sprawling chronicle in twenty scenes, laid between San Francisco and Budapest, as "Jack Jefferson" wanders the earth looking for a place where he can live in peace with his heavyweight title and his white mistress. Aristotle named "spectacle" as one of the parts of tragedy, and The Great White Hope is spectacular: it features a cakewalk, a prayer meeting, a voodoo ceremony, a funeral, and crowd scenes of all sorts.

It demands a large stage and a huge cast; very few theatres in this country could begin to muster the resources for it. The Arena Stage has recruited a company of more than sixty actors, augmenting its regular company with a number of well-known New York actors, and with some thirty local amateurs to fill out the crowds. This huge, heterogeneous mob has been directed by Edwin Sherin, the Arena's "Associate Producing Director," and he has molded it into a genuine ensemble of professional quality. Some of the actors are now and then defeated by the Arena's difficult acoustics, and some of them occasionally push a little too hard, but not a single performance is less than competent, and the major ones are admirable. James Earl Jones has the heavyweight physique, the heavyweight emotional power, and the mischievous but pointed irony needed to play Mr. Sackler's formidable hero; and Jane Alexander, a member of the Arena's permanent company, plays his mistress with conviction and grace.

The Arena's big rectangular stage, with the audience on all sides, is well suited (insofar as it is well suited to anything) to big, extroverted, fast-moving productions that do not require an elaborately detailed physical environment. Having directed fifteen Arena productions, Mr. Sherin knows how to use this stage. Yet there is no flash and dazzle for its own sake; the staging serves the play. The last scene especially, after Jack has lost his title, when the new champion, the triumphant "white hope," is carried off enthroned as Jack stands humiliated—both men bloody and dazed like sacrificial victims—this scene is corrosively moving, not as spectacle merely but as the resolution of the conflict that the play records, and the image of its hero's destiny.

Sackler's play is by no means one entire and perfect chrysolite. For one thing, it is far, far too long; I do not object to three-and-a-half-hour plays on principle, but this one repeats itself too many times. Furthermore, some of the important characters are unrealized in

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

1-15-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

the writing; the champion's mistress, especially, is far too gracious, too faithful, and generally too perfect to be altogether persuasive. Even Jack Jefferson himself, until he is undermined by the persecutions he suffers, is somewhat too good to be true. For a wide array of additional reasons, a number of scenes fail to come off; the script "needs," as they say, "work."

But The Great White Hope matters very much all the same, just as it stands, because Sackler has gotten hold of a vitally significant piece of history, has realized just why it is significant, and has put that significance, in vivid human terms, on the stage. Jack Johnson/Jefferson, as Sackler depicts him, is not a well-behaved, serious-minded Negro like Booker T. Washington or Sidney Poitier; he mocks at white society, and he sleeps with a white woman. And this, in the land of the free and the home of the brave, is unendurable; America, Sackler suggests, absolutely cannot stand a "bad nigger."

For while I sat watching the play and fighting its implications. I had it in mind to accuse Sackler of catering to the absurd, ugly and dangerous kind of Negro paranoia that considers family planning a genocidal plot against the colored races. But then I thought of Adam Clayton Powell and, even more, of Cassius Clay, who has recently been sentenced to a $10,000 fine and five years in prison for refusing induction into the army. The play is by no means a calm and balanced assessment of the situation, but it seems clear to me that what Sackler implies is at least basically true; ours is still a racist society. But whatever conclusion we come to, the play demands of us, in urgently dramatic terms, that we examine the whole question and our stake in it. I wish it could be shown in the schools, in the House of Representatives, and in other places where immature minds seek to cope with the problems of our day.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION

P.O. Box 1413

Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

The roaring success of Mike Nichols' The Graduate is hardly surprising—he has built it on the dependable formula of Restoration comedy. I would not raise hopes too high: this Way of the Affluent World, to a script by Calder Willingham and Buck Henry, is consistently funny and frequently ironic, but it quite lacks the aphoristic wit of Sheridan or Congreve, and as it wears on it forsakes cynicism for chase and begins to resemble more Harold Lloyd than Mayfair dandy. Still, the spice of the piece, the source of its tension and laughter, is the confrontation of jaded maturity with the demanding innocence of youth. "Never trust anyone over 30" is a slogan that could have served the Restoration as well as it does our own time, and Nichols makes the old formula seem as topical as mini-skirts. Youth wins because its nerves are stronger and its needs simpler; it is not really a moral victory, but it serves that purpose.

If Nichols grasps but cannot hold the style of his model, it is because his older actors let him down. Dustin Hoffman has the right manner as the highly moral and readily seducible Graduate; he is at once gauche, disconcertingly direct and well armed by incredulity against the ploys of his elders. And Katherine Ross, as his destined sweetheart, is properly flouncy in a somewhat dim-witted righteousness. But Ann Bancroft, the seductress, invests a little too heavily in her lechery, and in general the attendant parents, spouses and family friends put too much heartfelt venom into what is essentially a masque of animal spirits. As a result, the film keeps threatening to turn the corner from Belgrave Square into Peyton Place.

Of course, I may be saddling Mr. Nichols with my own concept of his purpose; it is quite possible that he gave no thought at all to the 18th century and had in view no more than a cautionary tale for the 1960s. In that case, though, it is odd that his picture is so much more effective when it is outrageous that when it is outraged.

In a sense, the face of war opposite to Felix Greene's Inside North Vietnam is Pierre Schoendorffer's The Anderson Platoon. The parallel is not quite exact, since one picture describes how the people of North Vietnam stand up to the U.S. assault from the air, and the other shows how the American ground forces attack in the South. Still, the contrast in terms of morale and morality is too sharp to be overlooked.

When I reviewed Greene's film, I recalled the Battle of Britain. Anderson and his men evoke no analogy; I have never seen anything like them before, and wonder if there is any precedent. These are without question the most lethal infantry that have ever stalked the earth. They carry weapons so advanced (Vietnam, we have been told often enough, is a proving ground) that sometimes I could only guess their function; and the sound of battle is a plunking and buzzing quite unlike the crack and whistle of earlier combat. These shock troops take scarcely a step without checking for instruction on radio telephone; their needs and perils are constantly monitored by the hovering, ungainly helicopters (I cannot rid myself of the unwarranted notion that they are the scavenger kites of this war).

But at the heart of all this technological viciousness, the men look like bewildered, sick, abandoned children. They have no idea where the enemy lurks and couldn't identify him if he showed himself. They are constantly on the phone, but rarely know what they are to do; they are briefed by a senior officer, but for all useful purposes he is as ignorant as they (the morrow's objective is such and such hill, but why that hill and not some other?). A war that has no justification produces battles that have no purpose. Since we are not intent upon "conquering" South Vietnam, but only upon "liberating" it, the strategy does not move forward toward any goal—there is no Rhine, no Okinawa—but thrashes about, a killing scythe in the jungle. For all the firepower, the tolls are small; but as there is no objective, so it seems there are no limits, this slow grinding of the swamps and valleys can go on indecisively as long as any life at all remains there. All killing is stupid, but such killing is nasty as well. It is grievous that American youth should be forced to die at this ignorant work; we may learn before we are through to grieve even more bitterly for those who return home with their bodies still alive.

Schoendorffer's footage, made originally for French television, is objective, unblinking, but profoundly compassionate; there are no villains, only victims, at the front. The film bespeaks a remarkable rapport between photographers and soldiers, sustained no doubt because they showed a like courage in moments of great danger. Courage is so commonplace as to go almost unremarked in The Anderson Platoon; thus are men superior to their masters.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS!

ALL change of address notices, orders for subscriptions and other correspondence, should be sent to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue,
New York, N.Y. 10014

Crossword Puzzle No. 1232

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 These might be criticized, even if the general effect of oratory was represented in the article. (5,2,6)
- 10 What might go with a drive-in snack on a foreign island. (5)
- 11 One who puts on an act gets through earlier. (9)
- 12 Scene shifting ordered to go around isn't getting any younger. (9)
- 13 Maintains one's position below decks. (5)
- 14 and 22 across Engineering thesis on the supply of kindergartens? (12,5)
- 19 Even everything else might prove everything said over again. (12)
- 22 See 14 across
- 24 Truman set the groundwork for this change in nature. (9)
- 25 After hitching horns? Pans might accompany them. (9)
- 26 One business proposition that's perfect. (5)
- 27 The last part's the word for it—it really is! (13)

DOWN:

- 2 Not doing so well—in fact quietly failing. (6)
- 3 Plane parts torn into little bits? (9)
- 4 His wrong goes with the proud man's contumely. (9)
- 5 Bristling, except for the middle. (5)

- 6 A long time to spend in rising expectation, if around a hundred. (5)
- 7 Gray owl did to the moon. (8)
- 8 This mash is a jumble, particularly for a Mennonite. (5)
- 9 13, perhaps, indicated by simple sentences. (7)
- 15 One would certainly make a good observer. (9)
- 16 Petulant, but far from stupid, contrarily. (9)
- 17 An awkward topic around the early hours? It calls for port! (7)
- 18 Strike with the heat being haphazard? (8)
- 20 Office furniture? (6)
- 21 One might slip on one of them and have to rest up. (5)
- 23 There's a bit of sunshine about in such inclement weather, however. (5)
- 24 Worn by a woman such as one in Scarlett's house. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1231

ACROSS: 1 and 12 Alternating current; 9 Hampered; 10 Reveal; 11 Meteors; 15 Team-mate; 17 Umbrella; 20 Vellum; 22 Strains; 26 Result; 28 Blacklisted. DOWN: 2 Lip reader; 3 and 24 across Error of closure; 4 Nods; 5 Tortuga; 6 and 27 across Never on Sunday; 7 Gamete; 8 Garnet; 16 Melisande; 18 Matter; 19 Lunatic; 20 Valises; 21 Unreal; 23, 14 and 13 A full head of steam; 25 Pool.

EDUCATIONAL

THE UNIVERSITY OF LEEDS BROTHERTON LIBRARY

Applications are invited for the post of UNIVERSITY LIBRARIAN and KEEPER OF THE BROTHERTON COLLECTION at a salary of not less than £3,570, vacant on the pending retirement of Mr. B. F. Page.

Applications (16 copies), stating age, qualifications and experience, together with the names of three referees, should reach the Registrar and Secretary, The University, Leeds 2, England (from whom further particulars may be obtained), not later than 31st January 1968. Applicants overseas may apply in the first instance by cable, naming three referees, preferably in the United Kingdom. In reply, please quote 68/63/1.

PERSONALS

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D. Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

NO MORE WOODEN NICKLES
HOFFA FOR PRESIDENT also Impeach Johnson on 1/4" discs and 6" rulers, 12/$1.—100/$5; 50/$1; stickers, balloons, 3c; Key Tag 25c. Plentyism, Box 115, Edison, Miami 33151

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE
Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 28 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

McCarthy in '68, Reagan & Lassie in '68, Johnson for Ex-President RFK in '68, Dump Johnson in '68, Kill for Peace king-size bumper strips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802, Chicago, Illinois 60690

I NEED TITLES OF AMERICAN FICTION (novels, films, plays, short stories, TV plays), where teachers, schools and/or pupils are portrayed. Send titles on postcard and receive bibliography. Dr. Holland, 1154 W. 29th St., L.A., Calif. 90007

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS IN THE NATION

A CALL to CLERGYMEN and LAYMEN In Whose Name?

Death, destruction, and despair have been heaped upon the Vietnamese people in the name of freedom and democracy—in the name of America!

By what kind of moral calculus can any human being condone the following...

- 2,000,000 South Vietnamese, or almost one eighth of the population, have become official refugees. Hundreds of thousands more have been displaced.
- 110,960 tons of napalm have been dropped over South Vietnam since the end of 1963.
- 150,000 acres of crop-producing land as well as 500,000 acres of jungle and brush have been defoliated by 5 million gallons of herbicide in 1967 alone.
- None of the 43 provincial hospitals is "considered up to minimum standards for a developing country in Southeast Asia," according to Sen. Edward Kennedy.
- Since 1961 more than 300,000 Vietnamese and American military personnel have been killed while a conservative estimate would place civilian death at approximately four times that figure.

(Above figures are taken from the U.S. Department of Defense and/or Senatorial hearings.)

The blood we shed in Vietnam makes a mockery of all our proclamations, dedications, celebrations. Has our conscience become a fossil? Is all mercy gone?

Join us in Washington, D.C. on February 5 & 6, 1968 to visit with congressmen in this "political" year, to meet by states to talk tactically about increased opposition to the Vietnamese war, and to make clear our concern for young men of draft age who in conscience cannot fight in Vietnam. Remember, the blood of the innocent cries forever. Should that blood stop to cry, humanity will ~~cease~~ to be.

(Institutions for identification only)

Dr. John C. Bennett
President, Union Theological Seminary

Father Daniel Berrigan, S.J.
Cornell University

Dr. Robert McAfee Brown
Professor, Stanford University

Bishop Harvey D. Butterfield
Burlington, Vermont

Rev. William Sloane Coffin, Jr.
Chaplain, Yale University

Dr. Harvey G. Cox
Associate Professor
Harvard Divinity School
Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath
President, Union of American Hebrew Congregations
Rabbi Abraham Heschel
Professor, Jewish Theological Seminary of America
Dr. Martin Luther King
President, Southern Christian Leadership Conference

Rabbi Arthur Lelyveld
President, American Jewish Congress

Bishop John Wesley Lord
Washington, D.C.

Bishop J. Brooke Mosley
Wilmington, Delaware

Father John Sheerin
Editor, Catholic World

Bishop R. Marvin Stuart
Denver, Colorado

Clip out the application below and send it to us at once. We will be in touch with you immediately with more information about the Mobilization.

JOIN US IN WASHINGTON, D.C.
FEBRUARY 5 & 6,
1968.

COUNT ME IN!
Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam 475 Riverside Drive New York, New York 10027 212-870-2283—870-2020 Room 547—Attention: Rev. Richard Fernandez
Name _____
Address _____
Tel. Home _____	Office _____
City _____	State _____ Zip _____
<input type="checkbox"/> I cannot come—here is a contribution to defray cost.

Philadelphia Advancement School FARNUM GRAY

THE NATION

JANUARY 22, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JAN 23 1968
LIBRARY.

BURLINGAME
JAN 24 1968
LIBRARY.

THE NEW TIDE OF NATIONAL POLITICS

EDWARD SCHNEIER

DOLLAR DRAIN OF WAR PETER PASSELL

Arabian Aftermath

The Strategy of Daydreams

JOE ALEX MORRIS, Jr.

After Fifty Years PART II

Lunatics, Dreamers and Revolutionaries

WALD FANGER / SIMON KARLINSKY / MARK R. HILLEMAN

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

color and authority

Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: June Meyer's powerful essay-review ("Spokesmen for the Blacks," The Nation, Dec. 4) is brilliant, and well-deserved by the entire literary world of this country. With admiration.

Jonathan Kozol

New York City

DEAR SIR: I commend June Meyer for her beautiful piece. Anybody who has paid any attention to the race problem in this country would realize that it continues to be a problem because of the attitudes of the white community and more important, because the "Negroes have never been listened to." . . .

These attitudes have given rise to the ludicrous situation where Peace Corps volunteers—who have little if any competence in African languages—spend two years in an African environment and come back to write bestsellers, while Africans, spending a comparable time here, are considered not knowledgeable enough to write about this country. . . .

Apart from such people as the late Melville Herskovitz, Prof. Immanuel Wallerstein and a few others (half a dozen or so), it would be interesting to know also how many Americans know anything about Africa—and I will include those in the Administration and Congress who talk so much about helping the savages become civilized.

The Nation, like every journal in this country, prefers a Peace Corps volunteer over an African to review books about Africa. The Negro and the African should know they are in the same boat. It's time they realized this and learned to work together rather than bicker.

P. K. Cobbinah-Essem
International House

Rodin's space

New York City

DEAR SIR: As an artist who has long admired the sculpture and drawings of Rodin, I read with interest and care John Berger's "Notes for an Essay on Rodin" [The Nation, Dec. 18, 1967]. Then I reread these Notes with amusement, and finally with a sense of their absurdity. . . .

Mr. Berger assumes that, with the exception of the "Balzac" and possibly the "Walking Man," Rodin's sculpture "exhibits a consistent and fundamental weakness," a failure of his figures to "create any spatial tension with their surroundings," and a sort of inward pressure that he sees acting upon them, forcing them back into the material as if they were on the way to becoming bas-reliefs, indeed to vanishing altogether. In some intriguing, sexually titillating and aberrant way this is tied in to what is assumed to be Rodin's confusion of flesh with clay, and his uncontrollable desire to knead and mold live women with his hands, and we are given testimony in this regard by Isadora Duncan, who later wished she had let him.

May I suggest that the confusion is not Rodin's but Mr. Berger's. . . . For every critic who discovers that Rodin's figures are all collapsing inward I could round up a dozen practicing sculptors who would contend that they relate to the space about them as if they were alive and might destroy it.

Even in those marbles and bronzes like the "Gates of Hell," where the figures do not entirely emerge from the material, one is reminded of the "Prisoners of Michelangelo" in Florence, struggling against the bonds of their creation and their captivity.

Paul Hollister, Jr.

EDITORIALS

Now Is the Time

Both Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy are admirable public men with a high sense of public responsibility. Both are fully aware that the demonstrations, protests and riots of the last year were a reflection, in no small measure, of the sickness that besets the political system. Both must also realize that such public enactments of intense political frustration will assume even graver dimensions this year if the electorate is asked to choose in November among Johnson, Nixon and Wallace. Already the three of them are engaging in a competition in hawkishness on all fronts. All of them stress "crime in the streets" as though it were the No. 1 Issue. In a recent address to—of all organizations—the Boy Scouts' sponsors, Mr. Nixon said that the issue is not "crime in the streets" but "the war in the cities."

Let's be blunt about it: Johnson, Nixon and Wallace are widely and profoundly distrusted, not by the same people or for the same reasons, but by a majority of the electorate and for perfectly sound reasons. If the electorate must choose one of them in November, the winner will owe his victory to the fact that a majority of the electorate distrusted him less than it distrusted the other two. Such a choice could only have the effect of further undermining public confidence in the political system.

Governor Rockefeller and Senator Kennedy have it in their power to exert the leadership and influence that just might avert such a debacle. They are strong personal leaders, men of immense resources. Both tap powerful political, tribal and corporate sources of support. If the major parties were free to nominate their strongest nominees, the Governor and Senator would be nominated. But if both men persist much longer in the coyness that each has shown to date, the Dreadful Trio will confront us. Faced with this possibility, we appeal to the sense of responsibility which the Governor and the Senator have both demonstrated on other occasions to reassess their roles in relation to this year's election.

It is quite clear, of course, that Rockefeller and Kennedy are, as Ted Lewis pointed out in the Daily News, "at the crossroads of decision-making at a time not of their own choosing." Both face difficult problems. But we appeal to them not alone as party leaders but as public men who must see that their responsibility this year transcends partisan and personal considerations.

We appeal to them, we do not advise them. We are not suggesting, for example, that Governor Rockefeller should act this week or next or that he should enter this or that primary. As a man of his word, he has an obligation to Governor Romney. But he has other obligations, and if he waits much longer he may be unable to avert the debacle that so clearly faces his party and the nation. In 1964, the Governor got into the race at too early a date; this year he could wait too long. The Republicans, if there is any saving sense among them, must realize that with Wallace in the race, it makes no sense for them to nominate Nixon and pursue the "Southern" strategy that led to Goldwater's defeat in 1964. But time is running out and the Governor must give some indication soon of his "availability" or we will witness a repeat of the rout of reason that prevailed at the Cow Palace in 1964.

Senator Kennedy has his problems too. He wants desperately to be President but feels that he must wait until 1972. But he may wait too long. Should the Republicans nominate Rockefeller, the Governor would, in our judgment, defeat President Johnson and might well be re-elected in 1972. But even if Senator Kennedy feels that he should stay out of the race this year, he could give Senator McCarthy more "running room" than he has provided to date. What he has thus far said and done has had the effect of isolating McCarthy; the coolness of the Kennedys is much too cool to pass unnoticed. Senator Kennedy must realize that "the lesser evil" logic cannot apply in a race of Johnson, Nixon and Wallace; his own integrity as a person would dissipate with every speech he made in support of Johnson. Two leaders of the McCarthy movement, Allard K. Lowenstein and Arnold S. Kaufman, state the issue well: "If a President is wrong but popular, political realities may make opposing him difficult, however right; if a President is right but unpopular, supporting him may be a duty, however difficult. But when a President is both wrong and unpopular, to refuse to oppose him is a moral abdication and a political stupidity."

Now is indeed the time for all good men to come not merely to the aid of their party but to help salvage the political system and a measure of national self-respect.

The Spock Indictment

The indictment of Dr. Benjamin Spock, Rev. William Sloane Coffin and their associates raises issues larger than the government may wish to confront; conversely, critics of the Vietnamese War will be glad to have these issues brought out into the open. The government would like to see the defendants tried purely on the basis of the Selective Service law and the statutes pertaining to the duty of citizens to support the government in time of war. The defendants will probably stress the moral aspect—the rights of the citizen, who has a conscience, against the rights of the government, which has power. Admittedly, this is not a very promising line of attack since all wars in which the President chooses to involve the country have in effect become legal; besides, the Selective Service law applies, with or without a declaration of war.

On the borderline between moral and legal issues, the defendants can argue that what they did was nothing more, essentially, than a legitimate extension of the right of free speech. They in no way impeded a draftee in his desire to serve in the armed forces. All they did was counsel draftees who came to them with doubts already in their minds. If this is unlawful, only support of the Selective Service statutes would be allowable—or silence.

Then, what a curious "conspiracy" this was! The alleged conspirators, far from acting in secret to perform an illegal act, practically shouted their intentions from the housetops. Not only was there a complete absence of the secrecy surrounding an illegal act but the act itself was no more than symbolic. The Selective Service regulations do require a draftee to carry his registration card

IN THIS ISSUE

January 22, 1968

EDITORIALS

98

ARTICLES

- 102 Golden Hemorrhage:
Dollar Drain of Vietnam
Peter Passell
- 104 The New Tide of National Politics
Edward Schaefer
- 107 Advancement School: Part II
Taking Risks with the Setup
Farnum Gray
- 110 Arabian Aftermath:
The Strategy of Daydreams
Joe Alex Morris, Jr.
- 113 Three Purple Hearts, Two Turtle Doves and an Ambush in a Flame Tree
William Eastlake
- 114 Restaurant Workers:
The Thumb in Labor's Soup
Burton Hall

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 117 Rehabilitated Experimentalist Donald Fanger
- 118 The Crime Against Pasternak Simon Karlinsky
- 120 Satiric Fantasies Mark R. Hillegas
- 121 The Fear Years Helen Yglesias
- 124 Book Marks
- 125 Theatre Harold Clurman
- 127 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, MICHAEL GOLDMAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 4

(a requirement which savors of European identification cards), but to return such a document to the government is merely an act of protest. The individual who performs this act is still known to his Selective Service board and it can lay hands on him the more readily because he has chosen this way of calling attention to himself. It is obvious that Dr. Spock and the others have not thus far made much of a dent in the Selective Service mechanism. At year's end, only 618 persons in forty-six states had turned in, burned, or otherwise "illegally" disposed of draft cards, according to Gen. Lewis Hershey, and Army spokesmen boast of the small percentage of military dropouts and AWOLs. Indeed one may well suspect that the indictments were returned primarily to appease the formidable General Hershey, who has mesmerized Congress and intimidated Presidents these many years, and who hailed the indictments as a personal triumph.

But whatever the reason, the indictment represents a crack-down, designed to pick off the leadership of the anti-war movement and to intimidate those who may be inclined to listen to their arguments. As such, it is another step in the long series of protestations by the government that it holds the right of free speech sacred, while making the exercise of that right harder and more dangerous.

Surgical Show Biz

From a purely technical standpoint, the human heart transplants are a marvelous accomplishment. Medically, they are in the same class as the rocketry and electronics that send men into orbit and will land them on the moon sooner or later. No other age could have accomplished such bizarre feats. The heart transplants also remind us that all medical progress, and the most impressive learning and skill that can be brought to bear, only shift the cause of death from one specialty to another and prolong the patient's life for a few more days or years. From the individual's standpoint the postponement is no small matter, of course, and the surgeons who essay these tours de force do set an example of coolness under pressure that somehow enhances human stature.

In addition, on the plus side, the acceptance of the heart of a colored donor by a white patient, or the heart of a woman by a man, is a lesson in ethics as well as physiology. A heart is a heart, a kidney is a kidney: physiologically a man is only a system of semi-autonomous subsystems that make up the wonderful human body. The dying South African accepted the heart of a colored man as eagerly as he would have the heart of a white man, and not even the most bigoted Afrikaners said a word.

These are the good things about operations of this type, which nevertheless are of far less importance than corrective open-heart surgery which is now performed routinely in every medically advanced country. But there are drawbacks as well. One is that a kind of star system develops among surgeons, in contravention of the established medical tradition that the doctor does his work and does not talk about it, except in technical communications with other physicians who may benefit by his experience.

The news media, especially television, could not be happier about this development: they are furnished with a combination of the sob story, centering about the bereaved family or families, and the heroic spectacular, represented by the surgical team. And it is all real and serious. With television, money and bargaining enter the surgical amphitheatre, or at least camp just outside. Philip Blaiberg, the South African dentist who received the second heart transplant, or his agent, made a deal with N.B.C. for exclusive interviews and films—including the operation—for $50,000. A free-lance photographer managed to get into the operating room gallery and shot some film before he was ejected. Apparently the surgeon, Dr. Christian Barnard, was unaware of the N.B.C.-Blaiberg agreement, and has decided to avoid further publicity for himself. The hospital, however, is less reluctant. For its publicity staff the heart transplants are a bonanza. A few weeks ago it was a local hospital like any other. Now all over the world people know about it who never heard of Massachusetts General or Maimonides.

But there is still another objection, perhaps the most cogent. Any medical advance involving life and death arouses expectations which are impossible at the time it first becomes known, and in many cases the innovation soon fizzles. In the case of heart transplants the difficulties of supply and synchronization are enormous. The vast majority of cardiac patients must live as best they can with the hearts their mothers gave them. This limitation should get more publicity; the successful transplants—when there are any—should get less.

Poetic Justice

It is not necessary to pass judgment on the merits of the case against LeRoi Jones, the Negro playwright, and his codefendants, in order to be appalled by the severity of the sentences handed down by Judge Leon Kapp in the Essex (N.J.) County Court. Mr. Jones is an abrasive type of revolutionary who does not deal in sweet sentiments or demean himself decorously in a courtroom, but he was not being tried for his personality. He was convicted of riding about Newark with two Negro companions at the height of last summer's riot, with guns and ammunition in the car. The average sentence to date for this offense is about six months, but Mr. Jones's accomplices got eighteen months each—part of it on probation—and the judge threw the book at Jones with a sentence of not less than two years and six months, a ban on probation during that term, and a fine of $1,000.

The judge and the defendant were about equally abusive toward each other, but this is a matter in which equality does not conduce to the majesty of the law. The power was all on the side of the judge and he violated the canons of judicial behavior by bawling at the defendants as if they were in a dispute in a barroom. Nor does a good judge tell a defendant that he is "sick"—mentally sick in that connotation—when no suggestion of such illness is involved in the case at bar. The only objective view one can derive from these proceedings is that maybe Jones belongs in jail, but Kapp does not belong on the bench.

There is reason to believe, also, that the severity of the sentence was based partly on a poem which Jones had published in the Evergreen Review, which normally has a circulation of 25,000 but now will probably have to increase its print order. Kapp regarded the poem as diabolical and read it in court before pronouncing sentence, with deletions that he considered appropriate. The judge was thus going outside the record—"dehors" in the legal term—and subjecting himself to a reversal on that ground alone. New Jersey is a big populous state, and its higher courts contain judges who do not like to see the lower magistrates lose control of their tempers or pronounce sentence on the basis of irrelevancies.

A reprimand has already been administered to Judge Kapp by an extra-judicial body. Writing on behalf of the American Center of P.E.N. in the January 10 New York Times, Robert Halsband, president of the organization, declared: "P.E.N. vigorously protests the impropriety of any judge imposing a sentence the severity of which is based on his disapproval of a literary work of the accused. This is a serious assault on freedom of expression, a right not only of every writer but of every American citizen, as stated in the First Article of the Constitution." Judge Kapp needs a refresher course at law school.

You Haven't Been There

Two war-hero brothers, back from Vietnam, shed some light on the war for those of us who haven't been there. Jim Libby, of Brunswick, Me., said that he could not see "how people who have never been to Vietnam can criticize what is going on there." His brother Bruce said that he couldn't understand "the concern at home for the burning by a Marine company of a Vietnamese village." The following excerpt from an interview with the brothers, published in the Brunswick-Bath Times-Record, may in part explain the criticism and concern:

[Bruce] said that after dark anything that moves is considered the enemy. He mentioned the "turkey shoots" which one brigade stationed north of Saigon participated in. The "turkey shoot" was the indiscriminate destruction of Vietnamese sampans on the river at night. "You don't know whether they are Vietcong or not," said Bruce.

Following an atrocity against a group of wounded Americans, Bruce's outfit went into a nearby village and asked the villagers the whereabouts of the Vietcong. The villagers said they had seen no enemy. The American outfit then proceeded to roll their M-48 tanks over the huts in the village. "If you don't think an M-48 tank romping through somebody's little thatched hut doesn't scare somebody, it does," Bruce said. He explained if the people think you are not going to do something, they will not tell you anything.

"Oh, yes, I'm all for it," Jim said of the war. "The people over there need help and this is the only way they are going to get it."

Scientists as Citizens

Perhaps more significant than any of the scheduled events at the 134th convocation, December 26 to 31, of the American Association for the Advancement of Science was the confusion exposed there as to the proper role of science in a war-oriented society. Some years ago, the Society for Social Responsibility in Science applied for affiliation with the AAAS and was rejected, presumably not because it was less worthy than the Herpetologists' League or the Torrey Botanical Club but because it is thought that, when scientists disagree, means exist (in the long run) for resolving their differences objectively; whereas social responsibility involves political attitudes which, all the more as science is supported by government through the decisions of politicians, can cause scientists a lot of trouble. Thus, although Prof. Hans Bethe, with his usual wisdom, said last month some things that needed to be said in his talk at the symposium, "Is Defense against Ballistic Missiles Possible?," the meeting as a whole was conducted as if the war in Vietnam were not raging and as if AAAS members had nothing to do with it.

The only deviation from this sedulously cultivated equanimity occurred at the New York Hilton, where the University Committee on Public Issues rented a meeting room for one evening and Prof. Philip Morrison and others gave proof (if proof was needed) that first-rate scientists can also be citizens concerned with the fateful events of the day.

The social scientists are doing better. In contrast to the quietism of the AAAS on Vietnam, napalm and the like, Seymour Melman of Columbia University and Walter Adams of Michigan State, at what The Washington Post described as "by far the liveliest and most emotional session" of the four-day annual meeting of the American Economic Association, attacked the military-industrial complex (which is in reality a scientific-military-industrial complex) for squandering a major portion of the country's resources on parasitic overdevelopment and overkill, and erecting "an edifice of neomercantilism and industrial feudalism" through state-protected cartels (as in oil), defense contracts, tax privileges, research support, patent policy, stockpile management, subsidies and the like. And, one might add, the wholesale subordination of scientists in government-supported "think-tanks" devoted predominantly to weapons development. Between them, Melman and Adams raised a storm and were assailed by a past president of the AEA for "muckraking."

Aside from such tumults, however, the philosophical question which is raised by the interaction of science and politics is of incalculable importance. The arguments against organizational participation by scientists in politics have been extensively disseminated: the contrary views have received less publicity. One is that those who let the genie out of the bottle should feel a bit more responsible for its subsequent antics than the laymen who had no hand in the catastrophe and knew nothing about either its ethics or technique until it was a fait accompli.

"It is my opinion," Eugene Wigner tells the American Physical Society, which finds itself in much the same position as AAAS, "that the Physical Society should stick to physics." But can it, any more than Wigner could when, with Leo Szilard, he persuaded Einstein to sign the atomic letter to President Franklin D. Roosevelt? And, however the action of scientists was justified under the conditions of the late thirties, is it not arguable that, with the government pouring billions of dollars annually into science and technology, mainly war-oriented, the concern of "private" individuals and small groups is no longer sufficient?

DOLLAR DRAIN OF VIETNAM

PETER PASSELL

Mr. Passell is a graduate student in economics at Yale University.

Recent international financial events make it clear that the Johnson Administration must soon face the realities of an incompatible set of domestic and international commitments. The President's New Year's announcement of proposals to limit tourist travel and direct investments outside the Western Hemisphere indicates how serious the U.S. economy's international payments problem has become in the past few months. At the root of the difficulty is the fact that Americans must accept important, semi-permanent restrictions on their spending and investing behavior in order to enable the United States to continue the war in Vietnam. It is possible that opposition to necessary belt-tightening will succeed (where direct political opposition has failed) in forcing President Johnson to reconsider the wisdom of playing policeman to the world.

The Administration contends that the U.S. economy is able to maintain large armies in Vietnam and Western Europe while fighting the war on poverty at home and abroad. In one sense, that is true. It doesn't seem unreasonable to expect an economy capable of creating $800 billion worth of goods and services a year to set aside $30 to $40 billion for overseas military commitments, $2 to $4 billion for foreign economic aid, and $50 billion for domestic welfare programs. Moreover, the enlightened application of fiscal and monetary policy eases the burden by making it almost certain that production will increase by 3 to 4 per cent annually.

But though such commitments may be possible, the Congress and the Administration have not chosen to act upon them by authorizing a full program of domestic expenditures and appropriately restrictive tax policies. One result of the failure to keep the lid on the economy has been an increasingly serious balance of payments problem. Since the late 1950s, the United States has spent and invested far more abroad than foreigners have spent and invested here. While the exact size of the present U.S. deficit depends upon the payments definition used, net foreign claims on American reserves have grown dangerously large and are increasing rapidly. The capacity of the nation to finance further deficits depends upon the willingness of foreign central banks to continue to accumulate dollar balances.

American private foreign investments and imports, combined with official government purchases of goods and services abroad (partially resulting from the Vietnamese War), have provided individual foreigners with more dollars than they have desired to use for making purchases and investments in the United States. They have sold their excess dollars to their own central banks for domestic currency, leaving a number of Western European central banks bloated with dollars. The U.S.

Treasury is obliged to repurchase these dollars for gold if they are offered for sale. In practice, we have pressured foreign central banks into holding excess dollars in interest-bearing bonds whose redemption value is guaranteed in the nation's currency. These guarantees would shield the bond holders from loss in case the dollar were devalued. As of June 30, 1967, central banks and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) held claims of more than $17 billion on U.S. gold stocks and foreign exchange, while the Federal Reserve owned only $14 billion in gold, convertible foreign currencies and gold deposits held by the IMF.

The figures do not indicate imminent disaster. In an emergency the United States would have large, unchallengeable borrowing rights at the IMF and would certainly be able to convince some of its foreign allies to hold dollars. However, the fragility of our international reserve position is far greater than Administration officials care to admit. Our net reserves (gold, foreign currencies and gold deposits with the IMF, less liabilities to foreign central banks and the IMF) stood at $23 billion in 1950. Today, central banks and the IMF hold claims that are $3 billion in excess of U.S. reserves. In spite of our efforts to unload dollars on our friends abroad, American gold stocks have decreased by more than $11 billion to the present level of less than $12 billion. The United States will almost certainly have to make up a $4 to $5 billion deficit on official exchange transactions in 1967 by peddling dollars to foreign central banks and/or by selling gold. President Johnson recently criticized the Congress for indirectly taxing the American people through additional inflation by refusing to pass the 10 per cent tax surcharge. What he did not say was that foreign central banks would also be asked to pay a share by financing additional U.S. deficits. However, unlike the uninformed public facing the impersonal taxation of higher prices, foreign central bankers will know exactly how much the United States is asking them to contribute and will have the opportunity and motivation to refuse.

The past willingness and current reluctance of foreign central banks to accumulate dollars is best explained by the changing power relationship between the United States and Western Europe. Central banks are government agencies whose narrow banking interests are often subordinated to more general foreign policy objectives. United States balance of payments deficits from the mid-1950s to the early 1960s financed massive American military and economic commitments around the world. Until the past few years the presence of American power in Europe was regarded by our allies as a necessary buffer against Soviet power. The psychological end to the cold war has brought about a re-evaluation of the desirability (from the European point of view) of being included in an American sphere of influence. U.S. payments deficits financed by European central banks help make possible American involvement in Vietnam. They also support the continuing take-over of the most modern sectors of the European economy by American big business. Europe is not eager to allow Dean Rusk to make foreign policy for all the non-Communist industrialized nations, or to subordinate domestic economic policy objectives to the needs of IBM and General Motors. Overt French hostility to the extension of American influence is supported by less flamboyant opposition in other European countries.

An end to the patience of cooperating European central banks is thus close at hand. This has become evident since the recent IMF meetings in Rio de Janeiro and the British devaluation. At Rio, the IMF approved in principle a plan to increase international reserves to meet the needs of growing world trade and capital flows. The United States was informally served notice that other IMF members were not prepared to use newly created paper reserves to finance endless U.S. deficits. The implementation of the painfully negotiated, badly needed reforms agreed upon at Rio may thus hinge upon American willingness to correct its fundamental payments imbalance. Even more important, devaluation of the British pound was followed by several weeks of private (and perhaps official) gold purchases in London totaling approximately $800 million. These purchases were made as speculation against the gold value of the dollar and are likely to continue sporadically. Such purchases directly affect the American gold reserve since the United States, as a member of the gold pool, is pledged to keep the price of gold in private sales at $35 per ounce. By agreement, 59 per cent of the gold sold in London is supplied by the U.S. Treasury. Moreover, it is likely that recent foreign central bank contributions to the pool will leave these banks even more reluctant to increase their dollar holdings.

Successful devaluation of the British pound must lead to further pressure on the U.S. payments balance, making our job of "selling" the deficit to foreign central bankers that much larger and more difficult. The United States will probably lose gold reserves of several billion dollars in 1968.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

The lesson of the preceding paragraphs is that the special nature of an external payments deficit and the re-emergence of independent European foreign policies have brought our ten-year grace period of foreign-financed deficits almost to an end. The impatience of Western European central bankers and the less predictable behavior of private speculators make it imperative that we take strong steps to protect our international reserves. There are plenty of ways to cut or eliminate the deficit, short of reducing U.S. military commitments abroad, but none of them is going to win votes in a national election. Some combination of the following restrictive measures would reduce import demand and help make American exports more competitive in world markets by holding down inflation:

- An increase in interest rates or direct limitations on consumer borrowing for housing and automobile purchases.
- A large reduction in federal budget expenditures for domestic welfare or for additions to the U.S. strategic nuclear deterrent.
- A substantial tax increase, with the heaviest burden falling on corporate investment and large incomes.
- Other direct measures might be taken to limit the outflow of dollars:
 - Restrictions on private American overseas investment by means of an interest equalization tax with teeth or by direct controls.
 - Restrictions on American tourist travel abroad.
 - Reductions in foreign economic aid.
 - Trade restrictions such as import quotas, tariff increases or export subsidies.

A final way out of the crisis would be to devalue the dollar.

None of these alternatives provides an easy way out. Trade restrictions are likely to bring retaliation, and cuts in foreign economic aid would be heavily offset by reductions in U.S. exports. Devaluation is almost out of the question under the present circumstances. It could not take place overnight, since it requires Congressional approval, and an announcement of our intention to devalue would set off an unparalleled wave of speculative activity as individuals attempted to change their dollar holdings into gold, physical assets and Western European currencies. In all likelihood this would result in legal suspension of international capital movements and competitive devaluation around the world. We could expect severe curtailment of world trade for several years and at least a temporary decline in American economic power and prestige abroad. The uncertainties of such a period of economic disorder could lead to international economic anarchy reminiscent of the 1930s.

The President has chosen to request legislation curbing tourist travel and direct investments outside the Western Hemisphere. This legislation (if it is passed) will not be popular, particularly if it is severe enough to reduce the deficit by a targeted $3 billion. Mr. Johnson has himself suggested that enactment of the 10 per cent income tax surcharge will be necessary if more direct measures are to be completely successful. American consumers and businessmen will have to learn to live with these restrictions, and possibly more, as long as we are heavily involved in Vietnam or its future equivalents.

It is not easy to calculate precisely the reduction in our deficit which would result from a military pullback. However, very conservative estimates illustrate the magnitude of the potential saving. The war in Vietnam contributes to the U.S. deficit by increasing military expenditures abroad, reducing our capacity to export, and requiring the import of additional raw materials.

In 1966, U.S. military expenditures and military grants abroad totaled $4.7 billion. Less than $1.8 billion of this was spent in NATO countries. Direct military grants and expenditures in Southeast Asia were more than $1.5 billion, while other war-related payments losses may be conservatively estimated at $1 billion. Of course, some of these dollars stimulate foreign private and government purchases in the United States, so that the net savings resulting from a military pullback would be a good deal less than the total above. Probably just as important is the effect that a $30 billion cut in the defense budget, even coupled with a compensatory tax cut or increase in government welfare expenditures, would have on the balance of payments. American defense industries reduce U.S. exports by removing plant capacity from would-be exporters and by bidding away critical personnel such as engineers and skilled metal workers from export industries. Moreover, defense industries use large quantities of imported materials such as copper. The net effect of rechanneling $30 billion in demand from the military to government welfare or consumer expenditures would reduce our payments deficit by a few billion dollars.

A pullout or a dramatic cutback in the Vietnamese War would probably reduce the U.S. balance of payments deficit by at least $4 to $5 billion. The United States must solve its payments problem within two or three years. Unlike the vague constraints placed on the President by domestic inflation, the balance of payment problem, which threatens to bloom into a major crisis at any time, cannot be met with gestures. If there is no reduction in the military effort, Mr. Johnson or whoever succeeds him will face the choice of enforcing severe, unpopular economic restraints or running out of gold. The American economy would not vanish in a puff of smoke if its gold resources were exhausted and the international exchange value of the dollar left to private market forces. This would, however, result in a large temporary reduction in world trade and further deterioration of relations between the United States and its Western European dollar creditors.

The New Tide of National Politics

EDWARD SCHNEIER

Mr. Schneier is an assistant professor of politics at Princeton University. He is now on leave, completing a book about Congress, as Guest Scholar at the Brookings Institution.

More than 1 million Americans have in one way or another protested actively against the war in Vietnam. Each new round of anti-war activity brings out thousands of new recruits: people who have "never done this kind of thing before" but who feel so deep a revulsion against their government's policies that they are willing to do almost anything to express their concern. The anti-war movement, however, has also had its share of dropouts: people who feel frustrated to the point that they no longer see any promise in the politics of protest. Never before in American political history has so large a movement had so little impact on public policy.

But if the movement's impact on policy has been slight, its impact on its participants has not. In the long run the most significant result of the war in Vietnam may be its effect on American politics. The alienation of these protesters is breaking up the New Deal system that has governed the country for more than thirty years. It is not likely that 1968 will produce a realigning election—the discontented elements lack the cohesion to move effectively from protest to politics—but it seems certain that we approach a break-point in our political history.

The system that is being left behind can be defined first, in demographic terms, as the coalition that elected Franklin Roosevelt in 1932 and which has kept the country solidly Democratic ever since; and second, as a philosophy of politics which Theodore Lowi calls "interest-group liberalism." (See his splendid essay in the March, 1967, issue of the American Political Science Review.)

The New Deal coalition was built upon those groups that had been hardest hit by the Great Depression: Southern farmers, urban ethnic minorities, Negroes. Roosevelt brought intellectuals, Jews and organized labor into the fold, solidified the Democratic Party's hold on the rural South and the urban North, and bequeathed to his successors a system that has elected four of the last five Presidents and sixteen of eighteen Congresses. Not once since he first came into power have more Americans identified themselves as Republicans than Democrats. Even in 1956—the year of the Eisenhower landslide—surveys showed that only 40 per cent of the people were willing to call themselves Republicans (51 per cent were Democrats, 9 per cent independents).

The result of Democratic domination has been the atrophy of the parties, and the development of a system in which important decisions are made within the majority party or entirely outside the party system. Interest group accommodation has replaced party conflict as the medium of political decision-making. As Lowi describes the system:

Interest-group liberalism offers a justification for keeping major combatants apart. It provides a theoretical basis for giving to each according to his claim, the price for which is a reduction of concern for what others are claiming. In other words, it transforms logrolling from necessary evil to greater good.

Every organized interest is allowed, in effect, to write its own ticket. Potentially dissident groups are bought off by giving them access to the levers of governmental power. The price is merely a pledge not to abridge the rights of others to collect their share of the subsidies.

As party competition has waned, interest-group activity has waxed: rather than press their claims in the testy arena of party politics, groups work through a pressure system that guarantees success to the well organized. The Democratic Party has become the major instrument of this distributive network: it has become the dealer to which all players turn for their share of the pot.

By and large, the system has worked. As long as there are sufficient resources to subsidize the major claimants, and as long as there is a basic ideological consensus endorsing the distributive system, interest-group liberalism provides a viable alternative to partisan conflict. If each of the major groups in society is free to write its own ticket, why should any of them be concerned with what the others get? In an affluent society it might indeed be possible to provide satisfactory subsidies to all major claimants—to reach the Great Society piecemeal, group by group, interest by interest in a big, happy consensus.

Under strain from the war in Vietnam, however, this system is unable to accommodate two significant developments: the growing intensity of anti-war sentiment and the politicization of the nonaffluent Negro. These groups make demands which cannot be met by distributive policies. On the one hand, the anti-war movement represents the first significant challenge since World War II to the foreign policy consensus. On the other hand, the war is creating dissatisfaction at home—particularly in the urban ghettos. With a quarter of the federal budget assigned to Vietnam, resources are scarce and the subsidy well is going dry. This means that the problems of the ghetto can be solved only by taking from other groups (through taxes or reduced subsidies) to give to the urban poor. To satisfy either the anti-war groups or the ghettos, in other words, is to provoke conflict, and conflict is precisely what interest-group liberalism seeks to avoid. The system cannot solve problems of either foreign policy or redistribution.

If the interest-group system cannot solve these problems, neither can the party system. The Republican and Democratic Parties have grown as unaccustomed to conflict as are the special interests. To the Democratic Party, softened by decades of rich pluralities, redistributive and foreign-policy issues threaten the continued success of the New Deal coalition. The Republicans, unable effectively to compete, have vacillated between accepting the basic rules of the coalition (as during the Eisenhower years) and a total rejection of it (as under Goldwater). Either way, it has not provided the kind of alternative that would make party competition an effective alternative to interest-group liberalism. Thus, for 1968 at least, the major parties are firmly locked into the basic New Deal pattern.

A brief look at the structure of the nominating system will show why it is so unlikely that the parties will respond to changing conditions.

On the Democratic side, almost a fourth of the delegates to the national convention will be from the eleven states of the Deep South. With Negroes still effectively excluded from party offices, these delegates will unquestionably be to the right of the President on the issues of peace, poverty and civil rights. This means that in order to affect either the platform or the nomination, the left wing of the party would be forced to persuade two-thirds of the remaining delegates to challenge publicly the man they selected and backed four years ago. It would mean enlisting some proportion of the fifteen Northern Democratic Governors—none of whom has ever dissented on the Vietnamese issue—and some proportion of the 202 Northern Democratic Senators and Congressmen—only forty or fifty of whom have ever demurred. It would mean persuading patronage-oriented machines to challenge the chief dispenser of federal favors. It would mean, in short, attempting the impossible.

The situation in the Republican Party is even more discouraging. Party rules give bonus votes to delegations whose states went for the Republican nominee in the preceding election. Since five of the six states Goldwater carried were in the Deep South, the eleven states of the old Confederacy will have more power—310 of 1,333 convention votes—than ever before. If one adds to this figure the eighty-six votes of a Reagan-led California delegation and the sixty-two votes of five Goldwater-oriented, Mountain State delegations, it is plain that the far Right is within 200 votes of again dominating the Republican convention. Certainly, party leaders in these states want to elect a President, but state-wide races are at least as important to the professionals as Presidential contests; and a Hatfield, Percy or Rockefeller is not going to be very helpful to a Republican candidate for governor of Louisiana. With many border and Midwestern party organizations at least partially controlled by the far Right, it seems unrealistic to hope that a candidate to the left of Richard Nixon can be expected to win the Republican nomination (only 218 delegates are selected in binding primaries).

Thus the major parties are committed to a system that is becoming outmoded. They cannot deal with the major issues of the times and are unwilling to put these issues to the test of conflict. Two significant elements of the New Deal coalition—intellectuals and Negroes—will therefore be left with no place to go in 1968. Confronted with a choice among two hawks and a segregationist, they are unlikely to vote with enthusiasm (except in those states where they can vote for Sen. Eugene McCarthy in the primaries). The frustration already so pronounced in both groups can only be heightened by this experience.

One immediate effect of the breakdown of the New Deal system is likely to be an increase of political violence: riots in the ghettos, acts of civil disobedience and disruption emanating from the universities. The radical Left—meaning those who advocate a complete restructuring of the system—will be significantly strengthened. But the full political impact of the breakdown is not likely to be evident in 1968. The Democratic majority will be sharply reduced, but not enough to affect the party's control of Congress or even, perhaps, the White House. The basic structure of the New Deal coalition will remain unchanged, if only because the dissenting Democrats will have no better place to go.

However unlikely change from within may be, those groups which are outside the positions of party power seem incapable at present of building a new system or even of forcing the major parties to reform. The Left is both disorganized and demoralized. The Chicago Conference for New Politics and recent national board meetings of the Americans for Democratic Action displayed vividly the extent to which the anti-war movement is divided. At issue between rival factions in both groups were not substantive matters, but the question of how far the movement should go in accommodating itself to the system. For the ADA the "system" means the Democratic Party, and the organization is divided between those who favor trying to reform the party from within and those who wish to keep their options open. For the New Politics people, the system is party politics in general, and the movement is divided between those who want to work through normal democratic channels and those who favor more revolutionary forms of action.

The one activity which the rival factions can support is protest. It is increasingly apparent, however, that demonstrations, teach-ins and letter-writing campaigns accomplish very little. The President has made it clear that he will not listen to the voices of dissent, and his defensive perimeter is impenetrable. The general public appears to be either bored or disgusted with the protest movement. More significantly, many of the protesters are themselves becoming disenchanted. The peace movement is losing its audience and is in danger therefore of losing its momentum. The more this happens, however, the more probable it becomes that the anti-war movement will draw itself together for a move from protest to politics.

The radical Right has already begun to move in this direction. The Goldwater campaign and the Wallace candidacy are both manifestations of a fundamental discontent with the New Deal system. If similar pressures on the system can be mounted from the Left, the chances are very good that 1972 will produce a realigning election—one in which there is a basic shift of the groups supporting each of the major parties.

Both parties, to summarize, are incapable at this time of breaking the old pattern. By skillful distribution of subsidies, the Democratic majority has been able to sus-tain the New Deal coalition and thus to dominate the nation's politics for more than thirty years. Some groups that might properly prefer a Republican alternative—Southern farm interests for example—are prevented by immediate self-interest from making the move. Others, like organized labor, are so dependent upon party support for their claims that they are unable themselves to challenge the party's internal distribution of power, and unwilling to allow others the opportunity.

The cards are stacked within the Democratic Party because too many people have too much to lose from a change. The Republican Party is a party of losers—an organization dominated by groups and individuals who were skeptical about government to begin with, and who have forgotten what it means to mobilize political power. Neither party is capable of reorganizing itself.

Thus the division between the parties rests on an outmoded electoral cleavage. The problem in the context of American politics is not one of responsibility or the lack of coherent ideologies—responsible parties cannot coexist with federalism and the separation of powers. The problem is one of representativeness: presently party alignments do not reflect the basic divisions of the society. The opposing coalitions which were formed in the election of 1932 were appropriate groupings of interest for that time, but they have long since outlived their meaning. And just as the depression revealed the anachronistic character of pre-New Deal divisions, so the war in Vietnam reveals the weakness of the present alignment.

If change is to come, it must be forced largely from the Left—from the discontented elements of the majority coalition. It cannot come from the minority side. Much depends, therefore, on the degree to which the Left can make the move from protest to politics, on the success with which discontent can be turned into popular programs, and on the degree to which significant participants in the New Deal system are willing to jeopardize their subsidies to encourage more substantial forms of government action.

Above all, the Left must learn the meaning of coalition politics. A viable alternative to the New Deal system cannot be built simply on dissatisfaction with things as they are. If there is to be a realignment of political forces, the Left must move from issue-development to consensus-building, from autarky to organization.

What are the chances that this will happen? For the immediate future, not very good. The New Politics Convention last September threw a cold light on the problems that confront such a move. Foremost among these is the problem of the missing delegates: the union leaders, farmers, businessmen and senior citizens who might have an interest in new politics but who were conspicuously absent from the Chicago gathering.

The second problem is Black Power. If the convention did nothing else, it demolished the myth of natural harmony between peace groups and Negroes. One of its outstanding achievements was to work out a modus vivendi with the black militants; but it is not a kind of solution likely to have wide appeal among white liberals.

Finally, there are the tactical divisions which the New Politics Convention revealed. "Don't Mourn for America —Organize” was the slogan of the convention. But the unresolved question is “how?” On the one hand, the “old Left” forces are interested in the immediate problem of Vietnam, and in working for a political alternative in 1968. On the other hand, the young radicals—anti-political, anti-reformist and parochial—are thinking in long-range terms and seeking to create a radical alternative to participatory democracy.

Fragmented in this way and confronted with problems such as these, the Left is unlikely to be a significant factor in the 1968 elections. But the war in Vietnam has done more than the elections will show to destroy the Johnsonian consensus of 1964. The anti-war movement is founded on discontent with the President's policies. More than that, it is founded on disgust with the ways in which those policies have evolved. If the November elections serve only to intensify dissatisfaction with the state of our politics—and that seems the likely outcome—it is merely a matter of time before this discontent exerts itself in a major realignment of political forces. The longer the war continues, and the more it eats into the funds available for other programs, the better able the Left will be to organize itself. The New Deal system is coming to an end, and there will be a new politics. It could happen in 1972.

ADVANCEMENT SCHOOL: PART II

TAKING RISKS WITH THE SETUP

FARNUM GRAY

Mr. Gray was a newspaper man for five years on the Rocky Mount Telegram and Winston-Salem Journal in North Carolina. He is now a curriculum writer for the Pennsylvania Advancement School.

Philadelphia

From the political jungle of North Carolina, the educational experimenters at the new Pennsylvania Advancement School have plunged into the jungle of urban education problems in Philadelphia. When the North Carolina Advancement School at Winston-Salem lost its autonomy after a prolonged attack by the educational authorities, the new school superintendent of Philadelphia, Dr. Mark R. Shedd, invited much of the staff to continue their experimental teaching in his city. [See “The Advancement School: North Carolina Kills Its Dream” by David Cooper, The Nation, January 15.] Shedd wants the new school to be part of the complex of what he calls “change agents” in Philadelphia.

Big city schools are failing because their huge bureaucracies are too unwieldy, cautious and isolated from students to meet the needs of children growing in a tense, rapidly changing environment. Shedd wants the Advancement School to attack urban education problems at both ends: by finding better ways to help children develop and by putting certain pressures on his bureaucracy. He has made clear to the administrators in his system that he expects radical changes for more effective education, but the system is too complex and rigid to yield to pressure that comes only from the top. “Students, parents and people in the community must generate pressures on the system to shake it loose,” Shedd has said. He sees the Advancement School as a prime pressure builder.

The Advancement School's pupils, selected from public and diocesan schools, have average or better intelligence but do very poorly in their classes. They are underachievers and potential dropouts; also a reservoir of much untapped talent. At present, all pupils are seventh- or eighth-grade boys, a difficult group for schools to deal with. And under the federal financing guidelines, at least half of the pupils must come from neighborhoods designated as poverty stricken; the others represent a cross section of the city. About 60 per cent of the boys are Negroes, a proportion that parallels the ratio in the Philadelphia school system. Pupils attend the Advancement School voluntarily and without cost for one semester, then return to their home schools.

Shedd expects that as children who have been consistent failures in school “achieve success at the Advancement School, their success will generate pressure for change on the traditional establishment.” Schools will no longer be able to excuse themselves by labeling such children “unteachable.” Conversely, he sees the school's curriculum development and its teacher training programs as helping schools react constructively to the pressures he wants to stimulate.

The school's staff puts its faith in the possibility, not the inevitability, of bringing about constructive change. At one meeting, Director Peter Bittenwieser told his colleagues, “The problems of the urban complex are so deep that we may not be able to make any change. We'll try our best, but I think it's damn frightening to take on this kind of problem.”

After several days of working with pupils, the teachers agreed with Bittenwieser that “Philadelphia underachievers are more complicated than those in North Carolina because of the severe kinds of strain in the urban environment.” The Advancement School comes to Philadelphia with more questions than answers. Its most important product so far has been not a set of doctrines but a freewheeling style of developing educational innovations.

Most of the country's school curricula are shaped by textbook writers, often college teachers, working under contract to publishers. The harried public schoolteacher starts with his roll book, his grade book and his textbooks. These, rather than the needs of his pupils, dominate his planning for the year.

Taking their cues from the underachievers they work with daily, Advancement School teachers develop new approaches, ways of stimulating learning and creativity, and high-impact materials. These are carefully analyzed. As the staff finds recurring factors in experiments that have worked, possibilities for further improvements open up and are tried with other pupils. Through this process, involving much conflict and imaginative work, diverse and continuously improving programs evolve.

Once a program has been conspicuously successful in its trial by fire with underachievers, it is field tested in regular public school settings. A public schoolteacher who tests a program discusses it with Advancement School staff members. The teacher learns and uses the philosophy and approaches for the overall program and for each lesson plan. For some programs, teachers are provided with materials such as paperback books, records, films and tapes.

The lesson plans are not designed to hold the teacher to fixed patterns. Rather, they are demonstrations of the teaching approaches. Teachers are urged to reorganize the material and create new lessons using the same approaches. Most of them do. Many teachers who used Advancement School programs in North Carolina reported that the experience had opened their eyes to how extraordinarily creative teaching could be. "I'll never teach any other way," one teacher wrote after field testing the school's communication program. Thus, public schoolteachers become agents of change in the entrenched system.

If a program succeeds in the public schools, any needed modifications are made and it is ready to be introduced formally into the public school curriculum—but only as an approach to teaching. The purpose is to free teachers from their ruts, not to create better ruts for them.

The Advancement staff thinks live curricula can be developed only if teachers are involved in the process, and three training programs at the school are aimed at drawing regular teachers into educational experimentation. In one program, public schoolteachers work full time at the school for one semester, sharing all staff responsibilities; other teachers come to the school for shorter periods. These temporary staff members continue to receive their regular pay checks and the Advancement School pays substitutes to take their home-school classes.

The school does not follow any particular set of educational theories and does not intend to produce any rigid ones, but a few principles have popped up repeatedly in the more effective programs, and won the acceptance of most staff members.

Successful programs "turn kids on"—stimulate them to learn and create. Children are best "turned on" by activities that involve them physically or emotionally. The communication program, for example, uses concrete activities to stimulate thinking, writing and other forms of communication. By exploring their senses in imaginatively designed exercises such as blindfolded tasting, students learn to strengthen their communication with appeals to the senses. An exciting lesson series takes them into exploring their emotions and personal experiences by seeing films such as On the Waterfront; acting out bullfights prepares for a discussion of courage.

As a way of "turning them on," the communication program urges students to go ahead and write without worrying about grammar or spelling. The school's general activities stimulate the students, and many of them read and write more than they ever have before. When and if a student's desire to communicate becomes so strong that he wants to improve his techniques, he starts working to master the skills he needs.

Ted Katz, one of the teachers, says: "Many kids can't think about content if they're worried about making their writing correct." He tells of a boy who "did some beautiful things" in his three months at the Advancement School, including papers of up to 100 pages. A few weeks after returning to his home school, the boy sent Katz a letter, enclosing a 20-page paper he had written for his English class. In the first two pages, the teacher found enough errors to give the boy an automatic failing grade; she apparently had read no further. The boy's letter was a futile cry for help. "This kid was overflowing with ideas, and the rest would have come in its own season," Katz said helplessly.

The school tries to involve students in learning in ways that make a broad range of subjects relevant to their lives. Even would-be toughies become absorbed in ballet when led into it through athletics and acting out gang fights. But the process requires a degree of freedom unimaginable or frightening to many school administrators. It is this freedom that North Carolina withdrew and Philadelphia has proffered.

The unusual idea of transplanting the controversial school was first conceived early last February by Terry Borton, a Philadelphia curriculum development specialist. Borton visited the school to look at its approach to emotional, personal and perceptive development. He mentioned the school and its political troubles to Richard H. de Lone, an assistant to Shedd. Shedd had heard of the school and was interested.

At a funeral staff meeting in Winston-Salem on March 2, Advancement School leaders announced that the school had lost the fight to keep its autonomy and that employees were free to seek jobs within the regular school administration or elsewhere. Many of the teachers did not want to knuckle under to the State Department of Public Instruction by taking jobs they were convinced would become sterile. They also thought that much of what they had learned—particularly their style of innovative development—would be lost if the staff scattered. A poll showed that many wanted to move the project intact.

Butenwieser thought the idea of finding a new home and providing facilities within a few months was "preposterous." But a few days later he met in Washington with Shedd and de Lone, who had only the informal approval of school board members to investigate possibilities. Buttenwieser and Shedd discussed the Advancement School's philosophy and programs, testing each other's ideas on what the project should try to do. Shedd particularly wanted to know if the school shared his concern with "opening kids up and letting them fly," rather than providing a limited program to remedy skill deficiencies. After several hours, de Lone, a former newspaper reporter, said: "Why don't you stop talking philosophy and get down to brass tacks?"

"This is the brass tacks," Shedd told him. He was right. The harmony of Shedd's ideas and those developed at the Advancement School gave the staff the confidence to move to the urban North.

Shedd saw the school in action shortly after the Washington meeting. He evaluated its programs and checked to see who the staff's key people were. He was pleased by the quality of those who wanted to stay together by moving to Philadelphia. Shedd is eager that the Advancement School should do some of the very things that incurred the enmity of North Carolina's top school officials. And a main reason why he made the Advancement School one of the cornerstones of his administration is that he saw things at the North Carolina school that he wants for his public schools—happy, excited children, teachers working openly and productively together, administration that encourages rather than stifles creativity, successful racial integration.

Shedd made a spot commitment, emphasizing that he was very much aware of the risk the staff was taking. He thought they could not withstand a second political clobbering and, of course, he could not guarantee that the winds would not change in Philadelphia.

At the same time, he was taking a risk himself; the project had worked well in North Carolina, but it would have new—possibly greater—problems in the big city. As he boarded a plane to leave Winston-Salem, Shedd shouted to a somewhat frightened Bittenwieser: "Keep the faith, baby!"

Seventeen of the North Carolina school's thirty-four professional staff members joined the Philadelphia project. Bittenwieser rounded out the staff with another twenty-six, attracted partly by the school's reputation.

On October 16, the Pennsylvania Advancement School opened its iron gates to 140 Philadelphia boys in a seven-story former warehouse. The building, bought in a rush by the Board of Education to get ready for the new project, looks nothing at all like a school. It has large areas of floor space with 3-foot-thick concrete columns 16 to 18 feet apart, and no interior walls to contain the noise of active boys. The Philadelphia system's school facilities division is moving at imperceptible speed to make requested improvements. Equipment orders were embroiled in the purchasing office's red tape, and the school opened without much of the electronic gadgetry it plans to use. When renovation of the building is completed, the school will take about 220 boys a semester.

The school had been founded with a conventional organization, with pupils moving every hour among classes in various subjects. Teachers were organized into departments—English, mathematics, science, social studies and physical education. Most curriculum planning was done within departments; there was little communication between departments, and what students did in one course was seldom related to what they did in others. Last February, a staff committee decided that such an organizational structure was irrelevant to the way children should learn. It determined that whether they were in Winston-Salem or some place else, they would have a new kind of school in the fall.

The problems in Philadelphia of the building, the unfamiliar urban boys, and uniting new staff members led to some consideration of using the old organization for one more semester. But the staff took the risk of trying out a new plan. They divided into four teams, each responsible for development of one-fourth of the boys. Each team had representatives of all disciplines, and the idea was for curriculum planning to be done by teams and across the artificial academic boundaries.

Theories and plans can fall apart fast before the onslaught of rambunctious boys, and the first day of school brought troubles. Not enough thought had been given to directing problem children in the wide-open building. Without adequate preparation for the kind of freedom the school was offering them, many boys became too high-strung to concentrate on any activity. Lights burned late in the warehouse that night, and teams have continued working at night and on weekends to prepare unified programs for getting boys involved in learning. Most boys showed improved learning attitudes in the first week or two. A major continuing question for the staff is: How do teachers work in teams without diluting one another's effectiveness?

Most boys like the school. Comments by parents have been both puzzled and enthusiastic:

"How can kids learn from fun and games?"

"What's my boy supposed to learn from watching The Seven Samurai?"

"He's written the best story I ever saw him write!"

"He never talked about his other school; he doesn't shut his mouth about this one."

Both Bittenwieser and Shedd have repeatedly said that there is no way of effectively tackling the urban education problem without taking enormous risks. While the Advancement School is taking its risks with the new organizational setup, Shedd has strengthened the staff's confidence in him by gambles that make school administrators blanch. At a meeting of student council presidents from city and suburban high schools, he challenged pupils to apply pressure to his own bureaucracy. He urged that pupils draft their own proposals for urban studies programs and take them to their social studies teachers. If the teachers would not try the programs, students should go to principals and continue fighting their way up the bureaucratic ladder, moving a step higher after each rejection. If they got as high as Shedd and he rejected them, they should go over his head to the Board of Education. Shedd said the process should help students learn about the system and how to get things done within it.

One of the distinctions of the Advancement School has been the unusual qualifications of its staff, which includes dancers, actors, artists, writers and former Peace Corps members, some of whom do not have teachers' certificates and one of whom has no college degree. To give it the autonomy for that kind of staff and for its freewheeling experiments, the school was set up in Philadelphia as a nonprofit corporation with an eleven-member board of directors, including a variety of community leaders. Earlier, Bittenwieser rejected the idea of having a six-member board including three Advancement School administrators and Shedd. He wanted a strong board.

The school's autonomy is not intended to put it in an ivory tower. "We want to get to that school system," Buttenwieser has told his staff. "Our chances of keeping the lines of communication open are very good. This isn't just Shedd; it's people whose interest in making changes predates Shedd's coming. In Philadelphia, there's a genuine desire to move education forward."

Buttenwieser has "a basic aversion to projects that view themselves as whole or alone." And staff members are interested in working with the other innovative projects in Philadelphia, two of which will soon be in the building with the Advancement School.

And the staff learned some hard lessons from its experience in the South. "We used to think education was separate from everything else, but it is interconnected with politics," Buttenwieser said. "You can only play a creative educational game under certain ground rules—freedom to explore, live the way you want to live, be free of the ridiculous and arbitrary restraints of the bureaucracy. You politic to maintain that freedom for your staff."

But he has said that he will not manipulate the staff or the integrity of its experimentation to gain political advantage. This unwillingness to compromise applies even to trivialities. When a group of school principals and counselors visited the school to meet the staff, one principal told Buttenwieser: "A few of your teachers don't dress like teachers. What can I tell parents if they ask me about it?" At Buttenwieser's request, he pointed out three staff members, flashiest of whom was George Mager in his stylish, Edwardian-cut coat and lavender-and-white striped trousers.

"I dress like a very conventional clod," Buttenwieser told the principal. "And that should make parents feel at ease with me. But I'm not at all sure that kids don't feel more at ease with someone dressed like George Mager."

The Philadelphia Board of Education, as a whole, seems to support constructive innovation. Its president, former Mayor Richardson Dilworth, can get things done in the political arena—an ability school officials often lack.

But the most hopeful sign is the interest teachers and principals are expressing in trying new ways to rejuvenate schools. "Many people in education today really feel that some inroads have to be made in the way we handle kids," Buttenwieser said. "Advancement schools, no matter where they are, will always attract a great number of people who are interested in innovating, and I think there's a far larger population out there than we imagine."

ARABIAN AFTERMATH

THE STRATEGY OF DAYDREAMS

JOE ALEX MORRIS, Jr.

Mr. Morris is Middle East correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. He has been reporting from the Arab world over the past sixteen years.

Beirut

"I wish the Israelis had taken Damascus, and even Cairo. Then we'd have to stop all this damn talking and do something."

The speaker was a well-educated Arab housewife, a Palestinian by birth but for the past twenty years a resident of Beirut. As I talked with her, it seemed to me that her emotional reaction to the June war was much more representative of Arab thought and feeling in the aftermath of defeat than all the mouthings of Arab politicians, of whatever political stripe. The overwhelming feeling of the Arab in the street, now that the immediate shock of the defeat is past, is one of hopelessness and frustration. But in the bizarre world of Arab politics, that is the one feeling that is most obscured.

On the extreme Left, the military bosses of Syria and Algeria call for a continuation of the war that made a shambles of Egypt's military machine. On the Right, King Hussein of Jordan appeals for moderation and a political settlement wherein he hopes the major Western powers will put the squeeze on Israel to retire from the conquered territories. Neither solution is practical, and the cynical and worldly-wise Arab proletariat knows it. On this issue the people ignore their politicians, who in any case are hardly representative of their subjects.

In the Arab world, skepticism bred from decades of disappointment has produced a kind of political nihilism, which leads thinking Arabs to believe that no matter how bad things are today, change is only likely to make them worse. This has been borne out dramatically by the Arab-Israeli war, and appears to have dumbfounded the Israelis as much as anyone else. The shock of defeat has not led to great political upheavals in the Arab world. In fact, a case can be made for the proposition that all the shaky Arab governments are now in a stronger position than they were before June.

The Israelis were frankly hoping that some of their more obstreperous neighbors, notably the pseudo-Socialist colonels and their front men in Damascus, would collapse under the weight of angry public reaction once the truth of the June war was driven home. The Syrian regime hastily evacuated Damascus, leaving the ancient city wide open to Israeli conquest, but now the colonels are back, more aggressive than ever.

The attitude is perhaps best illustrated by the behavior of a right-wing Lebanese politician, a well-known and zealous opponent of Gamal Abdel Nasser and everything he stands for. When Nasser made his famous resignation speech immediately after the war, this man sent him a fervent appeal to reconsider, despite the fact that for years he had been denouncing the Egyptian as a menace to Arab society. The Lebanese politician was not interested in Nasser's survival, but he feared what might come next, not only in Egypt but perhaps in Lebanon as well.

The Arabs learned few if any lessons, even military lessons, from the June war. The tendency everywhere has been to blame the catastrophe on a few generals and let it go at that. In Egypt, some generals are now on trial for the sorry show they put up. Yet it is widely known in Cairo that Nasser's pilots had warned him of the consequences if he permitted Israel the first strike. In Jordan there has been a military shake-up and some key generals have been retired. Jordanians blame the Egyptians for their particular disaster, and say Nasser kept promising them air cover even after his air force had been destroyed. The colonels in Syria keep their own counsel. Even on the brink of a catastrophic defeat, they saw no need to justify their actions and the coup-weary Syrian public is apparently beyond asking.

In the aftermath, the Arab's political nihilism has taken another form, a widespread resistance to any compromise settlement, such as U Thant's special emissary is now delving into. The Suez Canal is the best example. It remains closed, and Nasser is losing more than $10 million in revenues every month it stays that way.

At one time, there was some hope that a deal could be made whereby Western pressure would prevail upon Israel to pull back from the canal's east bank so that the channel could be cleared of sunken ships and reopened. The Arabs stood by their demand for a total Israeli withdrawal. Meanwhile, the canal silts up at the rate of 1 foot per year. The Japanese and others are building supertankers at a rapid pace, and soon it will be cheaper to take Middle Eastern oil around the horn of Africa, whatever the fate of the 101-mile ditch.

The Arabs have not always been so deeply attached to principle, in recent years they have been in the vanguard of those Third World powers that seek to play the West off against the Soviet bloc for their own political and economic gain. But in the case of Israel, the Arabs think they have a classic case of injustice, and they mean to make the most of it.

In fact, it has become an obsession which brooks no compromise. Immediately after the June war, there were some like King Hussein who were ready to make a deal, although on what terms it never was exactly clear. The Israelis snuffed out these hopes by taking an intractable stand on Jerusalem. It never was much of a possibility since no Arab leader is publicly ready to concede the smallest slice of Arab land to the enemy.

The Arabs rest their main hope today on time and attrition. When the Beirut housewife wished the Israelis had occupied Damascus and Cairo, she was projecting these hopes. Israel took on considerable occupation burdens when it seized Jordan's west bank, the Gaza Strip and the Sinai Peninsula. In addition to a vast area three times the size of Israel itself, the Jewish state incorporated about 1 million Arabs, which explains in part its reluctance to allow repatriation of refugees who crossed into Jordan.

This reduced the Israeli-Arab ratio in Israel from about 8 to 1 to roughly 2 to 1 in the expanded state. Israel may or may not be able to manage the new security problems involved, but it is fairly certain that any further Israeli advance would have produced an unmanageable situation. Occupying the west bank of the canal would accomplish little more than greatly magnify security problems by bringing three large cities, Port Said, Ismailia and Suez, into the Israeli fold. Israeli troops are only 35 miles from Damascus now, and any further advance would soon run into heavily populated areas.

Abu, The Tribune (London): Ben Roth

The Dead Sea Valley east of the Jordan River, the present boundary, has little to offer except more refugee camps. Defensively, there is much to be said for keeping the line at the river.

There is growing awareness in the Arab camp that even if Israel can manage to control the occupied areas, it would be foolish to spread further. This strategic insight has contributed to the increasing aggressiveness of the various Arab guerrilla units operating inside Israel. The disasters of the war have increased Arab respect for these ill-equipped and badly trained formations, of which the al-Fatah group is the best known. Before June, they were widely discredited as embarrassing long-range Arab plans to subdue Israel, but once the Arab armies had been beaten and the myth of conquest was at least temporarily subdued, the guerrillas came into their own. Palestinians working in Kuwait, who have been paying a 5 per cent income tax to the Palestine Liberation Organization, have asked the ruler to switch their tax payments to al-Fatah.

Israel has already resumed its policy of reprisal raids as a means of keeping terrorism down. In November, the army delivered a mortar attack on a refugee camp east of the Jordan, from which guerrillas were suspected of operating, and followed this up the next day with an aerial attack on Jordanian army positions. In the aftermath of the June war, this stirred barely a ripple of international concern, despite the fact that the Israelis used napalm. The war has changed the accepted reference marks for incidents; it takes the shelling of Egyptian refineries at Suez or the sinking of an Israeli destroyer by Egyptian guided-missile boats to create much of an uproar these days. The killing of fourteen Palestinian refugees by mortar fire simply doesn't register.

Guerrillas fit better into the Arab sense of things than does a coordinated Pan-Arab military response to Israel. The latter takes time, and always runs the risk of sabotage when the inherent contradictions in Arab political life rise to the surface, notably the conflict between the Arab "progressive" states and the oil-rich but politically backward deserts of the Arabian hinterland. The melodramatic idea of a secret band of heroic strugglers for the holy cause raiding in enemy territory strikes a responsive chord in Arab hearts.

Israeli reprisal tactics against hapless Arabs who may or may not be involved has done little to slow down the guerrillas. In recent years, the number of groups known to be operating has risen from the original al-Fatah to five, although al-Fatah is still doing most of the work. The Jordanian Government, which is thought to be genuinely trying to halt guerrilla forays from its soil, has been unable to stop them, although a number of guerrillas have been arrested. The partisans get a sympathetic reception in the refugee camps, where King Hussein's police exercise a minimum of control.

There are reports that Israel has managed to infiltrate some of the units, but even this is unlikely to bring their activities to a halt. They operate along classic lines, with members of individual units knowing only the members of that unit, and the leader in contact with only one representative of a higher echelon. The prospects are that guerrilla activity will increase, both in the occupied west bank area and inside Israel proper. Despite Moshe Dayan's claims to the contrary, there is little evidence that life inside Israel is much more secure now than it was before the war, with the exception of the border kibbutzim that are no longer directly under Syrian guns on the Galilee heights.

Faced with their present predicament, many Arabs today hark back eight centuries or so to the time of the Crusades. The Franks took Jerusalem, they will tell you, and held it for seventy years. But eventually the Crusaders were driven out of the homeland, and the same will happen to Israel. Times, of course, have changed since then. Technology plays as great a role as numbers in modern warfare, as Israel's swift victory in June proved. But the Arab prefers to think in terms of numbers, like 100 million Arabs against a paltry 2 million Jews. He is prepared to wait, if necessary, another seventy years for victory.

Anything can happen over decades, but the immediate prospects for change in the Arab world are not bright. A few leftist intellectuals will tell you that the June war spelled the end of military supremacy in the Arab world, but that is wishful thinking.

The June debacle has had one significant if transitory effect on Arab politics. The struggle between progressive and conservative blocs has come to a halt, largely on terms favoring the conservatives led by Saudi Arabia's King Feisal. Egyptian troops have been pulled out of the Yemen, and President Abdullah Sallal brusquely removed from office. In his financial extremity, Nasser has turned again to loving his Arab brethren whatever their politics. In return, three of the oil kingdoms, including Saudi Arabia, are staving off Egyptian collapse with gifts of $266 million annually. Another $112 million is going to Jordan, which lost all its tourist attractions and most of its productive land when Israel seized the west bank, and was saddled with another 200,000 refugees as well.

For Feisal and the other oil kings, this is money well spent. The Saudis always managed to spend their oil income, but wasted a great deal of it. Libya and Kuwait have more money than they can absorb, and if contributions to Nasser help keep the Nationalist tiger off their backs, that is to the good. Nasser will be needing the oil money for some years to come. Instead of being able to sit back gleefully and watching the Arabs tear one another apart, Israel faces greater Arab political harmony than it has seen for many years. Feisal has even quietly shelved his so-called "Islamic Alliance," a political grouping he worked assiduously to develop as a counter to Nasser's Arab nationalism.

But thoughtful Arabs are fully convinced that the United States will never allow them their right to take back by force what was taken from them by force. They are aware of the Sixth Fleet patrolling in the Mediterranean. They may still dream that the Soviet Union, the friendly superpower, will step in and neutralize U.S. military might, but very few Arabs believe it will happen. It didn't in 1956, and it didn't in 1967, so why should it happen next time? Why, when Moscow today is taking a moderate line and denouncing such Arab extremists as the Syrians?

You can talk to an Arab intellectual about the United States and Russia, but you rarely see even guarded references to this essential fact of power in the Arab press today. One of the very few to discuss it at all in print is Mohammed Hassanein Heikal. Nasser's confidant, editor of the prestigious al-Ahram, and a man emerging slowly as a critic of the military caste. But the message is not getting through to the man in the street. Instead, he is fed a daily diet of a rising wave of terror inside Israel, mixed with accusations that the disaster was the fault of a few incompetent generals.

The spirit is infectious. It is picked up even by people who know better but who will nevertheless ask your honest opinion whether the Arabs are ready yet for another round against Israel. Nasser, in his November speech, managed to say that the Egyptian military machine was 80 per cent wiped out in the June war but was now stronger than ever. Few asked publicly how this could be, particularly with 5,000 Egyptian officers and technicians languishing in Israeli POW camps.

The Arab mood today is certainly one of frustration and despair, but it is not one of surrender. They have been humiliated three times in the past two decades by the Israelis, and many times previously in this century by the Western powers. The June war was but the latest event in a depressing series. The reverses the Arabs suffered were not great enough to bring about the sort of capitulation the Israelis hoped for. The beating was not painful enough to bring them to the bargaining table on Israel's terms. As long as the oil keeps flowing, they will manage to survive.

Whether Israel will survive in its present swollen form is the question that fascinates them. It gives the Arabs hope that they, and not the Jews, will win the waiting game. It may be a faint hope, but at present it is all they have.

3 Purple Hearts, 2 Turtle Doves

And an Ambush in a Flame Tree

WILLAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronx People (Harcourt, Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), has recently returned from his second trip to South-east Asia.

We arrived at the river where our attack would jump off late. Now it was dark. The men had to light their cigarettes beneath high-held ponchos so that the glow would not draw fire from across the river.

"When you get three purple hearts you automatically go home."

"I am a civilian," I said. "The press."

"You got a gun?"

"No."

"You'll need a gun."

"No."

"You got an entrenching tool? Something to dig in with?"

"No."

"After we cross the river the VC will mortar us. Stay with me."

"All right," I said.

That night I stood guard with Stay-With-Me in the moonless night. Our watch was on the inner perimeter behind a tank turret.

"Call me Lorrillard," Stay-With-Me said. "Did you hear that?"

"Yes," I said. "It sounded like a hurt animal."

"Or maybe the VC slit Chuck's throat."

"Who is Chuck?"

"That's what we call white troopers," Stay-With-Me said. "This is Lima one calling Lima four," Lorrillard said into his transmitter. "Did you hear that mother scream?"

"That what?"

"That cat."

"Cat?"

"Mother."

"Mother?"

"Put on a brother."

"Hello, Brother. Chuck doesn't understand."

"I understand all, Brother."

"Peace."

"Peace."

"Did you hear that mother scream?"

"These are the fortunes of war, Brother."

"To whom do I have the good fortune to be speaking?"

"Mohammed Zeppelin."

"Zeppelin, this is Lorrillard. How you making it?"

"Get back to the scream," I said.

"Mohammed. I am with a correspondent from the other world who is understandably perturbed. What would you prescribe?"

"Peace."

"Can we get back to this war?" I said.

Lorrillard dropped his contact. "You were saying?"

"If the enemy get through our outer perimeter. . . ."

"We will know that soon enough," Lorrillard said. "Feel and tell if your head is still tied to your neck bone."

"It is," I said.

"That's progress," Lorrillard said. "At this rate the war will soon be over. Do you mind if I smoke?"

"Please do," I said.

"If there are no ladies present I will go right ahead," Lorrillard said. "Are we winning the riot at home?"

"Yes."

"Then we are making progress on all fronts," Lorrillard said. "Although I understand our troops suffered a reversal in Detroit."

"I didn't want to bring that up."

"We will recoup," Lorrillard said. "That war back there could last fifty years. When we finish here we will have had excellent training for that war. I plan to bring ■ light tank weapon myself. Unless I am embarrassed."

"Embarrassed?"

"Killed tomorrow," Stay-With-Me said.

• • •

I did not stay with Lorrillard. I crossed the river on an Amtrac, riding next to the .50-caliber machine gun and jammed in with 100 M-16 riflemen. It was a beautiful crossing, with the beginning sun just catching the blue wide river and then hitting into the green rice paddies. Our artillery shells were bursting up ahead into the sand on the other side, sending up too perfect plumes of earth as in a lousy movie. I was not concerned about their firing at us. A column that had slipped off from us was attracting some automatic weapon fire, but not very much. I was not even concerned about one of our own shells dropping short. It seemed like a rehearsal for something else. When we reached the base of our first objective, a not too high hill, we scrambled out into bamboo cover, got our gear sorted out, and then began the climb. You have to stay off the trails because they might be booby trapped. You have to be careful, too, stepping over vines that might be a trip wire for a concealed explosive, and you must be careful that the sun does not get you when you are doing all this. But we gained the hill in forty minutes and were abruptly told by radio we were on the wrong hill, so we turned around and marched down and crawled up another one with our Phantom Jets coming in now and dropping napalm. When we got to the top of the right hill the jets were zeroing in on everything below us so that it was like standing on an island in an ocean of flames.

They had expected contact with a battalion of North Vietnamese regulars but there was no contact yet with anything but guerrillas. Meanwhile, the napalming went on around, all around. The major said the villagers had been warned early that morning by leaflet drop to move themselves and their cattle into the open fields. I had seen no leaflet drop. In forty-five minutes the regimental commander coptered in and asked if we had seen the leaflet drop. No one had. He claimed to have seen it, but wondered if it had targeted properly.

Now the peasants were moving out into the fields of grain. Most of them rode water buffaloes. At first they seemed confused, as though not knowing how to perform in this movie of death. They rode around in giant circles. They seemed to be making a pattern of figure 8s, then bunching up, then flowering out as though hoping this would please us. Nothing pleased us. The bombing continued. The Phantom Jets came in at 5,000 feet, then peeled off and came down like a flash of lightning, leaving no place to hide. The clouds of smoke streamed over the peasants in the fields so that they would appear and reappear as black clouds and then would be all lighted up by giant fountains of napalm, so that now at once you realized what this shot was, this scene. It was ■ rehearsal, a news clip of the future, and the future was now and the future was ours.

"You hit? You look bad, my friend," Stay-With-Me Lorrillard said.

"Yes."

"Where?"

I pointed to my stomach.

"You be all right. You just need a salt pill."

"How did your friend Mohammed Zeppelin make out?"

"He got hit. The brother's tank was ambushed down in the valley," Lorrillard said, pointing down to the smoking and brilliant valley.

"Too bad."

"Embarrassing," Lorrillard said. "Brother Zeppelin has had two purple hearts. When you get three purple hearts you automatically go home unless you make a written request to stay on."

"Will he make that request?"

"Not very likely. He dead," Lorrillard said.

RESTAURANT WORKERS

THE THUMB IN LABOR'S SOUP

BURTON HALL

Mr. Hall has been an attorney for insurgent, rank-and-file groups in several unions, including Painters' District Council No. 9. His "Ventilating the House of Labor," on the painters' union, appeared in The Nation of July 31, 1967.

Among the former radicals who have become conservative trade union bureaucrats, Fred Ferrara, president of the 10,000-member Restaurant Employees' Local 11 in New York City, deserves a medal for gall. The lengths he went to avoid explaining to Senator McClellan's investigating subcommittee his involvement in the activities of labor "consultant" Jack McCarthy might be dismissed as just one more dreary story. But while hiding from the subcommittee's subpoena behind a doctor's affidavit that he was a patient in St. Clare's Hospital, Ferrara was actually negotiating a truly extraordinary collective bargaining agreement. And even though the subcommittee's hearings were still going on, he slipped out of the hospital to sign the document—slipping back in again as soon as the ceremony was over.

The document in question is a contract covering some 4,000 employees of the Schrafft's restaurant chain in New York and New Jersey until October, 1969, and indefinitely thereafter. All by itself it tells much about Ferrara's regime in Local 11; but, still more important, it offers a disturbing picture of the direction in which the bureaucratized trade union establishment is heading.

Two parts of the Schrafft's contract are especially noteworthy. One, the "discharge" section, permits the employer to fire any employee, at any time, without notice to the union or to the employee, for such causes as "gross insubordination" or "offensive language or conduct," and which permits the employer to dismiss any employee for any reason whatever upon twenty-four-hour notice to the union. The "no-strike" clause is even more startling. Its terms prohibit the employees and the union from ever engaging in any concerted action—whether by strike, slowdown, or mass illness or whatever—in support of any bargaining demands. Those clauses, coupled with a wage scale so low that a recent rise in New York's minimum wage requirements (which Ferrara campaigned against) actually lifted Schrafft's employees' wages above the contract scale, make the contract an extreme example of what Ferrara, in his days as a militant Trotskyist and activist in the Socialist Workers Party, would have denounced as a crass, corrupt betrayal of the workers.

Nowadays he boasts of such clauses. At a press conference held in the Overseas Press Club, with employer representatives conspicuously present, he promised to write the same no-strike provisions into every contract that he signs from now on. And he promptly began to make good. In November, 1966, he signed an almost identical contract with the Bickford's restaurant chain and, in June, 1967, a similar one with White Tower. (The White Tower contract adds an additional fillip: it provides that if an employee, in his rest break, steps outside the store without the superintendent's express permission, he is automatically discharged.) Ferrara's pledge suggests that employees of such chains as Riker's, Zum-Zum, Child's, Walgreen's, Patricia Murphy, Howard Johnson, Mayflower, Savarin, Stark's, Holiday House, Union News and Cobb's Corner, as well as workers in some 200 separate luncheonettes, will, when their Local 11 contracts are renewed, become bound by the provisions now in effect at Schrafft's, Bickford's and White Tower.

Ferrara's shift over the years from furious partisan of the workers' cause to the negotiator of permanent no-strike contracts in a way parallels the evolution of the trade union establishment. The "no-strike" section of the Schrafft's contract begins with some by now familiar rhetoric about "maximum harmony" and "industrial peace," about the "public interest" and "this era of enlightened labor relations," and about the "mutual and identical" aims of the employer and the union. Nothing unusual there. Such language appears much more often than formerly in many contracts. Nor is there anything unusual about the provisions which prohibit strikes during the three-year term of the contract and require that all disputes be submitted to an "impartial" arbitrator. But gently, prosaically almost, there is added to these familiar provisions a clause providing that if, at the contract's expiration, the union and the employer have failed to agree on contract renewal, "the existing agreement shall be automatically extended and the dispute shall be submitted to the arbitrator, who will render a binding decision." On first reading, that may not sound like much; what it means is that the union is barred from striking even after a contract expires.

To make this meaning clear, the contract is specific. One provision will illustrate:

The "no-strike, no lock-out clause" will apply permanently . . . It shall continue in full force and effect during the period of negotiations and arbitration, it being the intent of the parties that the use of the strike and work stoppage and the use of the lock-out shall be forever voluntarily surrendered as long as the parties maintain a collective bargaining relationship.

How could a labor union sign so emasculating a contract? Ferrara has so arranged it. For one thing, he has arranged the by-laws of Local 11 to permit the president to negotiate and sign collective bargaining agreements without approval of the membership. For another, although an "employees' representation committee" was around during Schrafft's negotiations, its members were not allowed to read the contract and learned of the "discharge" and "no-strike" clauses only after the contract had gone into effect. Furthermore, the relationship between Ferrara and the employer is such that the employer, prior to the signing of the contract, supplied Ferrara with the addresses of its employees, so that he could get designation cards signed and protect himself against a possible NLRB challenge. Ferrara also campaigned (unsuccessfully) to keep the New York State minimum wage requirements for the restaurant industry at the level of the agreement. And some conclusion might be drawn from the fact that J. Kenneth O'Connor, for many years counsel for Jack McCarthy, turns up as the "impartial arbitrator" of the Schrafft's contract.

For the most interesting background to the Ferrara story appears in the investigation conducted by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the United States Senate, better known as the McClellan subcommittee, into a subject it identified as the "Labor Racketeering Activities of Jack McCarthy and the National Consultants Associated, Ltd." It was from this investigation, conducting public hearings in September and October, 1966, that Ferrara was hiding when he signed the Schrafft's contract.

There was also the matter of two cleaning and waxing firms, known as Purity Maintenance Co., Inc., and Preferred Building Maintenance Co., Inc., in which until March 25, 1965, Ferrara, under the pseudonym of Fred Gladstone (his real name is Herman Gladstone), was partner along with McCarthy's brother-in-law, Joseph Maake. The subcommittee learned that Ferrara had "recommended" to employees such as the large and varied Restaurant Associates chain (Riker's, Zum-Zum, Brasserie, Trattoria), that they "retain" McCarthy as a labor consultant, then McCarthy would "recommend" that these firms hire the cleaning and waxing companies, or at least transfer large sums of money to them, or to McCarthy. And that device, as the subcommittee's report deftly puts it, "was a contributory factor in the income of Fred Ferrara, who received a total of $36,606 from the two firms during the period 1960 to 1965."

The subcommittee got this information, for the most part, from employers. Ferrara, confined to the hospital, did not answer the subcommittee's subpoena; McCarthy and Maake pleaded the Fifth Amendment. One example of their interrogation will give the flavor: Senator Jackson questioned Maake about the money transmitted through the cleaning and waxing firms with this result:

Senator Jackson. Was this method the one utilized by Mr. Jack McCarthy to pay off Fred Ferrara as president of Local No. 11 for favorable treatment during the contract negotiations with employers that hired McCarthy as labor consultant?

Mr. Maake. I refuse to answer that question on the ground that it may tend to incriminate me.

The subcommittee turned up other matters as well. It found that the Local 11 Welfare Trust Fund had paid an average of $46.21 per pair for eyeglasses that cost only $6.19 per pair, thus "depleting" the fund's assets—so the New York State Insurance Department charged—by $156,564.72 from 1960 to 1965. And it found that the fund had paid $60,000 per year to the Amalgamated Dental Plan, Inc., a now defunct enterprise that performed no services whatever for union members except to distribute a list of "cooperating" dentists. (The "cooperating" dentists, who were not paid by the plan or by the fund, would provide the union members with free cleaning and X-rays as a "come-on"; the member himself would then be required to pay for all other dental services.)

And there was the matter of the fund's medical plan. Of the $340,000 that the fund paid out to a certain Dr. Epstein under that plan, all that is really known is that the money was paid to Epstein. "That," according to the testimony of James J. Higgins, a supervising insurance examiner testifying for the New York Insurance Department, "is all we know about it." According to the subcommittee's published hearings:

The Chairman. He did not give that much medical service to the beneficiaries. Did he give any medical services to the beneficiaries?

Mr. Higgins. That is exactly the reason we would like to be able to examine Dr. Epstein's records. As will be brought out further on in this statement, Dr. Epstein has contended that to disclose to us or to anyone his records would disclose the doctor-patient relationship which would be unethical, illegal.

But these financial adventures—which were overseen both by employer representatives and by Ferrara's lieutenants in Local 11, all acting in their various capacities as trustees and administrator of the fund—may be only incidental to the main story of Ferrara and his collective bargaining with employers. More to the point is what happened when some of the members of Local 11 decided to bring these facts to the attention of the membership as a whole.

The "subversive plot" began early in 1967, when several members of Local 11's executive board, together with Jimmy Gleason, a Local 11 business agent, began collecting news clippings and other material concerning the McClellan subcommittee's disclosures, with a view to publishing them to the members. One of the rebels double-crossed the others and tipped Ferrara off. Whereupon Ferrara passed the word to the three still rebellious board members, through Gleason, that they had better resign; otherwise "a lot of my friends will be unhappy." The three resigned in March, 1967.

But their efforts continued. In April, Gleason was told, casually, that three men were waiting to see him in the basement of Local 11's building. Gleason went and was met by three men who, after locking the door, beat him about the head with pistols and a blackjack, sending him to the hospital. The experience didn't seem to cow Gleason. Some days later, when he was told he would suffer worse experiences if he protected the rebellious board members from being "jobbed out" of the industry, he ignored the warning. But before long, on charges that

(Continued on page 125)

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Rehabilitated Experimentalist

THE MASTER AND MARGARITA.
By Mikhail Bulgakov. Translated from the Russian by Michael Glenny. Harper & Row. 394 pp. $5.95.

THE MASTER AND MARGARITA.
By Mikhail Bulgakov. Translated by Mirra Ginsburg. Grove Press. 402 pp.
$5.95.

DONALD FANGER

The author of Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism (Harvard University Press), Mr. Fanger teaches Slavic and comparative literature at Stanford University.

Begun in 1928, written over the course of the next decade, and published only last year, Bulgakov's brilliant and moving extravaganza may well be one of the major novels of the Russian 20th century. Books clearly do have their fates. For the Soviets, this one serves the main progressive tendency of art in the sixties, which seeks to reconnect with the experimental twenties and resume the unfinished work of that remarkable decade. For the Western reader, the novelty of Bulgakov's genre can only be relative after Joyce and Beckett, Nabokov, Burroughs and Mailer; yet the novelty of his achievement is absolute—comparable perhaps most readily to that of Fellini's recent work in the cinema.

To pursue the cinematic analogy for a moment, you can form some idea of what this book is like by imagining a Fellini film in which a quartet of diabolically transfigured Marx brothers romps through parts of Doctor Zhivago and Zoshchenko's complete works, with scenes of Christ's last days interlarded. This is highly approximate, but it does suggest something of the complexity of The Master and Margarita.

Rather less indirectly than Pasternak's, this is a city novel, the enormous cast of characters (largely literary and theatrical types) being united by consternation at the invasion of Moscow by the devil—who poses as a professor of black magic named Woland—and his three assistants, one of whom is a giant talking cat, a tireless prankster and expert pistol shot.

Woland appears in the first chapter, ironically interrupting a lecture on Jesus that is being delivered by a literary bureaucrat named Berlioz to a young poet, Ivan Bezdomny (Homeless). Berlioz has commissioned an anti-religious poem, and is appalled by the hastily composed result:

It was hard to say exactly what had made Bezdomny write as he had—whether it was his great talent for graphic description or complete ignorance of his subject, but his Jesus had come out . . . well, completely alive, a Jesus who had really existed, although admittedly a Jesus who had every possible fault.

Berlioz, however, wanted to prove to the poet that the main object was not who Jesus was, whether he was good or bad, but that as a person Jesus had never existed at all and that all the stories about him were mere invention, pure myth.

Berlioz, in short, is a thoroughgoing materialist; denying the reality of what he would rather not believe, he goads Woland into a refutation which involves the prediction of his imminent beheading—and at the conclusion of the conversation, a streetcar does in fact decapitate him. Ivan Bezdomny is clearly more accessible to a higher truth, though his allegiance to common sense produces some comic difficulties:

"Police?" shouted Ivan into the mouthpiece. . . . "Please arrange to send five motorcycles with sidecars, armed with machine guns to arrest the foreign professor. What? Take me with you. I'll show you where to go. . . . This is Bezdomny. I'm a poet, and I'm speaking from the lunatic asylum. . . ."

"Lunatics," lovers, and poets do learn and change, while the common people of Moscow are only dazzled, discomfited and gulled by the satanic troupe. Woland and company engage a theatre, conjure up a French boutique, and the ladies of Moscow scramble to exchange their old clothes for chic new outfits which dematerialize as soon as they get out on the streets (there is probably more nakedness in this single novel than in all the rest of Soviet literature put together). Money, distributed to the avid throng, turns into waste paper on the morrow. Greed for all the things of this world—reputation, success, love, comfort—is attacked through irony, satire and a triumphantly unfolding series of supernatural practical jokes.

On its satirical level, the book treats the traditional Russian theme of vulgarity by laughing at it until the laughter itself becomes fatiguing, ambivalent and grotesque. But there is more: thematically, the novel is put together like a set of Chinese boxes. A third of the way through, in a mental hospital, the hack poet Ivan Bezdomny meets the Master, whose mysterious presence adds a new dimension to the narrative—the dimension in which art, love and religion have their being. Ivan has been taken, protesting, to the hospital; the Master, significantly, has voluntarily committed himself, rejecting the world. He is a middle-aged historian turned novelist who, after winning 100,000 rubles in the state lottery, devotes himself, an egoless Zhivago, to the twin miracles of love and art. Aided by the beautiful Margarita, whom he has met by chance in the street, he writes a novel about Pontius Pilate—which she declares to be her life—only to become the object of vicious critical attack in the press and, in a fit of depression, burns the precious manuscript.

"When I emerged into the world clutching my novel," he tells Ivan, "my life came to an end." Bulgakov's novel traces his posthumous existence, as it were—and at the end the metaphor becomes literal truth. Margarita, the exemplar of "real, true, eternal love," having found that abandoning her rich and handsome husband for the Master is not enough, agrees to become a witch and preside at Satan's ball; her reward is the liberation of herself and the Master into the eternal peace of death—that, and the reconstitution of the destroyed manuscript.

What, then, becomes of the manuscript? The answer is the key to Bulgakov's work. Echoes of Gogol, Goethe, Dostoevsky, Hoffmann and a dozen others are not hard to find, but they are internal allusions; to account for the form of the book—and its formal significance within Soviet literature—one must mention Pirandello, and the Gide of The Counterfeiters. Bulgakov's characters, in the common Russian phrase, are out of different operas. The story of the disruption of Moscow by Woland and company is opéra bouffe; the story of the Master and Margarita is lyrical opera. But there is a third and epic opera, richly staged and in a style that contrasts sharply with the styles of the other two. The setting is Jerusalem, the main subject Pontius Pilate, the main action the crucifixion of Christ.

This narrative is threaded through the whole of the book, in a series of special chapters. It first appears as Woland's eyewitness reminiscence, then as Ivan's dream, and finally as a piece of the Master's novel. No divinity is ascribed to Jesus; the emphasis is rather on Pilate, who is intrigued by his prisoner's assertion that there are no evil people in the world, and drawn to his quiet integrity. This Jesus dies without a murmur on the cross, his only words (in a passage omitted from the version published in Russia and followed by Grove) being that cowardice is one of the worst human sins. Pilate agrees, but too late. His cowardice keeps him from preventing the execution; his anguished realization that "he would do anything to save this crazy, innocent dreamer" comes only in a dream, after the crucifixion. The remorse of this failure is his damnation.

To return now to the question of the Master's novel: By merging it with Woland's account and Ivan's dream, Bulgakov seems to be suggesting that truth subsists, timeless and intact, available to men with sufficient intuition and freedom from conventional perception. The artist's uniqueness in particular lies in his ability to accept miracle—and this ability leads him, paradoxically, to a truth devoid of miracle, a purely human truth. I am simplifying what I take to be implicit, though complex and unclear, in Bulgakov's book, but there is a clue, easily overlooked, that would seem to support this interpretation. When the Master first appears to tell Ivan his story, Margarita is waiting "impatiently for the promised final words about the fifth Procurator of Judea, reading out in a loud singsong random sentences that pleased her and saying that the novel was her life." Now, Bulgakov's own novel ends precisely with the phrase about "the cruel Procurator of Judea, fifth in that office, the knight Pontius Pilate." Is the novel we read then, to be identified with the Master's?

The answer is clearly (but not simply) yes. The perspectives turn out to be reversible. Bulgakov's novel had appeared to include a piece at least of the Master's; now at the end it appears that the Master's novel has enlarged to include Bulgakov's. The baffling correspondences, in any event, make the case for mystery, and the heart of mystery is transfiguration—quod erat demonstrandum. Margarita's faith in the Master's art is thus justified in ways which she could not have anticipated—and becomes a symbol of Bulgakov's similar faith in his own work. The Master's novel is Margarita's life in one sense as Bulgakov's novel is in another.

The Master and Margarita has been the literary sensation of the year in Russia for reasons that go beyond its brilliant experimentalism. What it gives the contemporary reader there, for all the obvious differences, is something of what Doctor Zhivago will when it is finally published—but without the red herring of political disputability. It is a plea for spiritual life without dogmatic theology, for individual integrity based on an awareness of the irreducible mystery of human life. It bespeaks sympathy for the inevitably lonely and misunderstood artist; it opposes to Philistinism not good citizenship but renunciation.

A large portion of the Russian intelligentsia today is in search of just such spiritual fare. It seeks to restore the category or religiosity, which it respects and needs, while rejecting the conventional religious forms of the past. It believes—not in God, but in belief. At one point near the end, Woland has this significant exchange with the Master:

"You believe in me, I hope?"

"I must . . . although I would much prefer it if I could regard you as a figment of my own hallucination. Forgive me," added the Master, recollecting himself.

"By all means regard me as such if that makes you any happier," replied Woland politely.

Whether the devil be regarded as fact or symbol is less important than that he be regarded. Back in the everyday world after her experience as a witch at Satan's ball, Margarita finds that her experience with Woland has done her no psychological harm—because, clearly, she has accepted it fully. Ivan, by comparison, believes at the end of the novel "that as a young man he fell victim to some crooked hypnotists, went to the hospital and was cured. But he knows that there is still something that is beyond his control." Each year the spring moon plunges him into dreams of a super-reality he cannot credit.

Woland, the devil, is the main representative of that super-reality in Bulgakov's novel. Christ is purely the son of man; there is no Father. Yet the context of the whole work suggests that the epigraph from Faust, in which Mephistopheles identifies himself, is to be taken without irony here: "That Power I serve/Which wills forever evil/Yet does forever good."

Both the Harper (Michael Glenny) and Grove (Mirra Ginsburg) translations read well; on balance, their respective virtues and deficiencies probably cancel each other out. But the Glenny version is based on a fuller text (some 23,000 words fuller, according to the publisher), while Ginsburg has followed the version published in the Soviet magazine, Moskva. The fuller version is not necessarily, from the literary standpoint, the better one. It does, to be sure, give somewhat more emphasis to the theme of cowardice, and restores a number of remarks, apparently deleted by the Soviet editors, such as "Remove the document and you remove the man." On the other hand, one could make a good case for cutting (as the Moskva version does) a number of tedious passages. The Grove edition contains a brief Translator's Note, sketching Bulgakov's career and stating—apparently erroneously—that "the editors (of Moskva) chose to publish the novel as Bulgakov left it." Too bad that the Harper editors say nothing about the history of the manuscript they used; that is one mystery we could have done without.

The Crime Against Pasternak

THE POEMS OF DOCTOR ZHIVAGO. By Boris Pasternak. Translated by Eugene M. Kayden. Drawings by Bill Greer. Hallmark Editions. 62 pp. $2.50.

SISTER MY LIFE. By Boris Pasternak. Translated by Philip C. Flayderman. Washington Square Press. Bilingual edition. 170 pp. $4.95.

SIMON KARLINSKY

Mr. Karlinsky is professor of Slavic languages and literature at the University of California. He is the author of Marina Cvetaeva: Her Life and Art (University of California Press).

Boris Pasternak began writing poetry during the heyday of Russian Futurism. His earliest published poetry reflects the devices typical of that movement: sudden shifts and compressions of meaning, emphasis on the phonetic and the lexical aspects of the poetic craft. Above all, it exploits the syntactic ellipses frequently found in Russian colloquial speech.

While a few of the poems in Pasternak's first two collections of verse can be seen as unnecessarily obscure, he managed to bring his elliptic manner under beautiful control in his third volume of verse, My Sister, Life (within the context of the poem from which the title is quoted it can also be understood as Life Is My Sister). Written during the revolutionary summer of 1917, this volume of love lyrics and nature evocations is the book in which Pasternak's startling originality and awesome stature as a poet become fully manifest for the first time. The rest of Pasternak's poetic career represents the slow progress from the complex sound organization and elliptic suggestivity of the Sister toward the simple and explicit diction of his last poems. The simplicity of the later Pasternak style is in a way as deceptive as the apparent complexity of his earlier work. Both the early and the late poems are verbal structures organized with endless care, but at the end of his life he no longer needed the dazzling sounds and colors and the shifting planes in which he had couched his tempestuously exuberant early poetry.

The culmination of his later artful simplicity is reached in the cycle of poems that make up the final chapter of his novel, Doctor Zhivago. It must be remembered, however, that these poems are intended as poetic utterances of the fictitious poet Yuri Zhivago, and that Pasternak is expressing himself in these poems as it were under a mask. The Zhivago poems have attracted numerous translators, all of whom have so far managed to reproduce the literal meaning of the poems and failed to convey the particular homely magic of Pasternak's originals. This is also more or less the case with Eugene M. Kayden's small selection of Zhivago poems, published by the Hallmark card people in a very pretty little volume with a technicolor jacket from the MGM movie. The accompanying drawings by Bill Greer are rather sweet, the translations of the poems correct and uninspired and, in general, one could do worse by way of an inexpensive present for some kindly old lady.

Phillip C. Flayderman's Sister My Life (this version of the title follows the word order of the Russian but thoroughly obscures its meaning) is something altogether different. There is some attempt here to preserve the metrical pattern, but almost none to convey in English the rich sonorities and the verbal fireworks of Pasternak's most adventurous and experimental book. It can therefore be concluded that what the translator is aiming for above all is textual fidelity. But even a hasty comparison of his English renditions with the Russian originals, helpfully printed across the page, reveals to what an amazing extent this translator is unable to understand plain Russian, to say nothing of coping with Pasternak's difficult and elliptic poetry.

Here is a literal translation of the first and the last stanzas of one of the most famous poems of the collection, "Out of Superstition," with Pasternak's elliptic implications filled out in brackets: "My tiny room is a box of red kumquats. But then we can't keep soiling [our love] in [overnight] hotel rooms until death (lit. until the coffin), until the morgue! [. . .] Why, the very idea—you are no vestal virgin: you entered with a chair, picked up my life [like a book] from the shelf and dusted it off."

Flayderman's rendition: "My hotel room is like a box of russet Bitter oranges./O, be careful, do not get soiled as you go/Coffined to the morgue. [. . .] It is a sin to think you are not a vestal virgin/You walked in with a chair,/Handed me life from the shelf,/And blew the dust away."

The entire volume irresistibly reminds one of that hoary anecdote about the foreign traveler who, seeing the inscription "Look Out!" from the train window, stuck his head out and had his face bashed in by a tunnel. Flayderman knows many (though not all) of the words Pasternak uses, but much of the time he has no idea what they add up to. "Ganges dreams of them" becomes "They dream of Ganges." "Dawn, like a cold viper, crawls into the pits" is rendered as "With merciless envy, dawn crawls/Into their holes" (the noun ekhidna, "viper," confused with the adjective ekhidnyi, "sarcastic," grammatically impossible in the context, and the attributive "their" gratuitously and meaninglessly added). "I would not even disdain using an unprintable word [:] but against whom could we lodge a complaint?" is the intriguing opening of Pasternak's poem. "To Elena." "I would not take umbrage/Over an unprinted word./Where can one search?" is the closest Flayderman can come to conveying these three lines in English. And so it goes in poem after poem.

Russian words are looked up in a dictionary and wrong entries chosen. Verbatim renditions of idioms (which obviously pass unrecognized as such) are the rule: "How many summers, how many winters," the Russian equivalent of "Haven't seen you in ages!" is translated faithfully as "How many years! How many winters!" When the poet's beloved stares at the ceiling, refusing to speak to him (the idiomatic Russian "as if her mouth were filled with water" is roughly the equivalent of "has the cat got her tongue?"), Flayderman thinks Pasternak says "How your mouth watered."

The height of mayhem is committed by the translator on the longest poem of the collection, the untitled one which begins with the line, "How soporific life is! (Flayderman: "How sleepy life is . . ."). This is one of Pasternak's loveliest and most profound early poems, with its thrice repeated refrain wherein the poet confesses that he was sent by God to torment "those whom it is a sin to torment" (Flayderman:

"those/Who are tormented by sin"). Almost everything in this 4-page poem is misread and misunderstood by the translator. At one point, the poet is on the train that is taking him away from his love. He looks out of the train window at all the objects that seem to be rushing backward and thus toward the girl he left behind. The poet wonders whether the high noon, personified as a railroad station thief and loiterer, is at that very moment observing the girl: "watching from the neighbouring cherry trees the angel at [her] embroidering." Flayderman's reading: "Looking for angel embroideries/In his neighbour's cherries." The poet imagines the willows he sees out of the train window rushing to a reunion with the girl: "Will they get there during the night, inhale aromas from the porch and fling themselves headlong into household chores with [or, possibly, like] the waving of towels? Will they see the shadow of the nut tree on the stone foundation?" Baffled by the imagery, confusing kryl'tso, "porch" with krylo, "wing," mistaking almost every verb for some other similar sounding one, not even understanding that all the "they" forms refer to the animated trees of the poet's fantasy, Pasternak's translator comes up with an almost meaningless patchwork of guesses: "Will they last the night?/Will essences breathe life from the wings?/And will they give up trying to make do/With the gusts of hand towels?/Will people see the hazel-bush shadow/On stone foundation?"

How could this translator possibly hope to convey the tone, the style, or the subtler shadings of meanings of Pasternak's poetry when it is so painfully clear that he cannot tell the subject of the sentence from the direct object, does not understand Russian cases, prepositions, verbal aspects, and just about every other form that the language uses for conveying meaning? A man in this kind of predicament could conceivably be advised to take a Berlitz course in Russian. Instead, he is allowed to butcher one of the loveliest books of modern Russian poetry, to print his own wild guesses across the page from Pasternak's originals, and then to issue the entire unbelievable mess under a very handsome cover, to be sold at all bookstores under Boris Pasternak's name for $4.95.

Some of the translations of modern Russian literature that have appeared in America in the last two years are unprecedented and unparalleled in any other literature or country for sheer incompetence and sloppiness. Anselm Hollo's Voznesensky, Herbert Marshall's Mayakovsky, the selection of Russian Formalist criticism translated by Lee T. Lemon and Marion J. Reis (University of Oklahoma Press), and now Flay-derman's Pasternak are all examples of important and complex texts translated into English with the aid of guesswork by people who are unable to read and understand Russian with any degree of fluency. Flayderman's opus appears in an ambitious series, published by the Washington Square Press and edited by Robert Payne (whose enthusiastic but freewheeling, simplistic, and often wildly uninformed introduction to the Pasternak volume casts serious doubts on his ability to judge the quality of translations). Announced in the same series is a number of major works of Russian literature, "all in new and definitive translations." Judging from Pasternak's Sister and the other volume of the same series, Chekhov's The Island of Sakhalin, translated by Luba and Michael Terpak, who somehow managed to riddle every page of that direct and lucidly written study with unimaginable mistranslations and howlers, these "definitive translations" are hitting the absolute low point in the current flood of irresponsible and incompetent translations from the Russian.

In most other fields there would be some way of protecting the public from a product so obviously shoddy. Because of the lack of copyright agreements, modern Russian literature unfortunately came to be regarded by many publishers as a free poaching ground. There simply must be some way of reaching those publishers' consciences. There exists now in this country the National Translation Center in Austin, Tex., which has apparently solved the problem of judging the quality of literary translations competently and impartially. It probably would be willing to share its methods and its experience with publishing houses. Or is it too much to hope that American publishers will submit such unbelievable translations as we have been getting lately to someone somewhere who reads Russian and understands literature before rushing them into print and offering them in attractive packages to the defenseless American public?

volume, "A Provincial Tale," appeared in 1913 and, attracting widespread attention in pre-revolutionary Russia, launched Zamyatin's career as a writer. Akin to the later stories on Soviet Russia, it satirizes the meschanstvo—the smug provincialism and narrow Philistinism—of Old Russia. "The Lion," a short comic anecdote which ends the volume, was written while he was in exile in Paris and is less a criticism of Soviet life than a portrayal of the pathos of a simple Russian.

Among Soviet writers, Zamyatin is a master in alloying fantasy with realism. His style is often elliptical, in narrative technique frequently multi-planar and broken; usually it is controlled by recurring visual images, D. S. Mirsky's "mother images." We, of course, is written in this manner, and with these stories available, English-speaking readers will better understand that significant novel.

"A Story About the Most Important Thing"—a favorite of Zamyatin's and surely his best work after We—appears in The Dragon and illustrates his technique at its most complex. The action takes place simultaneously on three levels: a grub in a lilac bush is dying into a cocoon to be born again as a butterfly; the men of a Russian village are killing one another in the Civil War; and on a dark planet, headed for collision with the earth, the last inhabitants are dying from lack of air. The cosmic perspective underlines the futility of the Civil War.

In another story, "The Cave," the image is that of the inhabitants of frozen Petrograd as primitive cave dwellers, worshipping their god, the iron-bellied wood stove; and describes the failure of the intellectual, Martin Martynych, to transform himself into a ruthless savage able to survive those tragic days.

"The Dragon" is a story of a militiaman who dispatches "non-stop to the heavenly kingdom" an enemy of the revolution—an intellectual—and then turns to nursing a frozen starling. The militiaman's dehumanization is brilliantly caught by the image of him as a red-pawed dragon belching white puffs of smoke in the ice-locked air.

Katayev's The Holy Well is quite recent, having first appeared in the liberal Novy Mir in May, 1966. Something of Zamyatin's mixture of fantasy and realism and also his satire characterize this novel, and it has appealed to the youth of what Ernest J. Simmons has called the "Soviet New Left," who "discuss guardedly among themselves the striking proposition in the notorious contraband article of Abram Tertz (Andrei Sinyavsky)." "Right now," Sinyavsky wrote, "I put my hope in a phantasmagoric art, with hypotheses instead of a Purpose, an art in which the

Satiric Fantasies

THE DRAGON. By Yevgeny Zamyatin. Translated and edited by Mirra Ginsburg. Random House. 291 pp. $5.95.

THE HOLY WELL. By Valentin Kataev. Translated from the Russian by Max Hayward and Harold Shukman. Walker & Co. 160 pp. $4.95.

MARK H. HILLEGAS

Mr. Hillegas is professor of English at Southern Illinois University and author of The Future as Nightmare: H. G. Wells and the Anti-Utopians (Oxford University Press).

Anyone who is acquainted with Yevgeny Zamyatin's writings—notably his science-fantasy novel, We (precursor of Brave New World and Nineteen Eighty-four), and his essay, "On Literature, Revolution, and Entropy"—will remember his allegiance to the concept of infinite revolution incited by the artist-heretic, who is the "only (bitter-tasting) remedy for the entropy of human thought." Zamyatin (a Soviet critic called him the man furthest Left in Russia) was himself such a heretic; and early in the first Five Year Plan, he and Pilnyak were made scapegoats in the RAPP attack on writers who refused to accept literature as an instrument of the state. Pilnyak abjectly recanted, but Zamyatin stood firm, and, in a courageous letter (reprinted in The Dragon), asked Stalin for permission to emigrate to the West. By some miracle, he was allowed to leave and traveled to Paris in 1931, where he died a lonely exile six years later.

Valentin Katayev, likewise born before the revolution, has managed to survive, in spite of attacks by both Stalin and Khrushchev (he refers to the latter in The Holy Well as a "world-famous Russian eccentric"). Not only is he one of the least tainted with compromise of those of his generation still alive but he is also an accomplished writer: two of his novels, The Embezzlers and Lone White Sail, and a play, Squaring the Circle, are Soviet classics. From 1946-62, he was editor of the liberal monthly, Yunost (Youth), and published new writers like Yevtushenko.

Extraordinarily fascinating are the rough similarities between some of Zamyatin's stories in The Dragon and Katayev's The Holy Well: both writers are satirists, scornful of the need to conform, and both have mixed fantasy with realism. Zamyatin had a considerable influence on young writers in the twenties (Katayev is Zamyatin's junior by thirteen years); and it is possible he may continue to influence the literary underground.

All but two of Zamyatin's stories in The Dragon (others have yet to appear in English) were written between the revolution and his departure from Russia. Many, though not all, of the stories from this period in The Dragon attack the stupid regimentation and cruelty of the Soviet regime. But the first story in the grotesque will replace realistic descriptions of ordinary life."

Katayev's beautiful novel is a surrealistic dream, suggestive of a Fellini film, that takes place while the narrator, during surgery, lies unconscious under deep anesthetic. In this dream, Katayev reviews his life, from the NEP period of the twenties to his visit to America in 1962, in a series of lyrical images. Many of the personal allusions are obscure to us in the West, but every reader will understand Katayev's oblique references to his agony as an artist of integrity under pressures to conform—thus, the fantastic symbol of the talking cat, who dies trying to pronounce the Russian word "neo-colonialism."

The longest sequence of the dream deals with his visit to America, and here Katayev's criticisms are less guarded. He is fascinated by America and admires it, but sees that it has taken the "path of Rome rather than Athens." There are particularly effective sections about New York and a visit to Houston, where he stays in the push-button paradise of the Sheraton Hotel and talks, at a party, with a culture-hungry oil widow.

Katayev's satire cuts several ways, as in his conversation with the Texas widow: "And then she was thrilled as a child and even clapped her hands when I told her that I was the founder of a completely new literary school called mauvisme (from the French word for "bad"), the main point of which is that, since everybody writes so well nowadays, one must write badly, as badly as possible, and only then will one attract attention." Mauvisme is Katayev's ironic reply to the conservative critics who attacked, not only the ideology but the literary quality of his work as editor of Yunost. Like Zamyatin, he is a writer of courage and integrity.

The Fear Years

MEMOIRS: The Post-War Years: 1945-1954. By Ilya Ehrenburg. Translated by Tatiana Shebunina in collaboration with Yvonne Kapp. The World Publishing Co. 349 pp. $6.50.

JOURNEY INTO THE WHIRLWIND. By Eugenia Semyonovna Ginzburg. Translated by Paul Stevenson and Max Hayward. Harcourt, Brace & World. 418 pp. $6.95.

THE DESERTED HOUSE. By Lydia Chukovskaya. Translated by Aline B. Werth. E.P. Dutton & Co. 144 pp. $3.95.

HELEN YGLESIAS

It is to the Russians themselves that we must look for real illumination about the terror, and it is a help that more and more descriptions of their experiences are being published. Ilya Ehrenburg's Memoirs appeared in his own country as well as outside; but Lydia Chukovskaya's novel about the purge, and Eugenia Semyonovna Ginzburg's memoir of the first three of her eighteen years spent in Soviet prisons and labor camps has not yet been published there. The expressed reason was that it would be of no service to the country to dwell any longer on the period of the purges. Ehrenburg's Memoirs, Solzhenitsyn's One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, and a few others, were considered sufficiently to have covered the topic.

Yet in spite of official refusal to publish Journey Into The Whirlwind and The Deserted House, there has been no stated disapproval of their publication abroad, and both authors continue to be active in Russian intellectual circles. Mrs. Ginzburg is the wife of a high official of the Soviet Communist Party and mother of a well-known novelist, Vasily Aksyonov. She is engaged in educational work. Her memoirs (like other out-of-favor works) are passed around in typewritten form in Moscow, where she now lives.

The author of The Deserted House has not only survived its publication abroad but also the circulation of an open letter to Sholokhov castigating him for his brutally stupid statements on Sinyavsky and Daniel. Lydia Chukovskaya's father, Kornei Chukovsky, is a respected literary scholar and translator and, at 85, is still the Soviet Union's best loved author of children's verses. Chukovskaya is herself a distinguished writer and critic with many books published in the Soviet Union.

The key to their situation seems to be ambiguity, a state of being exemplified by the latest volume of Ilya Ehrenburg's Memoirs. The facts of his life are well known. If some of his stories produce mixed feelings in his readers, it is apparently discomfort he shares. Like Pasternak, Ehrenburg could quote Othello in calling attention to his service to the state, but unlike Pasternak, Ehrenburg's services were sometimes better for Stalin than for Russia. At the end of his life, with death right ahead of him and nothing to lose, he longs to make everything clear about his feeling for the horrors and beauties of the two worlds between which he divided himself—Russia and the West. If he cannot,

In the January-February issue of

RADICAL AMERICA

a journal of U.S. radicalism

- The Hazard, Ky., project and the development of the New Left
- A strategy for radical rent-strike organizing
- The nature of Debsian Socialism: James Weinstein & Paul Buhle on Decline of Socialism in America, 1912-1925
- Intellectuals in the 1930's: reviews of Josephson's Infidel in the Temple and Cowley's Think Back On Us

50c or $3/yr (6 issues)

Buhle, 1237 Spaight, Madison.

Wis. 53703

FOR INDISPENSABLE READING
On Today's World and What's to Be Done

Read THE WESTERN SOCIALIST
$1 for 6 issues $2 for 15 issues

Recent issues featured: 50 Years of Bolshevism; Chinese Cultural Revolution; Civil Rights and Civil Riots; War in the Mid-East; We Speak Out on Vietnam; How Capitalism Works; New Ferment among Youth; The U.S. Giant; Socialist Society, and Science and Socialism.

Sample copy of any above titles on request

Write to: THE WESTERN SOCIALIST
295N Huntington Ave., Rm 212,
Boston, Mass. 02115

THE WAR ON CAMPUS

A Special Issue of THE NATION
December 18, 1967

ATTENTION
STUDENT ORGANIZATIONS

Copies of this special issue can be obtained at the following bulk-order rates:

100 copies, $25; 200 copies, $40;
500 copies, $75 — plus shipping charges. Check or money order must accompany orders; shipping
charges will be billed separately.

Write: Paul Russell

The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave.,

N.Y., N.Y. 10014

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS
IN THE NATION

it is because he really understands little more about the interaction of those worlds than does Stalin's daughter. Finally, he has come no closer to a comprehension of the terror which destroyed so many of his contemporaries or the reasons for his own survival than he did in the earlier volumes: "I myself would gladly listen to the wise men capable of answering the questions that still harass me."

He disclaims any intent to write a history of the epoch following the Second World War, but in describing his work in the peace movement, touches on many of the personalities and events. As if in a school pageant, great figures of the world come forward, bow, and retire. One is reminded of Hollywood's helpless attempts to film the intellectual life. His account is not quite on the level of "Mr. Joliot-Curie, please meet Mr. Pablo Picasso," but its surface is as smooth and thin as a good veneer. One is affected by his generous enthusiasms, and reads with interest because of the extraordinary caliber of his friends, all aligned in some way with the Communist movement or the world peace movement: Picasso, Bernal, Jorge Amado, Luis Aragon, Brecht, Rafael Alberti, Nicolas Guillen, Joliot-Curie, Mazim Hikmet, Pablo Neruda, Fadayeve.

Ehrenburg can be moving about friends at home who were not as lucky as he, though his sentimentality is disquieting and disturbs any attempt to maintain a balance of belief in favor of his moral courage. He faces directly, at one point, the charge that he betrayed others:

Several years later, a journalist in Israel came out with some sensational disclosures. He said that while in prison he had met the poet Feffer who, he alleged, had told him that I was responsible for the arrest of the Jewish writers. This calumny was taken up by several Western papers. Their single-minded line of reasoning was: "He has survived, so he must be a traitor."

I at least decline to rate him on these fearful scores. Memoirs are not confessions, and it is as empty an exercise to scold Ehrenburg for lack of honesty as for insufficient political intelligence or literary genius. The Memoirs have real interest; no one studying the cultural history of the Soviet Union can pass them by, whether or not they fail to answer the tormenting question: Did there have to be a terror? For that matter, he doesn't think to ask.

Ehrenburg's target seems to have been the Western reader as much as the Russian. This may not have been the aim of Chukovskaya or Mrs. Ginzburg; but the action of their government has given them no choice but to talk to those outside Russia. The situation produces a special appeal to listen with care.

Lydia Chukovskaya wrote her novel in 1939, hid it and brought it out again after the publication of One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich, when it was refused publication. It has been widely published in other countries. In its English translation, it is a realistic and wholly believable horror story of the destruction of a loyal Soviet citizen and her son. When, in the final pages of the novel, the widow burns a request from her son to help him appeal his imprisonment, the reader has been so successfully borne along into a nightmare world as to concur in the inevitability of her monstrous act. The Deserted House has been compared to One Day in the Life; but, without denigrating its considerable artistry, it does not have the wonderfully Russian strength of Solzhenitsyn's small and powerful work. But to say that Chukovskaya's novella is a minor product of a literature which claims among other "minor" masterpieces Goncharov's Obломov and Andreyev's The Seven Who Were Hanged, is no small praise.

Mrs. Ginzburg's memoirs, Journey Into the Whirlwind, recounts her own experiences under the terror and is therefore a plainer but stronger work than The Deserted House. Like the widow in Chukovskaya's novella, Mrs. Ginzburg was an active, loyal Communist, and she and her family were torn to pieces in the purge. But what is specifically valuable in her story, because specifically Russian, is her explanation of how the insanity engulfs her and how, once caught, she does not allow herself to be destroyed. Its powerful detail adds substance to what has become a literary and political cliché, but from which we still have much to learn: the horror of the Stalinist system and the endurance of the Russian people. Besides being a beautiful lesson in the human capacity to withstand and overcome, Mrs. Ginzburg's book is full of enlightening moments, some of which lend themselves to speculative analogies.

Her book opens with the Kirov assassination. The demons which pursue her for more than twenty years of accusation, illegal trials, sentencings and imprisonment were sprung from the supposed deadly insult Kirov's death was to the Soviet state. Appealing to the passionate response of its most idealistic citizens, the regime bled its ardent supporters and devoured its children in their name. It went about its work in the old sloppy czarist tradition, too, using the old jails, the old beatings, interrogations, solitary cells, punishments, demands for self-accusation and the naming of others, exile and the work camps and death. It is as if we were to imagine a Socialist U.S., fifteen years after a revolutionary victory, in which an important revolutionary Negro leader is assassinated in, say, Atlanta. A purge is initiated and directed not against resisters to the new order but against activists of CORE, SNCC and the SCLC, basing proof of disloyalty on, let us say, whether or not one had attacked Martin Luther King during the revolutionary take-over, and using as the organs of detection and punishment the machinery of prerevolutionary anti-Negro Southern justice: jailings, beatings, sweatboxes, chain gangs, police roundups of whole communities with dogs and cattle prods, lynchings, etc., while the rest of the country goes about its business, terrified and grieving, but obedient, unquestioning and astonishingly productive.

It is this falling back on archaic oppressive institutions which shocks the most, next perhaps to the failure of the people to stop it. It would seem that the Soviet people would be most eager to comprehend the nature of these shocks; and that far from more discussion of the terror being redundant, what is specifically needed are innumerable detailed studies and analyses of the subject (many more works of the kind are refused publication). Within this discussion, everything might be asked and answered: questions having to do with economic and social justice; whether it is possible to house new equalitarian laws in the old structures; definitions of oppositions and how they

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ ANATOMY OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT by Smith Simpson (Houghton Mifflin, $5.95) $4.75
- ☐ FAMINE 1975! America's Decision: Who Will Survive? by William and Paul Paddock (Little, Brown, & Co., $6.50) $5.20
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.55
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ PRISON NOTES by Barbara Deming (Grossman, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE NEW RADICALISM by Christopher Lasch (Knopf, $6.95) $5.55

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

1-22-68

"You would have saved us from a colossal mistake," said President Kennedy.

Back in November 1960, before it was too late to prevent it, we thought Americans should know about preparations then under way for the invasion of Cuba. So we ran a story on what we knew, five months before the disaster of the Bay of Pigs.

Turner Catledge of the N.Y. TIMES told President Kennedy, a fortnight after the invasion, that

"this information had been published in LA HORA in Guatemala and in THE NATION in this country before it was ever reported in the TIMES."

President Kennedy replied to Mr. Catledge, that if the TIMES had printed more about the operation, "you would have saved us from a colossal mistake."

Does anyone listen?

A recent study published in the Columbia University FORUM suggests that the TIMES reporting on the Bay of Pigs preparations was not only too little, but too late to have any effect on what happened.

TIME magazine, as the precious weeks rolled by, printed stories pooh-poohing "Castro's tawdry little melodrama of invasion."

NEWSWEEK concluded bitterly after the event, that "the newsmen, like many others, became pawns in the intensifying conflict between Washington and Havana."

Even THE NEW REPUBLIC held up its story.

Even the President, for whom we make no excuses, was not fully or accurately informed as to the commitments and intentions of his own military and para-military establishment.

What moves Americans?

This Presidential election year of 1968, we face a mounting domestic crisis and a war in Vietnam made in America, which only the American people can end.

Most Americans don't seriously weigh and study questions of national policy. But we think Americans could be moved by issues—if they could penetrate the fog of deception in which the issues are now enwrapped.

We invite you to join the fight to move Americans on issues this year.

Needed: creative readers

We're dedicated to producing the best possible in-depth journal on national issues. It costs $10 a year and there are no cut rates.

The NATION does not have masses of readers like TIME or NEWSWEEK or the N.Y. TIMES. We serve a different function, a function that is important to democracy in crisis. It's one that demands readers who really care to know about the nation we're named for.

Our readers are important to America. We invite you to become one of them.

If you are now a subscriber, why not extend your subscription another 12 months? If you're not, will you join us? You're holding the best reason there is to do so in your hands right now. And here's a coupon to act on:

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

—I'll join you. I enclose $10 to subscribe for one year (48 issues). I understand you'll send me, free, the Columbia University FORUM report, "The Press and the Bay of Pigs."

—Please extend my subscription for 12 months and send me "The Press and the Bay of Pigs"—I'll give it to a friend if I've already got a copy. Enclosed is $10.

NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

The NATION is a weekly journal which has believed for 102 years that the quality of our national discourse shapes the quality of our national life—and that that discourse becomes more, not less vital in time of national crisis.

N 1-22

shall be allowed to function under socialism. Perhaps even man's happiness might be discussed—that goal for which (we need to be reminded) the whole revolutionary idea was dreamed up in the first place.

Book Marks

STALIN: A Political Biography. By Isaac Deutscher. Oxford University Press. 661 pp. $12.50. Paper $2.95.

A new edition of what is considered to be the definitive life of Stalin, first published in 1949. Fresh material includes an introduction to the 1961 printing, plus a new preface and an extensive closing chapter dealing with Stalin's last years.

THE YOUNG STALIN: The Early Years of an Elusive Revolutionary. By Edward Ellis Smith. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 470 pp. $8.50.

Describing the years from Stalin's birth in 1879 to his appointment by Lenin as a commissar in 1917, the author argues that Stalin was a secret agent for the Czarist secret police when he was a young revolutionary. The case, however, is not persuasively proven.

STALIN: AN APPRAISAL OF THE MAN AND HIS INFLUENCE. By Leon Trotsky. Edited and translated from the Russian by Charles Malamuth. Introduction by Bertram D. Wolfe. Stein and Day. 516 pp. $10.

A new edition of a work originally published in 1946 and out of print in English for some time. The all-embracing anti-Communist view taken by Bertram D. Wolfe in his introduction is the object of a letter of protest which was circulated by Esteban Volkov, Trotsky's grandson and literary heir.

TEN DAYS THAT SHOOK THE WORLD. By John Reed. With an introduction by John Howard Lawson. International Publishers. 395 pp. $5.95. Paper $1.95.

A new issue of a classic of American journalism.

THROUGH THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION. By Albert Rhys Williams. Introduction by Joshua Kunitz. Monthly Review Press. 311 pp. $12.50.

A new edition of another eyewitness account of the Bolshevik Revolution, including photographs, color posters and proclamations. Kunitz's introduction adds a fascinating portrait of the American author; but for the economy-minded it should be pointed out that an edition similar in every way except for the introduction has been published in the Soviet Union and can be bought for $1.85 at the Four Continent Bookshop.

THE SOVIET ACHIEVEMENT. By J. P. Nettl. Harcourt, Brace & World. 288 pp. $6.95.

One of the best short histories of the Soviet Union, and an excellent introduction to the nature of Soviet society and the forces at work behind the political façade. There is a good deal of attractive illustration—cartoons, news photos, art objects, portraits of leading Soviet personalities—much of it in color.

THE SOVIET UNION: THE FIFTY YEARS. Edited by Harrison E. Salisbury. Harcourt, Brace & World. Illustrated with photographs. 484 pp. $10.

The New York Times series written for the 50th Anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution, in book form.

UNOFFICIAL ART IN THE SOVIET UNION. By Paul Sjeklocha and Igor Mead. University of California Press. Illustrated in color and black and white. 213 pp. $15.

Biographical and stylistic accounts of a number of Soviet graphic artists, painters and sculptors working outside the official Socialist-realist style; well illustrated.

THE IMPACT OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION 1917-1967: The Influence of Bolshevism on the World Outside Russia. By the Royal Institute of International Affairs (England). Oxford University Press. 357 pp. $7.50.

A collection of disparate pieces by Arnold J. Toynbee, Neil McInnes, Hugh Seton-Watson, Peter Wiles and Richard Lowenthal. Though each essay contains material of merit, together they add up to a pointless book.

THE FIRST FIFTY YEARS: Soviet Russia 1917-67. By Ian Grey. Illustrated with photographs and maps. Coward-McCann. 558 pp. $10.

Another competent history of the Soviet Union, much longer than the one by Mr. Nettl and more conventional in its point of view. The illustrations are mainly close-up photographs of Soviet leaders.

THE BOLSHEVIK REVOLUTION: Its Impact on American Radicals, Liberals, and Labor. A Documentary Study by Philip S. Foner. International Publishers. 304 pp. $6.95.

A collection of favorable responses from trade unions, periodicals and organizations to the first three years of the revolution; illustrated with cartoons.

THE VIEW FROM LENIN HILLS: An American Student's Report on Soviet Youth in Ferment. By William Taubman. Coward-McCann. 249 pp. $5.50.

A lively, superficial first-hand report. Designed for young readers and others.

THE POLITICS OF IDEAS IN THE U.S.S.R. Edited by Robert Conquest. Frederick A. Praeger. 176 pp. $5.25.

Though this is an efficient compilation of facts tracing the development of the organs of ideological control in the Soviet Union, the material is presented with a one-sided hostility whose intent is apparently more to discredit the regime to "Western" minds than to inform.

REVOLUTION IN RUSSIA!: As Reported by the New York Tribune and the New York Herald, 1894-1921. Edited by Edward W. Pearlstien. The Viking Press. 297 pp. $10.

A collection of newspaper articles of the time of the Russian Revolution (with a connective narrative by Mr. Pearlstien) but limited to news items which appeared in the Tribune and Herald. The illustrations have been assembled from various sources.

A PORTRAIT OF ALL THE RUSSIAS. Text by Laurens Van Der Post. Photographs by Burt Glinn. William Morrow & Co. 175 pp. $12.50.

Essentially nothing new is turned up in this pleasant, readable record of a contemporary journey throughout the USSR. The photographs are handsome.

INTERNATIONAL COMMUNISM IN THE AGE OF LENIN: A Documentary History. By Helmut Gruber. Cornell University Press. 512 pp. $7.50. Fawcett Books. 512 pp. 95c paper.

Mr. Gruber's unusual book happily devotes more space to actual documents of the period than to the somewhat uneven interpretive essays which follow them. The documents range from Lenin's first major exposition of the Bolshevik position in "What Is To Be Done?" through the battles over strategy that took place in the Comintern after the end of World War I, to Zinoviev's speech in 1923 that announced the end of the Comintern's expectations for world revolution. Mr. Gruber's personal contributions are scholarly, sympathetic and informative.

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

On the many occasions when I have referred to organizations that exemplify "true Theatre" I have had to turn either to the past or to foreign instances. Today I am pleased to note that the recently established Negro Ensemble Company at the St. Marks Playhouse is, or may well become, a true Theatre. Its small permanent company has worked together in training and in performance before the rehearsals of its present and first production. It has a determined policy, its spirit is fervid, its announced choice of plays testifies to the nature and direction of its goals.

The Ensemble will offer four productions in its 1968-69 season, beginning with the current Song of the Lusitanian Bogey by Peter Weiss. Though not a conventional "play," but a social tract in a sort of cantata form with passages spoken by individuals and in chorus, dramatic interludes, sound effects, songs and interjections of straightforward information, its performance by five men, four women and four musicians creates in the end a stirring evening.

Neither the text nor the direction is "Brechtian." Brecht is a dramatist, and in this case Peter Weiss does not propose drama in the accepted sense. He has written a recital of facts concerning the Portuguese colonies (mainly Angola), written them in prose and verse which finally impose themselves by the sheer force of their factuality. Weiss's "argument," I am glad to say, is one-sided. One cannot and should not have any doubts about the barbarous cruelty and injustice of the Portuguese presence in Africa or for that matter, about any domination of one people by another. The indictment is not merely against a particular government; Weiss makes it abundantly clear that all governments, or at least all vested interests (industries, banks and certain capitalists) which are influential in their respective countries, are guilty. Ultimately we ourselves are to blame.

I doubt that the strong effect would be achieved—though the argument might still be convincing—if Weiss's text were only read. It is created by the powerful voices, the immense personal dedication of the Negro Ensemble acting company.

it is through the actors as a unit—attractive women, men strikingly virile—that the performance becomes theatre. And this acclaim should extend to the musicians and the designer, Edward Burbridge, who has made a set which resembles a tribal totem pole, modern in the vein of the new sculpture, both savage and funny. Michael Schultz has directed to give variety and tang to what may have appeared heavily static on the page. The entire evening is a statement of real force and makes me look forward to the Ensemble's next production, a play by Wole Soyinka who is more truly a poet and dramatist than is Weiss.

Man for man, the actors in the production of Shaw's Saint Joan at the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center may be superior to those of the Negro Ensemble, but the production, though by no means bad, is not of one piece. John Hirsch's direction is knowing—he understands, and generally speaking conveys, the intention of each scene and personage—yet I came from the production with little better than a reminder of what a good play Saint Joan is. It still "holds up!"

Shaw wrote wittier plays, but hardly any in which his temperament and the

RESTAURANT WORKERS (Continued from page 116)

he had missed staff meetings in 1965 or 1966, and had failed to collect initiation fees from employees (which, as an unbonded officer, he was not permitted to do), and for other imaginary or trivial offenses, Gleason was removed as business agent and, months later, expelled from the union by a Ferrara-appointed trial committee. Meanwhile, two rebel stewards were removed, the first victims in what appears to be a long-planned purge of militant stewards.

In September, 1967, before Gleason's expulsion, the rebels distributed to some of the Local 11 restaurants a leaflet reporting the McClellan subcommittee's findings and urging members to "clean up Local 11." It was just prior to one of Local 11's quarterly membership meetings and, as a result, nearly 1,000 members came to the meeting, demanding to know what was going on. Family matters kept Gleason from the meeting, and the rebels concentrated in the Walgreen's chain were told by the company, a few days before, that they must remain on their jobs until 4 P.M., thus virtually barring them from the meeting which began at 3 o'clock. Ferrara, in the chair, allowed no discussion at all. And when the rebels from Walgreen's arrived shortly after, he hastily adjourned the meeting. But several of the Walgreen people, including former board members Joe Donnelly and Mary Flynn, jumped onto chairs and harangued the members. And that is how one of the newest and liveliest rank-and-file rebel movements began.

At the meeting, Ferrara's lieutenants distributed a leaflet in which he and they were "proud to report, without any qualification" that everything in the rebels' leaflet was a lie: "there is absolutely not one single charge of any description now pending or ever made in the past, by any agency, against any officer of Local 11." A few days later the rebels countered with a mimeographed leaflet pointing out that, at that very moment, hearings were going on in the New York State Insurance Department on the department's charges against the fund's fourteen trustees, seven of whom are Local 11 officials, and against the fund's administrator, a Local 11 business agent, alleging fund depletion. They added the news that the McClellan subcommittee had found the administrator (and business agent) "guilty of gross irregularities and improprieties" and of "a complete disregard of the fiduciary responsibilities of [his] office," and recommended that he "should be summarily removed."

These are only the opening guns in what promises to be a bitterly fought battle between Ferrara's regime and the insurgent rank-and-filers. The battle is long overdue and its outcome is unclear. It is apparent, however, that the parent international, the Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO, stands stoutly behind Ferrara; the members' appeals to the general president and general executive board have fallen on deaf ears. That was only to be expected—nowadays, when workers fight for democratic unionism, they almost invariably find themselves fighting not only against the employers but against the bureaucratic powers of the trade union establishment. It makes their struggle that much harder, and that much more urgent.

material furnished him by history were so happily conjoined. In Saint Joan Shaw revealed something of the child that was in him, for all his cleverness and intellectual capacities, together with the tremendously earnest, understanding and honest puritan he was. The puckish, shrewd and yet somehow "artless" child in Shaw contributes as much as do his ideas to converting his forensics into theatre. An innocence in the playfulness

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

Read THE NATIONAL CALL—For Dissenters United. A psychological and philosophical approach. For sample copy send stamped envelope. Box 281, Marietta, Ohio 45750

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers. 111 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on President Johnson to require that during the gold crisis, certain countries should be required to keep the gold in U.S.A. and spend it here.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

1-22-68

111 7th Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

of Shaw's works preserves them against the possible decay of their preachment. And in Joan herself—the image her story evokes in our minds—Shaw found a character ideally suited to his courage, persistence, his certainty of being in the right, his swift and forthright disputatiousness. Like the Joan he portrays, Shaw commands esteem through a candid common sense akin to a mystical trust in life and human destiny. Even Shaw's sexlessness reinforces one's intuition that the dramatist's union with Joan was a blessed one.

A few adults may demur at certain aspects of the play (the first scene, for example, strains toward farce), but youngsters and the pure of heart will always respond to it. If you have never before seen it you should certainly see it now, and if you have seen it before—as I have countless times—you will still like it a lot. I say so at this point because I must now proceed to another phase of my critical duty.

The setting for Saint Joan by David Hays has a background of slim metal columns circularly arranged. Their height suggests both a cathedral loftiness and the steeliness of medieval warfare. The forestage, where all the action must take place if it is to be fully visible, consists of a number of polished platforms of uneven thicknesses and dimensions. The main properties (throne, table, chairs, etc.) are put in place by costumed supernumeraries. In brief, the setting has a fitting bareness and yet seems to serve the play rather meagerly as a machine for action and as atmosphere. I was aware of "scenery" with a touch of spurious modernity.

Michael Annals' costumes are extremely good-looking, but they are more like plates from an illustrated book of period design than clothes. They are too gleamingly new and rich. The effect is that of a dress parade, and Joan's costume in the cathedral scene is wholly unflattering to the actress' figure—especially in relation to her head.

Diana Sands's Joan has its moments. She is superb in her breakdown during the trial scene and most powerful—gutsy rather than exalted—in her denunciation of the sentence to imprisonment following her recantation. In those passages the actress is wholly in her element. But her speech has not the sharp, crisp stamp of Shavian rhetoric. (Joan was no peasant, the dramatist takes pains to tell us, but a bourgeoisie.) Miss Sands's manner of address is that of a perky maid and not of Shaw's heroic and highly articulate Maid, who at all times speaks the splendidly sane prose of a great statesman. (The play falls short of greatness because the writing, though wonderfully lucid, rarely rises to the pitch of poetry.) Miss Sands fails to achieve the cleansing nakedness and proud loneliness when, after the Coronation, the Crown, the Church and the big brass abandon her.

Of all the Joans I have seen, only two seemed to me thoroughly adequate to the challenge of the part. One was that of an actress in Israel, a gentile German girl who had fought in the underground against Hitler and later in the various Israeli struggles; the other was Sybil Thorndike in the first London production. (She was a Fabian Socialist, with some of the wholesome asperity of Shaw himself.)

I mention these actresses not to depreciate the performance of Miss Sands, whose qualities of vibrant strength and pluck I admire and whose undertaking of her present role constitutes a step forward in her development but to emphasize what I have already said about the Negro Ensemble and true Theatre in general.

If a production—especially its acting—is to achieve an artistically communicative entity, it must not only be professionally adept or an assemblage of outstanding talents; it must be lit by a moral energy, a fire that transmutes these talents to a new consistency of idea and belief. That is what gives great theatre its ritual significance. It was present in the early days of the Moscow Art Theatre, in the Berliner Ensemble, in the finer work of the Group Theatre. One also sees it occasionally in a musical where the identification of a homogeneous cast with the material dealt with composes all the details into an exhilarating meaning. Some people found it in Oh, What A Lovely War and a few of Joan Littlewood's other productions in London's Theatre Royal at Stratford East. It happens now, as I have indicated, in the Song of the Lusitanian Bogey.

It does not happen in Saint Joan because that is not the product of a true Theatre—an aesthetically or ideologically unified company. Yet a word of praise should be said for several of the cast: for the humor of Edward Zang's Dauphin, the pleasant personalities of William Hutt as the Earl of Warwick and of Philip Bosco as Dunois (though both performances are too soft, lacking the soldier's mettle). Mention too should be made of the "masks," voices and demeanor of Tony Van Bridge as Cauchon, Roger De Koven as the Archbishop, John Heffernan as the Inquisitor, Stephen Joyce as Brother Martin. All these, together with the direction, the sets, the costumes, may be accorded some degree of credit, but they do not fuse. Missing is the overall passion of an organic theatre idea to contain and inspire them. For this reason they are not capable of winning our inner assent and are sustained only by the substance of Shaw's capital play.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1233

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Would you expect to see this dog beat your favorite? (7)
- 5 The battle of the sausages? (7)
- 9 A parallel case. (7)
- 11 German city for an essayist? (5)
- 12 and 15 down. Demand for payment able to make one like a king—though his reign was suddenly ended. (6)
- 13 Worn across and dug back. (5)
- 14 Such a scene as Indians found? (7)
- 16 What the sergeant does to the squad again for social improvement? (7)
- 18 More like salad days. (7)
- 21 Digs—with the spur, too. (7)
- 24 Set up a 27 across, possibly. (5)
- 26 See 17 down
- 27 A rich mixture, but it can hold you for a while. (5)
- 28 One takes the same circle six times. (7)
- 29 See 17 down
- 30 One shouldn't have nightmares in them, though they might be made up often. (7)
- 31 Put on the king's 27 across. (7)

DOWN:

- 1 The war's broken out, and some decorations are in order. (7)
- 2 Mendelssohn's Fourth. (7)
- 4 and 10 across One didn't augur well for it. (3,4,2,5)
- 5 He seemed to have a little initial confusion, but one sometimes manages to stir things up. (7)
- 6 An unusual medal for the disabled. (5)

- 7 Ancient on the sea, modern in the sky.
- 8 Contrives. (7)
- 15 See 12 across
- 17, 26 and 29 across. In order to get central power, it shows imposingness. (13)
- 18 Ray might have acted this way. (7)
- 19 At last on board the final curtain does. (3,4)
- 20 A little line around the digit does, reputedly. (7)
- 21 What they did to get more men in the army, necessary for fire power at home?
- 22 One of the things audiences are likely to have to stand for. (7)
- 23 The old form in a violin would seem found away from the course. (7)
- 25 and 3 down. The Emporia Gazette—or just a governmental justification of it? (5,5)
- 27 One used to indicate things were going well—now one suspects he might be unhappy. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1232

ACROSS: 1 Parts of Speech; 10 Malta; 11 Performer; 12 Senescent; 13 Holds; 14 and 22 across Construction paper; 19 Al-literation; 24 Transmute; 25 Charivari; 26 Ideal; 27 Chrysanthemum. DOWN: 2 Ail-ing; 3 Transport; 4 Oppressor; 5 Sprat; 6 Epoch; 7 Complain; 8 Amish; 9 Prisons; 15 Ritualist; 16 Crosswise; 17 Tampico; 18 Slapdash; 20 Bureau; 21 Peels; 23 Rainy; 24 Tiara.

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 44 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

ATTRACTIVE, active, intelligent people in New York City, over 30 and single, can be very alone and lonesome. Men with no women they like to take out. Women with no men they wish to have ask them for a date. Now, goodbye to all that. TWO-gether Associates, Inc. puts mature, cultured New Yorkers of opposite sex into touch with each other. (Swingers and wild ones forget about it!) Write: TWO-gether Associates Inc., Dept. TN, 38 E. 57 St., N.Y., N.Y. 10022

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

MAKE LOVE NOT WAR

Metal, 2 kinds/$2; Peace Bumper Strips, 12 kinds/$2; Pencils, 7 kinds/25¢-1; Hoffa for President & Impeach Johnson disc & rulers, 12/$1, 100/$5. Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151

McCarthy in '68, Reagan & Lassie in '68, Johnson for Ex-President RFK in '68, Dump Johnson in '68, Kill for Peace king-size bumper strips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802, Chicago, Illinois 60690

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)

"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE

Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 28 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

DISCUSSION GROUP meets weekly, members' homes, Manhattan. Vital, controversial issues of Human Relations, Politics, Psychology, Religion. All viewpoints represented. High I.Q., articulateness, requisites. CA 8-9663

PHYSICIAN AND LAYMAN wanted in Vietnam to select war-injured children for evacuation to U.S. for surgery. Minimum 6 months each. Adequate stipend. Contact Mrs. Smith, Committee of Responsibility, 60 Madison Avenue, N.Y.C. (212) 889-4210

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Election Year Special:

For a dime a week, join "the subscription list that reads like a who's who of Washington?"

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Controversy—not "consensus"—in articles like these...

"No more Nonsense About Ghetto Education!"
by Joseph Alsop.

"Nixon's Return Engagement"
by Gilbert A. Harrison.

"What Ails America?"
by Hans Morgenthau.

"Hitched to LBJ?"
by The Editors.

"Walt Whitman Rostow"
by Alex Campbell.

"Limits of the New Left"
by Christopher Jencks.

"Freak-Out in Chicago"
by James Ridgeway.

"Who's to be Born?"
by Robert Coles.

"Harlow in Hell"
by Richard Gilman.

"Pooh as GOP Candidate"
by Henry Fairlie.

"Scar-Spangled Banner"
by Stanley Kauffmann.

Continuing Coverage of
the Drug Scene
by David Sanford.

"Albee at the Crossroads"
by Robert Brustein

...and regular features like these

- TRB's weekly comment
on the Washington scene
- Stanley Kauffmann
on films
- Robert Brustein on drama
- Osborn, Mauldin, and
Feiffer cartoons

Newsweek said it, describing New Republic readers. Describing The New Republic itself, Esquire said, "it can still be counted on for meaningful outrage." The New Republic gets talked about, even by other magazines.

We'll probably stir up more talk this election year. Seldom have we had so much to be outraged about.

New Republic readers know that from now through November they'll get fiercely independent, often angry, opinion on LBJ, Nixon, Bobby, Rocky, Barry, Ronnie, Romney, and company—opinion they can get nowhere else. And they'll get behind-the-scenes reporting of facts they can get nowhere else, too. (Esquire went on to say about us, "Their sources are excellent, credibility high.")

Since, frankly, we'd like as many voters as possible to get as mad as we are, we are making what could be called a meaningfully outrageous Election Year offer—48 issues of The New Republic at half the usual subscription price.

If you accept this offer, you'll be covered through election day and into the all-important post-mortems. And not only will you keep on top of the campaign, you'll keep on top of all the other meaningful things going on—in Vietnam, the Black Power movement, our cities... in what's left of the anti-poverty program... as well as in the world of books, films, plays, art, and music.

Our hope is that you'll get mad with us. But if you get mad at us, judging from what Newsweek said about our subscription list, you'll be in good company. Either way, there never was a better time to start getting mad at somebody—about something important.

1/2 PRICE:

ELECTION YEAR
SUBSCRIPTIONS
48 Issues—Just $5.00—
1/2 Regular Yearly Rate

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Subscription Dept., Box 524
381 West Center St., Marion, Ohio 43302

☐ O.K., New Republic, I'll join you this Election Year. Send the next 48 issues (a full year's subscription) for just $5.00 (½ the regular subscription price; a saving of $14.20 on the newsstand price).

☐ Let me first see what gets everybody so excited. Send the next 18 issues for just $2.00 (my check is enclosed).

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

CALIFORNIA'S FOUR PARTIES PHIL KERBY

THE NATION

JANUARY 29, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JAN 29 1968
LIBRARY

Johnson's Problem

THE IMAGE IS THE ISSUE

TED LEWIS

The Draft as Punishment

TRIAL BY HERSHEY

PETER W. MARTIN

Thieu and Ky

The Rivalry of Puppets

TRAN VAN DINH

Debray: ABC for Revolution

EQBAL AHMAD

Virginia Woolf, Uncommon Reader

MARY ELLMANN

S-21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
-LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

restoring the alternative

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I agree very much with Eldon Kenworthy's conclusion [in "Calculus for '68"; The Nation, Jan. 8] that the only feasible way to change our present policies in Vietnam to a course with greater possibilities for ending this conflict is by denying Lyndon B. Johnson a second term as President. It is to this end that those people who dissent from Johnson's policies should work.

Mr. Kenworthy's analysis that only the Republicans will be able to turn Mr. Johnson out of office in 1968 is also valid, in my opinion. Since early in 1967 I have been counseling my fellow Republicans that it is the responsibility of the GOP to offer American voters a genuine alternative to Vietnam and Lyndon Johnson. We must not nominate a candidate who promises only to out-Johnson Johnson in pursuing the war.

Finally, Mr. Kenworthy's suggestion that the Republican candidate emphasize the very real domestic crises that Vietnam has precipitated is basically sound. It would be quite risky for the Republican nominee to attempt to offer a specific course of action in Vietnam that he would be forced to spend a great deal of time defending. It would be more prudent—and more responsible—for the GOP candidate to talk, not in detailed terms of his "Vietnam blueprint" but in terms of his basic approach and broad strategy regarding this issue.

Mark O. Hatfield
United States Senator

Lexington, Mass.

DEAR SIR: I emerge from a reading of Eldon Kenworthy's realistic-idealistic intricacies of resistance-inside-of-political action on Vietnam with the hope that The Nation is still making some progress, if reluctantly, toward giving its wholehearted blessing to the resistance movement. For what it's worth, the undersigned is a reader of nearly forty years' standing who thinks purely political action incapable of dealing with this problem; who thinks Vietnam should not be dealt with in purely tactical terms, in detachment from all our other sicknesses. . . .

In a period like the present one, in which we are trying as best we can to pick up some wreckage from the New Deal and post-New Deal compromisers (see Christopher Lasch's "The Cultural Cold War," The Nation, Sept. 10, 1967). I would like to see The Nation adopt a position less completely accepting of the formal democratic political process as a way of reforming our deeply pathological society. . . .

Armand Siegel

For The Nation's position on politics vs. resistance, see "Protest, Power and the Future of Politics," by Carey McWilliams in the issue of Jan. 15.

—Editors

correction

An editorial in the issue of Dec. 25, "The Dead Horse Walks Again," referred to a recent analysis of American Indian views, and recommendations as the Walker-Rigsby report.

This study appeared in the Northwest Anthropological Research Notes, of which Professors Walker and Rigsby are editors, but the paper in question was the work of Prof. Deward E. Walker, Jr., alone.

EDITORIALS

'A Certain Restlessness'

The State of the Union message reflects, of course, the President's familiar political cunning. He has so structured the political situation as to place the Republican legislators on the defensive—or so he hopes. In terms of legislative proposals, however, the message offered only a little more of the same, with few surprises and no new spectaculars. In the present context, the President's requests for domestic programs will strike few sparks in Congress and indeed this was not the intention; the requests were mostly "words," devoid of content, spoken for effect. The new-found interest in consumer legislation is an example of the President's fondness for the inexpensive gesture. His proposal to free the nation's gold reserves, if belated, is well taken, but it is not of major significance. His renewed request for the surtax increase, like most of the other requests, is not likely to be honored by a conservative Congress operating in the shadow of the November elections.

But what is truly saddening about the message is its general tone. Traditionally, State of the Union messages are supposed to point a direction, to inspire a response, to demonstrate real understanding of present conditions and a sound feeling for the future. As an essay in leadership, the President's message was more than inadequate; it was embarrassing in its lack of insight, its indifference to human problems, and in the degree to which it failed to reflect the qualities of the moral imagination. Vietnam was dismissed briefly, almost casually, with perhaps a hint that something might be happening on the diplomatic front. The decline in American prestige was bypassed as though it did not exist. Mr. Johnson's remarks about civil rights, greeted in stony silence, were offered in such a half-hearted manner as almost to invite repeal or weakening of existing legislation. The "model cities" proposal was largely window dressing. Here again, as Mayor John V. Lindsay pointed out in a follow-up comment on N.B.C., the President's failure to reflect real personal concern, a sense of urgency, about the cities was more distressing than the inadequacy of what he proposed or what he failed to recommend.

The yells of approval that greeted his "crime in the streets" and "safe streets" talk is a clear indication of the tactics that will be used this summer and of his intention to exploit the issue to the fullest possible extent. Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, trying to be loyal, could not disguise his sense of dismay, while Floyd McKissick of CORE characterized the speech as "sad" and pointed to the failure—and it was here that the failure of moral imagination was most evident—of the President even to recognize the existence of the Negro as a human being, with problems, concerns, feelings. There was talk about JSD and mention of the redwoods, but no words of solace or encouragement for the Negro. "Gun control" was advocated, casually, but as Mr. McKissick said, "guns do not kill people: people kill people." No attempt was made to rally the nation in support of human rights.

January 29, 1968

EDITORIALS

130

ARTICLES

- 134 Johnson's Problem:
The Image Is the Issue

Ted Lewis

- 136 Thieu and Ky:
The Rivalry of Puppets

Tran Van Dinh

- 139 The Draft as Punishment:
Trial by Hershey

Peter W. Martin

- 143 From Peace to Wallace:
California Runs the Gamut

Phil Kerby

- 146 The Black Hessians

Charles R. Eisendrath

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 149 Primer for Revolutionary Guerrillas Eqbal Ahmad
153 A Most Uncommon Reader Mary Ellmann
154 Visions of Black Genocide Shaun O'Connell
155 Theatre Harold Clurman
156 Films Robert Hatch
157 Records Benjamin Boretz
159 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, MICHAEL GOLDMAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for mail addresses.

Information ■ Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide ■ Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and ■ Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206
No. 5

131

Commentators have suggested that the President attempted to fit the message to the mood of the country. If he succeeded, then the country is in deeper trouble than The Nation has suggested. Actually, the President did not respond to the mood of the country, he smirked at it. If the nation is troubled, he is not. He did not challenge the national conscience: he sought to appease it by catering to the lowest common denominators of self-interest. The nation is deeply troubled and sharply divided; the President's own advisers have eloquently attested to the malaise that exists. Yet all he could find to say was to regret the existence of "a certain restlessness." The address was elaborately casual, as though to quiet concerns and discontents, but it was also tired, lifeless, devoid of ideas, barren of new initiatives, unresponsive both to the needs and the mood of the country. A sad speech in a troubled time.

Debasing the Presidency

In this issue Ted Lewis, head of the Washington bureau of the New York Daily News and one of the country's ablest and most experienced political observers, says, quite correctly, that the issue in 1968 is Johnson—Johnson the man, "the burden of himself." Lewis also says, with equal cogency, that the potential tragedy of the situation is that if Mr. Johnson is renominated and re-elected—as well may happen—the result will not settle the issue of Johnson. The divisions cut too deep, the distrust cannot be overcome, the confidence cannot be restored. The country would still be divided.

Indeed, the situation might get worse, for if Mr. Johnson is returned to office his lesions of character could become even more obtrusive. As long as he looks forward to another term, he is under a degree of restraint. But barred by law from a third try, his unique combination of brutality of word and action with resentment of criticism might impel him to reckless extremes, particularly if events put an even greater strain on his temper. And that is perfectly possible. The current explosion in Guatemala is a warning that Vietnam is not the only place in the world where American power might be challenged and frustrated.

Another frame of reference within which Mr. Johnson may be judged is suggested with acute insight by Doris Fleson. Americans, she points out, have long regarded the Presidency as "a symbol of their best aspirations as well as of American national power." Unlike the Germans under Hitler, naked power does not make the majority of Americans happy. Power must be exerted in some moral guise. Mr. Johnson senses this and tries to meet the need, but his efforts are so crude that the pretense fails. The people want the President to be a better man than they know themselves to be, Miss Fleson goes on, but his actions, and his manners, make it impossible for the average sensible American to believe in Mr. Johnson's superiority.

Thus the Presidency has been damaged as a symbol; it has been "manhandled." Instead of exalted performance in an exalted office, Mr. Johnson has brought to it a hateful wheeler-dealer image. His handling of foreign affairs has been in the style of Texas politics—bad enough within that state, but intolerable when applied internationally. One of its results is the “credibility gap,” which is simply a squeamish way of saying that the President’s word cannot be trusted. Such exhibitions as the one in Manila when he said that we could begin to withdraw our troops in large increments within six months after North Vietnam stopped infiltrating and pulled its troops back from South Vietnam, have been reported too often. Of this statement, R. W. Apple, Jr., of The New York Times has said: “I literally do not know a responsible American officer in South Vietnam . . . who thinks that this could conceivably be done.” LBJ is not such a fool as to have believed what he said. All he was interested in was the immediate headline effect, but the voters’ memories, though short, are not that short, nor are reporters lacking to remind them of the President’s irresponsibility in such matters.

His showmanship is as faulty as his credibility. Again, the lowest common denominator is not that low, nor is the Presidency a television show. Antics like taking off from Karachi without knowing where his next stop would be on the gratuitous trip around the world which began with the Holt funeral, the arm twisting which is one of his favorite devices, the symbolic castration of close aides, the fulsome self-congratulations on his appointments, are examples of the Johnson technique.

The President is a political leader, and no President can afford to forget the fact for long, but there are limits of decency even in that duality. When it comes to questions of war and peace, the President must rise above politics—that, indeed, is the theory of bipartisanship. When the theory collides with practice like that of Mr. Johnson’s, the theory becomes invalid. It has been invalid since Mr. Johnson began to escalate in Vietnam. He has made the war a personal political instrument. The Associated Press reports that Bronson P. Clark, coordinator of the Friends Service Committee effort in Vietnam, said on his return: “It is readily admitted—especially by the military above the rank of colonel—that objective No. 1 is the re-election of the President.” To the same effect, in a January 1 story in The New York Times, Apple says that Americans in Vietnam are under pressure to produce good news about the war to help the President politically, “even though the news is often in conflict with the realities.”

The President’s character is inseparably related to his demeaning of the Presidency. But to attack him solely, or primarily, on the basis of his character might offend the proprieties. The issue of respect for the Presidency is as impersonal as any issue can be under the circumstances. It is ready-made for Senator McCarthy and everyone who sees what is at stake.

How About It, Mr. Meany?

Toward the middle of January, the Saigon authorities broke a strike of electrical workers by rounding up the strikers at gunpoint and forcing them to resume work. Even Saigon’s normally tame newspapers could not quite stomach this action. One paper called the arrest of the strike leaders “unjustified” and “incomprehensible.” Longshoremen at the commercial port of Saigon (the military port is farther up the river) struck in sympathy. American soldiers were sent to unload the ships.

The background of these labor conflicts is interesting. On January 1, the Saigon government took over the property of the French company which supplied most of Saigon’s power. The French Compagnie des Eaux et d’Electricité d’Indochine was paid $8 million, half in blocked piaster accounts and half in hard currency to stockholders in Europe. (In the long run the U.S. taxpayer will foot the bill, but that is incidental.) The workers did not fare as well as the stockholders. The French company had paid wages three or four times what the Saigon government was willing to grant. That was what the electrical strike was about.

George Meany should take note of these proceedings. At last year’s AFL-CIO meeting he said: “There is one overriding fact about the Vietnam issue that is and must be the primary concern of the AFL-CIO—the existence in South Vietnam of a genuine free trade union movement. The Confederation of Vietnam Workers (CVT) is a growing and vigorous movement, representing some 500,000 workers. Its structure, goals and ideals are much like our own. It looks to the AFL-CIO for counsel and support.”

What counsel? What support? Here is Mr. Meany’s chance to show that he means business.

The Pressures Mount

Our inability to read the signals from Hanoi points not to any obscurity on the transmitting end but to a severe hearing loss on the part of the receiver. To everyone but the Administration the signal is loud and clear: Hanoi will negotiate if the bombing stops. It was repeated in Paris so that there could be no mistake this time, and issued by Hanoi in three languages, including English, just in case Washington was short-handed on translators. But we still don’t get it.

Where does this leave the President, after all his rhetoric about going anywhere to talk peace? If it is Hanoi’s purpose to embarrass the President at the beginning of an election year, it has succeeded. If its purpose is to negotiate for peace (and it may well be both) the move is likewise adroit and well timed. Sen. John Sherman Cooper promptly warned the Administration that if the United States did not stop the bombing to test the sincerity of Hanoi’s willingness to bargain, “a chance for peace will be lost.” Senator Cooper expressed irritation at the pretense of a continuing search for clarification. Sen. Robert F. Kennedy conducted an impromptu poll at the annual dinner of the Rochester (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce. When he asked whether that conservative audience favored a halt to the bombing, an “overwhelming majority” raised their hands. J. Anthony Lukas, covering the event for The New York Times, estimated that supporters of the President’s present policy numbered not more than thirty or forty out of approximately 700 diners.

The Catholic bishops of South Vietnam, representing the sect which has been most aggressive in prosecuting the war, have issued a plea for peace, combined with a scathing denunciation of South Vietnamese officialdom. They were following the Vatican's lead, but voicing their own views as well; no national group of bishops is obliged to act as a sounding board for the Pope. Even West Germany is becoming critical of our standpat attitude. George Romney, campaigning in New Hampshire, struck a sensible note in calling for a neutralized Southeast Asia. Senators Mansfield and Ribicoff put renewed pressure on the Administration. Senator McCarthy, the chief dissident, quoted John F. Kennedy: "This nation will never negotiate out of fear, but it will never fear to negotiate." A more all-embracing call for a prompt and favorable response to Hanoi's statement can hardly be imagined.

But there are strong inertial forces on the standpat side. The military are professionally opposed to negotiation. Whenever the enemy makes overtures, our generals will declare that he must be hurting, so why should we negotiate? Then there are the South Vietnamese generals, for whom peace would be a calamity. By calling for continuation of the bombing and warning the Johnson Administration that they, as the elected government of South Vietnam, have the right of veto over any contemplated negotiations with North Vietnam or the National Liberation Front, they are also putting on a show of independence, the more necessary because everyone knows that financially and militarily they are what Hanoi calls them—puppets.

At this juncture Hanoi could make intransigence still more difficult for the Administration by using the 600 American airmen it holds prisoner. It could offer to exchange them for an end to the bombing; it could even release them unconditionally. That is perhaps too much to expect, but it might be a brilliant stroke.

Murder, CIA Style

The typical U.S. newspaper reader, radio listener or TV viewer has a clear image of the Vietcong in his mind. They are little brown devils who not only ambush our troops but descend in dark of night on villages to murder innocent peasants and their families. We and our allies, on the other hand, are assumed to be fighting a clean war, with the Marines cuddling little children when not engaged in combat. Possibly this complacent American has seen pictures of Vietcong, or suspects, being tortured by our South Vietnamese confreres, but in recent months nothing so disturbing has appeared on U.S. TV; either the torture has stopped or the cameramen have switched to more agreeable subjects.

Or—another possibility—the techniques have now been so improved that there is nothing to photograph. Ronald Ross, the Far East correspondent of the Minneapolis Tribune in a feature article (December 31) titled "Allies Launch Effort to Capture, Kill Viet Cong Leaders," raises the suspicion that the war is just as dirty on the American side—maybe dirtier.

The organization which performs this laudable work is code-named ICEX—Intelligence Coordination and Exploitation. The last word is a euphemism—the exploitation is extermination. The program is carried on jointly by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and the Saigon government, with the CIA (who else?) providing most of the funds and some of the personnel. The EX-part of ICEX is carried out by "provincial reconnaissance units" (another euphemism), composed mainly of Vietnamese but trained, advised and sometimes led by Americans drawn from the Special Forces, the CIA and other counterinsurgency groups. In the province of Long An alone, some 400 PRU "exploiters" are operating in teams of about twenty men. In Quang Tri, ICEX works in cooperation with the U.S. Marines. Forty Vietcong leaders are said to be on the Quang Tri list for elimination, and Ross's contacts assured him that highly satisfactory results are being secured.

One type of operation is on the humane side. A jet is sent over a village to break the sound barrier and get attention. Then a speaker plane flies over and names the man wanted. An American "adviser" explained to Ross that the hamlet is told that unless the man gives himself up within four hours "we are going in with flame throwers and demolitions." In a recent operation of this type five men surrendered and, according to established procedures, should have gone to a "rehabilitation" center; but something went wrong and they were turned over to the Vietnamese for "imprisonment."

More typical, however, are teams which enter a sleeping village and do their work as hired killers. In Quang Tri a typical fee might be 15,000 piasters (about $125), which is sumptuous pay by Vietnamese standards. The victims are selected by intelligence gathered from many sources—police agents, paid informers, defectors, "interrogation reports" (that could be still another euphemism), captured documents, etc. The size of the operation may be gauged from the organizations involved on the U.S. side: besides the CIA and the military, they include a new "pacification" outfit with the mouth-filling name of "Military Assistance Civil Operations Revolutionary Development Support" (MACORDS) and field personnel of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the U.S. Information Service. In short, just about anybody is made welcome who wants to get into the act, for love or money.

"In an earlier program," Ross writes, "the PRU's predecessors, known then as counter-terrorist teams, fell into the hands of brutally unscrupulous district and province chiefs and were used to eliminate personal enemies and not the Viet Cong." The Tribune article comments: "With hundreds of these teams of assassins running over the Vietnamese countryside, American intelligence officials are going to keep a very close watch on their activities."

This would seem to be a large order, calling for unusual zeal and perspicacity. But why worry? An occasional mistake is not too serious; the victims are Vietnamese in any case. However, one little precaution might be in order for the home folks: the next time they hear of a Vietcong atrocity, they might reflect that while it may be just that, it also might be a counter-atrocity.

THE IMAGE IS THE ISSUE

TED LEWIS

Mr. Lewis is head of the Washington bureau of the New York Daily News.

As this Presidential election year begins, virtually all the political experts of press and television are raking up the past to predict the future. It amounts to a most boring preoccupation with traditional rituals—a magnification of the importance of Presidential primaries and a tremendous amount of guff about how hard it is to beat an incumbent President—plus yards of statistical nonsense, including how a Wallace third party could throw the election into the House of Representatives for a decision.

Traditional rituals and traditional interpretations, which may have been significant in other campaigns, divert attention from the fact that this election year is absolutely untypical. Thus right now everyone is casting horoscopes on the March 12 New Hampshire primary. An easy prediction is that should Richard M. Nixon win the Republican preferential contest he will have a bandwagon rolling toward the party's Presidential nomination in August; and a similarly firm estimate is that the selection of Johnson-plugged delegates by New Hampshire Democrats will mean that the anti-LBJ movement led by Sen. Eugene McCarthy has wholly petered out.

Advance estimates of this sort go hand in hand with other conclusions, based, often not too securely, on performances in other Presidential nominating and electing years. Forecasts, for example, of what will be the sentiment of the delegates in August are based on previous records, and on appraisals of their Presidential preferences this winter.

The truth about this national election year makes that diet of political trivia even less nourishing than usual. We are all about to experience, for the first time in our lives, or in the life of the nation, an election that hinges almost totally on one simple but dramatically intoxicating issue—the personality of the incumbent President.

It is a tragic issue from the viewpoint of national well-being. Hate is un-Christian, yet it is there. So, for worse rather than for better, far deeper human prejudices will figure in next November's voting than did ideological prejudices taint the Goldwater campaign of 1964. If the country in November detests Johnson, he will lose regardless of the Presidential caliber of his GOP opponent. If the dislike—or distrust—is more moderate, he could win, since what he has done might then balance off what he is. No ready historical analogies are pertinent to this issue of image. It can be compared only superficially with the distrust, dislike and disgust that worked against Herbert Hoover in 1932. That thumbs-down vote was far less personalized.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

The issue of Johnson's image overwhelms the significance of the scattered state primaries, the preliminary stage strutting of Nixon, Romney, Reagan and Percy, or prognostications of any kind as to what the GOP national convention will do. One reason why the issue is basic, and not superficial as with Hoover thirty-six years ago, is that now there is television, whereas then there was only radio. The face as well as the voice of the President are almost daily with us. It used to be that what a President said was more important than how he looked when he said it. There were some advantages in that. Issues involving the economy, foreign affairs, and the fine distinctions between a social welfare state and benevolent capitalism could be explored by an electorate that was perhaps uncertain, but at least not distracted by trying to assess a candidate's sincerity on the basis of his physical presence.

In other years the personal image of the President was blurred. And because it was blurred, any national antipathy toward him personally lacked total venom. The exact opposite is now true. Those who dislike Johnson, the man, nurse their prejudices by television. Looking at him, they are irritated by the pursed lips, the moving eyes, the restless hands. Even those more tolerant tend to assess him on a personal basis. Each dulcet, each commanding phrase is thus measured by millions as to the depth of its honesty and the sincerity of its expression.

So 1968 presents a real political phenomenon in a national campaign, a phenomenon tritely referred to as the complex character of Mr. Johnson. There have been controversial Presidents before, as in the instances of Lincoln, Hoover and Franklin D. Roosevelt; but while they were hated by some, they induced affection and loyalty in others. That is not so with Mr. Johnson.

Yet despite the burden of himself which the President must bear in this campaign, we are fed the cliché that it is very hard to beat an incumbent President who seeks a second term. Especially, the pundits always add, when times are good and a war is on. There are two bases for this alleged built-in advantage: first, the party in power customarily has great organizational strength, is well fed financially and filled with loyal workers; second, the White House rostrum being unequaled, a President can pose the national issues to fit his campaign.

Neither of these suppositions holds water this year. The Democratic Party's political apparatus has been allowed to degenerate in favor of one-man control, and Mr. Johnson cannot twist issues for political advantage without at the same time widening his own credibility gap. As for prosperity, it has become commonplace. The voter no longer gives a party credit for bringing it about, but he blames the party in power when inflation becomes a boom-time problem. As for the war, the issue is inextricably braided into the issue of the President's image, for it is his handling of the Vietnamese conflict that is primarily controversial.

Despite the almost transparent vulnerability of the Democratic President students of politics insist that Johnson is strategically in the best position to win in 1968. Max Lerner, in a column baldly headed "The Virtuoso," repeats that tired appraisal of Johnson as the superb politician of the current national scene. Who of those mentioned among the Republicans, asks Lerner, is capable of conquering the smartest political operator of our time?

Nevertheless, the primary issue this year almost totally involves the personal attributes and flaws of one man. It is at the heart of the dump-Johnson movement in the President's own party. Similarly, the main source of the Republican Party's strength is anti-Johnson sentiment. Hence the thrust of the voting in November will be "agin" Johnson, rather than "for" the GOP national ticket.

An obvious dilemma in this situation disconcerts the Republicans at this point. They have a fastidious belief in timeworn election year rituals. They lean on an innate acceptance of the trite: that a series of primary victories for Nixon, or Reagan, or the now desperate Romney, would be triumphs almost impossible for the convention to deny. They also embrace that most ectoplasmic of myths—that Nixon is a pro of pros, and so is LBJ.

Despite the routine thinking that would have this just another routine national election, it is bound to dawn finally on the king makers, and on the candidates themselves, that the key to success is what happens to Johnson between now and August, not the primaries. This does not mean that impressive showings by Nixon in the GOP primaries would be irrelevant, or that the defeat of Romney in New Hampshire would not have tremendous psychological impact—probably resulting in his withdrawal. It only means that the polls, as they rate LBJ's popularity in the months ahead, will be far more likely to influence the conventions. Will the delegates think in early August that Johnson is going to be easy to beat or hard to beat in November?—that is the question.

On that basis, the nomination fortunes of Nixon—or Governor Rockefeller—would be decided without reference to the primary voting statistics. The same would be true of the Percy and Reagan chances as "second-best," compromise choices.

Besides the whooping up of primary preliminaries, we are also enduring this winter a ponderous, unimaginative attempt to project a Wallace third party candidacy into the November electoral vote. On paper, it is possible to reach a dreadful conclusion—that this evangelist of the status quo could carry sufficient states in a close election to require the House of Representatives, by a cumbersome voting procedure, to choose the President. Theoretically, it could happen. Practically, it is so unlikely as to be scarcely worth considering at this stage. When Johnson is nominated by the Democrats—as he certainly will be if he offers himself—and when his Republican opponent has been selected, will be soon enough to weigh the destructive capacity of this character from Alabama.

There is great drama in this election, but the traditional rituals tend to suppress it. As for the principal actor, the tragedy is that he cannot really win. A second term would only prolong, and emphasize, the bitter loss of trust that has divided and confused the people toward the end of his first five years in office.

THE RIVALRY OF PUPPETS

TRAN VAN DINH

Mr. Dinh, a former senior diplomat from South Vietnam serving in Southeast Asia and the United States, is now a freelance journalist, lecturer and writer. He has published a book on the present war, No Passenger on the River (Vantage Press), and writes weekly for the Collegiate Press Service.

On December 14, 1967, the United Nations Secretariat made public the translation of a Statement of Policies of the National Liberation Front (NLF) of South Vietnam. The document, part of a lengthy communication transmitted by the Rumanian delegation to the world organization, concerns the political directives of the National Liberation Front, usually referred to as the "new NLF program." This program was first presented to the Vietnamese public on August 20, 1967, at the conclusion of an extraordinary congress of the NLF which met "in the middle of August at a locality in the liberated zone in South Vietnam." It calls for a broad, democratic regime, a coalition government, free and general elections, peaceful reunification in stages with North Vietnam "without either side using pressure against the other and without foreign interferences" and a foreign policy of peace and neutrality. It also calls for land reforms. (According to Reps. John E. Moss (D., Calif.) and Ogden Reid (R., N.Y.) of the House Foreign Operations Committee, the NLF has distributed five times more land to the Vietnamese peasants than have the Saigon governments.)

Although the new NLF directives aim at "broadening the bloc of national solidarity," they are consistent with the Front's 1960 ten-point program. The NLF policy of negotiation and the formation of a coalition government was the subject of Point I which said: "This [Ngo Dinh Diem] regime and administration must be overthrown and a broad national democratic coalition administration formed, including representatives of all strata of people, nationalities, political parties, religious communities and patriotic personalities." In a statement on November 8, 1963, one week after the overthrow of Diem, the NLF declared: "The parties concerned in South Vietnam should negotiate with one another to reach a cease-fire and solve the important problems of the nation, to stabilize the basic internal and external policies with a view to reaching free general elections, to elect state organs and to form a national coalition government composed of representatives of all forces, parties, tendencies and strata of the Vietnamese people."

On September 28, 1966, Hanoi radio broadcast an interview with Mr. Nguyen Huu Tho, the NLF's president, by Wilfred Burchett, an Australian journalist. Mr. Burchett asked Mr. Tho if the NLF extended its cooperation to "those having participated in the Ngo Dinh Diem and the succeeding governments." Mr. Tho's answer was: "There will be no grudge for their activities, political tendencies and viewpoints, nor any discrimination as to nationalities or religious communities." The United States is well aware of the NLF policies. In a statement that appeared in Life magazine of November 27, 1964, Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson (now U.S. Ambassador to Japan) said: "I think their [the Vietcong's] strategy is very clear and they have been frank about it. They can have no hope for a military victory. Their present strategy is designed toward bringing about negotiation between some government in Saigon and their political arm, which is the NLF. This negotiation would be directed toward formation of a coalition government." Douglas Pike wrote in his book, The Viet Cong, that "considerable evidence is available that the NLF leadership at times has seriously considered authentic coalition government. A secret internal NLF document dated August 1962 spelled out the leadership's attitude at that moment toward the idea of a government that would include elements of Saigon bourgeoisie."

What made the NLF's move at the UN significant was its timing, its willingness to use the international organization for its diplomatic offensive, and a combination of circumstances both national (in South Vietnam) and international. On December 1, 1967, an AP story datelined Saigon had told of the arrest by the South Vietnamese police of two NLF emissaries who, according to official Saigon sources, were on their way to a meeting with members of the American Embassy. Some Vietnamese newspapers, tipped off by the police, claimed that a previous meeting had been held on November 20, 1967, between the NLF representatives and the following American officials: Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, deputy U.S. commander; Eugene M. Locke, deputy Ambassador, and Capt. Robert J. O'Brien, officer in charge of U.S. Embassy security. In the absence of General Westmoreland and Ambassador Bunker, then consulting in Washington, General Abrams and Ambassador Locke were the highest ranking U.S. representatives in South Vietnam.

There was an obvious orchestration in the manner in which the Saigon regime exploited the story. Phan Xuan Huy, a member of the South Vietnamese House of Representatives, and a close friend of Vice President Nguyen Cao Ky and of Police Chief Gen. Nguyen Ngoc Loan, told the House that the CIA had been trying to make contact with the NLF without telling the South Vietnamese government. He claimed that the U.S. Embassy had put pressure on the government to release the arrested NLF members, thus leading to rumors that Police Chief Loan had resigned. The newspapers which made full use of their space for the "incident" were the Cong Chung (Public) and the Tien Tuyen (Front Line), financed respectively by the police and the army. The Cong Chung, which since October has been pushing a persistent anti-U.S. campaign, broke the story first and threatened that "there will be a strong reaction on the part of mass organizations and their representatives in the Congress if the U.S. should be proven to have begun secret negotiations with the NLF without the knowledge of the Vietnamese administration." Prime Minister Nguyen Van Loc confirmed the story about the arrest of the NLF representatives, but denied that General Loan had resigned. Loan, the Premier told the press, was on sick leave, although he was seen in the Highlands, piloting an Air Force plane which dropped napalm bombs in the Dakto areas. He was back at his desk in about a week. Ky was unusually silent, and the Embassy denied the whole thing.

My information is that there was no such meeting, at least during the period mentioned. The fabricated "incident" was another illustration among many of the power struggle between President Thieu and Vice President Ky. The latter has never forgiven the Americans for pushing him into accepting the number-two position last June, and is determined to occupy the top post in fact if not in title. Thus far, he has succeeded. Thieu chose Nguyen Van Loc to be Prime Minister with Ky's advice and consent, and Loc's cabinet is dominated by Ky's Northern friends. The new Air Force commander, Gen. Tran Van Minh, a Northerner, is Ky's associate and was his deputy. And Ky's closest friend, Gen. Nguyen Ngoc Loan, is still in command of the 100,000-man police force.

However, President Thieu is not a man content to act as a figurehead; he has always shown that he intends to exercise his full constitutional powers. The main obstacle to Thieu's control of real power is Loan; without the General at the head of the police force, Ky's power would be greatly reduced and his financial resources drastically curtailed. Power in Saigon is, after all, police power. General Loan is hated by the Vietnamese, by the Buddhists, and despised by the U.S. Embassy which cannot stomach his corruption and his bad manners. His manipulation of the anti-U.S. campaign has also angered the Embassy.

Thus if Thieu could get rid of Loan, he would gain favor with both the Americans and the Vietnamese public. Loan's countermove is to pose as a "nationalist" (hence the belligerence toward the Americans) and to make

President Thieu

Thieu appear "soft on communism." During the election campaign Thieu had sought to exploit the strong peace sentiments in the populace by promising that he would "guarantee safe passage for any NLF member who wanted to come to Saigon for informal talks." It is also believed among the South Vietnamese generals and by some Vietnamese anti-Communists that the United States has been trying to deal secretly with the NLF. (The same anti-Communists accused the French of the same thing during the last war.) Thus, to be soft on communism is, in the minds of Ky and his ilk, also to be a puppet of the United States. The arrest of the alleged NLF emissaries, made without Thieu's knowledge, would underscore the strong anti-NLF, anti-U.S. positions of Ky and Loan and embarrass the President's position with elements of the public, the legislature and the military.

The Ky-Loan maneuver was well-timed, catching Thieu during a period of mounting difficulties. After two months in power, he had accomplished nothing except a regulation to force government workers to work on Saturday afternoons (siesta hours are still respected). The partial mobilization decree he signed in October met strong opposition from a population tired of war, and from the Congress. Like many other decisions made by South Vietnamese governments, this one will be allowed to die a natural death. His untimely and unwise (he is a Catholic) decision to bring to trial twenty-six important leaders of the Buddhist uprising in the summer of 1966 provoked firm resistance from all Buddhists and from members of the legislature. Speeches were made in both houses against the trial. (It has been held and the defendants convicted.)

Thieu's anti-corruption and anti-vice campaign got nowhere and his decision to reduce the powers of the warlord-corps commanders is still a dream. When, on November 11, the decision to execute three Vietcong terrorists was canceled at the behest of the Americans, who feared NLF reprisals on American prisoners, Thieu lost face. The Vietnamese had no particular liking for the execution of Vietcong, but they could see that his "independent" government could not enforce the decisions of its court. Thieu is subjected to all kinds of criticism and is under pressure from Washington and the embassy in Saigon to make "progress." But he is shrewd and calculating, and knows that he must get control of the administrative machine before he can turn on his rival. Recently, he named his closest adviser, Nguyen Van Huong, to the important post of Secretary General to the Presidency. In this position, Mr. Huong can supervise for him all the activities of Ky's friend, the Premier. Thieu is counting on the sympathy of the Embassy, which is growing impatient with Ky-Loan intrigues. He is trying to promote a visit to the United States, an invitation Ky has long coveted. Thieu and Ky vied with each other in sending wedding gifts to President Johnson's daughter. At the same time, caught in the Ky-Loc-Loan nationalism campaign, Thieu had to take a very strong stand in his reply to Mr. Johnson's endorsement, in an interview of December 20, of informal talks between Thieu and the NLF. Thieu said he would accept "any individual from the Front who would like to come back with us like any other returnees."

Vice President Ky

Against this background, the U.S.-NLF contact story created a flurry of statements and clarifications from the U.S. Administration. On December 7, Ambassador Arthur Goldberg revealed that the NLF had inquired some time in October whether it would be permitted to send two representatives to New York. Secretary-General U Thant disclosed that the NLF had sought his help to establish an unofficial mission at the UN similar to that of the Algerian National Liberation Front a decade ago. At that time, and despite French objections, the United States granted visas to representatives of the Algerian NLF to come to New York.

Although both the NLF and Hanoi still maintain that the UN has no authority in the Vietnam situation, the choice of the UN platform to circulate its program is an indication that the NLF is embarking on a diplomatic offensive. In September, the USSR endorsed the NLF's "political directives." Dang Quang Minh, the NLF representative in Moscow, was received by Kosygin and Brezhnev. However, choosing Rumania, one of the most independent nations in the Russian orbit, as a channel of communication was a way for the NLF to demonstrate its freedom from Soviet influence. The NLF is perhaps trying to exploit a division in Washington and to encourage more flexibility toward the NLF among the American leaders. Vice President Humphrey suggested on December 8 that "it may be that at some future date some of the non-Communist members of the NLF may very well be brought into a government and may very well be the ones we have to negotiate with." This suggestion is a striking departure from his February, 1965, position that such a government would be like having "a fox in a chicken coop—soon there wouldn't be any chickens left."

Two days after the NLF program was circulated at the UN, China stated that it had given the NLF delegation in Peking the standing of an embassy; East Germany accorded the NLF the same status. Besides China and East Germany, the NLF maintains diplomatic missions (government-accredited representatives) in Cambodia, Cuba, North Korea; it has officials in Algeria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, the USSR, the United Arab Republic and North Vietnam. It will soon open an Information Bureau in Paris. The Chinese and East German moves recall similar gestures made to the Democratic Republic of Vietnam in 1950. On January 14 of that year, President Ho Chi Minh, whose capital was then somewhere in the jungles of North Vietnam, sent a communication to the governments of the world, saying that "the Democratic Republic of Vietnam triumphantly declares to the governments of the world that it is the only lawful government representing a unified Vietnamese people." On January 19, the People's Republic of China recognized the Democratic Republic, and Russia followed on January 31. It is worth remembering that when President Ho Chi Minh declared the independence of Vietnam in Hanoi on September 2, 1945, no country in the world, including the USSR, recognized his government. When he called for diplomatic recognition of his regime, when in 1948 he offered to talk peace with the French, and applied for UN membership, the interpretation in Paris was that the "Viet Minh was weakening and had suffered serious military defeats." The United States may similarly misinterpret the NLF move. Actually, the diplomacy of the Viet Minh and of the NLF today are classic examples of the "fight and negotiate" strategy of revolutionary warfare. Revolutionary warfare or a war of national liberation is for the control and sharing of political power, not for the military destruction of the enemy.

The NLF diplomatic offensive has caught the United States in a trap of its own making. To justify its military intervention in Vietnam and its bombing of North Vietnam, Washington must assume publicly that the NLF is merely a creature of North Vietnam. (At times, however, the United States contradicts itself. In a pamphlet, "A Note on the Vietnamese Sects," published by the JUSPAO Planning office in Saigon in May, 1966, one reads: "Ten of the eleven Cao Dai subsects had opposed Diem, and their leadership fled to Cambodia or went into hiding. . . . The members of the other ten sects made up the bulk of the early NLF support, although the alliance at all times was an uneasy one. . . . The Hoa Hao sect in 1952 formed the Social Democratic Party as its political arm. It too challenged Diem, and its armies were smashed by the ARVN in 1956. Like the Cao Dai, it was an early and major participant in the NLF. The third of the esoteric sects of Vietnam, the Binh Xuyen, which was smashed by Diem, also worked with the NLF. . . .")

When he was back in Washington last November, Ambassador Bunker admitted at a background meeting with selected newsmen that the NLF was the only cohesive political force in South Vietnam. Unlike the Saigon rulers, who are mostly Northerners, the NLF leadership is Southern. The South has many historical reasons to suspect that the leadership in the North will abandon its interests in international compromises. The March 6, 1946, agreements, the September 14, 1946, modus vivendi, the Geneva Agreements are not forgotten. The participation of North Vietnamese regular regiments in the war at strategic border areas after the U.S. bombing of the North created frictions and required adjustments between the Northerners and the Southerners. The most remarkable concession by Hanoi was its acceptance in 1966 of a NLF representation in Hanoi, headed by Mr. Nguyen Van Tien. In an interview published by Il Mattino of Milan on December 9, 1967, Pham Van Su, North Vietnamese Ambassador to Czechoslovakia, was quoted as implying that to end the war, the United States would have to deal with the NLF.

The NLF, for its part, is not going to talk with Thieu and Ky. Assuming that the recent Hamlet Evaluation System, which gave Saigon control of two-thirds of the 17 million Vietnamese, is correct (which it is not because it supposes, for example, that the people of Saigon are all loyal to Thieu-Ky); assuming further that the September 3, 1967, elections were relatively fair (which they certainly were not), the Thieu-Ky regime which amassed 1,638,902 votes (or 34.8 per cent of the votes, or roughly 3 million people of all ages) cannot claim to represent the people of South Vietnam. Official estimates give the NLF control of 5 million. According to these American figures, then, the majority of the population, about 9 million, are neither NLF nor Thieu-Ky. In that case and if the United States wishes to bypass the NLF in any negotiation to end the war, the logical step would be to encourage the emergence of this third force. Had the elections been fair, had they been organized by an interim civilian government instead of the military junta, they would have produced a government qualified to negotiate with the NLF to end the war and with the United States to end the bombing of both North and South Vietnam. And even though that opportunity has been lost, it is still possible that the International Control Commission could be given provisional authority to bring together various political and religious groupings in South Vietnam to form an interim government capable of negotiating with the NLF.

In the coming months, it is possible that the NLF will step up the present diplomatic offensive by declaring itself a government with a capital somewhere in a liberated zone. According to the Saigon Post of December 1, the NLF, in a letter addressed to President Ho Chi Minh and broadcast by Hanoi radio, referred to itself three times as a "government." It is thus clear that, for strategic or tactical reasons, Hanoi has come to accept the proposition that for some time after the war South Vietnam will remain politically distinct from the North. For the same practical reasons Washington might decide to deal with the NLF. After all, negotiation and diplomacy are tactical means to temporize a situation, and to gain the time for a political trend to develop. U.S. diplomacy would lose nothing by adopting a flexible attitude not only in South Vietnam but in other parts of the developing world. Nations are growing and changing, and dogmatic assumptions and rigid strategies will prove to be self-defeating and dangerously costly.

The mood in Washington, at least in the next few months, is not for negotiations but for the pursuit of a military victory. Negotiation, as Gen. Earle G. Wheeler, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said on December 18, "is not an end in itself. Negotiation is not a face-saving device for abandoning the objectives we have been fighting for. It is a method of achieving our objectives." To General Wheeler and the Administration, American objectives are the only ones worth considering. For them, the purpose of negotiations is to sanction the surrender of the NLF and Hanoi. But soon or late, the United States will come to realize and understand the political and military realities of the Vietnamese battlefield. The NLF diplomatic offensive will provide Washington with many occasions in the future to translate these realities into a reasonable settlement at a conference table.

THE DRAFT AS PUNISHMENT

TRIAL BY HERSHEY

PETER W. MARTIN

Mr. Martin is associate professor of law at the University of Minnesota. From 1964 to 1967 he was an officer in the Air Force, assigned to the Office of the General Counsel to the Secretary of the Air Force.

The Congress . . . declares that in a free society the obligations and privileges of serving in the armed forces and the reserve components thereof should be shared generally, in accordance with a system of selection which is fair and just

—Military Selective Service Act of 1967

Recently, four persons, including students at the University of Oklahoma and the University of Utah, were reclassified 1-A by their local draft boards for their participation in anti-war demonstrations. A Temple University faculty member, aged 37 and the father of two, was reclassified 1-A because he returned his draft card as a form of protest. The same act cost a Cornell University chaplain his exemption from the draft as a minister. A like fate probably awaits many of the 297 who turned in draft cards during the Pentagon peace demonstration of last fall. Such use of the classification system by draft boards to punish those they consider to have violated the Selective Service Act or regulations has come under sharp criticism and legal attack. Public attention has been drawn to the practice by General Hershey's now notorious letter, issued on October 26 to all members of the Selective Service System.

Coming only five days after the Pentagon demonstration, the letter was read by many as encouraging draft boards to reclassify students who participate in "illegal" demonstrations which interfere with military recruitment. It even carried the hint that any "vicious efforts to cripple" national unity fell within the General's notion of illegality. Any doubt about the force of his message was removed at a November 2 press conference. "We believe it's a violation of our act," he said, "when anyone interferes with a registrant who is trying to carry out his obligation to the government [by enlisting]." As a violator of the Selective Service Act—and the General conceded this required "assuming just a little"—the demonstrator faced being declared a "delinquent" by his draft board, the loss of any deferred classification, and advancement to the very top of the list for induction.

A subsequent joint statement by Attorney General Ramsey Clark and General Hershey, presumably ordered by the White House, attempted to mollify the letter's critics by assuring that registrants who engaged in "lawful protest activities" would not be penalized; but it succeeded only in stirring up greater controversy by revealing disagreement between the two. The statement clearly bore the mark of the Justice Department's more restricted view of the type of activity which, under the Selective Service Regulations, would justify declaring a registrant a delinquent: namely, not all illegal conduct, but only that constituting a violation of a duty affecting the registrant's own status. Hershey, by quickly pointing out that the statement did not expressly rule out a broader reclassification authority, made it evident that he did not accept the Justice Department's interpretation. The director's view is that the criminal provisions of the Selective Service Act, which are enforced by the Justice Department, are merely one option in any case of conduct that allegedly violates the Act or regulations, including "illegal" interference with the draft process or military recruitment. Indeed, Hershey prefers reclassification, except, of course, for individuals too old or infirm for duty.

Attacks on General Hershey's pronouncements have followed two lines. Some have taken issue only with his suggestion that registrants may be declared "delinquent" for participating in demonstrations that interfere with military recruiters. The second and more fundamental argument advanced by critics, including Congressman Moss of California, who has threatened hearings on the issue, is that draft boards lack authority "to use the draft classification process as a device to punish a person for expressing his views or even for violating the law." Both criticisms have a solid legal basis.

The Justice Department's refusal to agree with Hershey that demonstrators can be treated as "delinquents" rests on the system's own regulations which authorize reclassification only when a registrant has failed to comply with a duty imposed by the Selective Service Act or the regulations themselves. Neither the Act nor the regulations defines a duty not to demonstrate. For this reason the United States Court of Appeals, second circuit, a year ago ruled illegal the reclassification of two students who demonstrated in the offices of the Selective Service local board in Ann Arbor. Far from "assuming just a little," General Hershey's contrary view cannot be supported by any reasonable reading of the regulations.

Large numbers of protesters face reclassification not because of mere participation in an anti-war demonstration but because of a specific act of protest—turning in their draft cards. Since the Selective Service Regulations impose a duty on every registrant to keep his draft card in his possession, treating one who has surrendered the card as a "delinquent" does no violence to the regulations. Consequently, any challenge to such use of induction as a punishment must go beyond the line of opposition established by the Justice Department and the Court of Appeals decision cited above. They did not challenge the practice of reclassifying and inducing draft delinquents, but were concerned only with the limits of delinquency as defined by the regulations. Two more fundamental objections exist: (1) There is no authority under the Selective Service Act for establishing such a system of punishment; (2) there is a conflict between the practice and constitutional guarantees.

A search of the present Act or any of its predecessors, including the prototype Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, yields no trace of any legislative direction to deny deferments to registrants alleged to have committed violations of the Act. In fact, the Act prescribes a very different method of enforcement. Section 12 establishes criminal penalties for those who "knowingly fail or neglect or refuse" to perform duties required by the law or regulations. Since 1965, also, a separate subsection has dealt with mutilation or destruction of draft cards, the subject of a First Amendment challenge now before the Supreme Court. From 1940 through November 1, 1943, the Selective Service relied solely on statutory penalties, a maximum jail sentence of five years and maximum fine of $10,000, to enforce the law and regulations. Selective Service Regulations during that period provided merely that the system should identify and investigate possible delinquents and report those it found to be willful violators to the Justice Department for prosecution. Total convictions up to June 30, 1943, numbered more than 6,000.

Congress in 1940 chose this method of enforcement deliberately, specifically rejecting less formal administrative procedures. Brig. Gen. James Oakes, whose report on the operation of the draft during the Civil War is responsible for many features in the present law (including that peculiar institution, the local draft board), recommended that delinquents be prosecuted by the Justice Department rather than the military. During World War I, this recommendation was not fully realized because, although the Act established criminal sanctions, many delinquencies resulted in the sending of an order to report for military service. Whether or not received, such a notice made the addressee a member of the service from the date specified and a deserter upon his failure to report; hence many delinquents were tried by court-martial. The Burke-Wadsworth bill, originally contemplating this same system, provided for concurrent military and civil jurisdiction over violations. It was amended before becoming the 1940 Act to provide for civil jurisdiction only, unless the registrant had actually been inducted.

Apparently, the Selective Service decided in 1943 that the threat of criminal prosecution was failing to induce the degree of compliance desired. By late 1942 many registrants had fallen out of touch with their draft boards. In January, 1943, the Selective Service launched a concerted delinquency campaign. In order to compel registrants to re-establish contact, a new regulation required a registrant to keep his classification notice, as well as his registration certificate, in his possession. Registrants who then reappeared, willing to comply, were not prosecuted.

From an administrative standpoint, the disadvantages of being limited to the criminal penalty and a full trial are fairly obvious. Threat of prosecution worked quite well in persuading compliance by delinquents once they were located; but the registrant who hoped his draft board would forget about him did not have serious worries, so long as he did not actively evade induction. Most prosecutions could be forestalled by belated compliance or, if need be, by enlisting or volunteering for induction. The Act specifically limited prosecution to "knowing" violations, so the resources of the Justice Department were applied only to the most blatant cases of infringement.

The Selective Service Regulations were amended, as of November 1, 1943, to provide that henceforth all delinquents would be reclassified 1-A, if within the age groups liable for service and physically fit. Local boards were urged to publicize the change, with the hope that the news would spur compliance. At the time, Assistant Attorney General Tom Clark characterized the new regulation as "an administrative penalty, in addition to the present criminal sanction." Although the Selective Service now avoids language which would suggest it is using the draft to punish delinquents, in more candid moments it too has recognized this intent. A 1950 report on enforcement of the 1940 law, signed by General Hershey, spoke of the reclassification regulation as establishing an "administrative penalty."

The administrative procedure thus established is so at odds with the method of enforcement prescribed by Congress in the Act that there is a fair chance of its being stricken down if challenged directly in court. The points of conflict between regulation and statute are numerous. The regulations omit from the definition of "delinquent" the requirement that a violation occur "knowingly" which was deliberately added by Congress to the 1940 Act. They do not excuse the delinquent from criminal prosecution but add to that possibility the denial of an otherwise valid deferment or exemption. The most important inconsistency, however, lies in the substitution of a highly informal hearing procedure before a local draft board for a full judicial trial. The board's decision is effectively substituted for that of a court because of the very limited scope of judicial review of classification determinations. The method of review described by the statute requires the registrant to report for, but to refuse to submit to, induction. In the following criminal prosecution for failing to submit to induction (his only chance for judicial review), he is permitted the defense that the classification decision was in error, but must meet an unusually severe burden of proof.

The effect of this administrative procedure is that the

Renault, Open Forum: Ben Roth

"Send These, the Dissident, Deferred Trouble-Makers to Me"

alleged violator is faced with the choice of accepting induction, notwithstanding an otherwise valid deferment, or seeking judicial review of the board's decision, with little chance of success and the risk of a second criminal penalty. It has been Justice Department policy ever since the Service began reclassifying those considered guilty of minor violations such as non-possession of draft cards not to limit prosecution to the offense of failure to submit to induction when the administrative penalty is challenged. The registrant is often prosecuted for both offenses—the original one which was the ground for reclassification and also the refusal to accept that action by the board. Because of the limited scope of review of the classification decision, it is entirely possible for the defendant to be acquitted on the first count but convicted for his refusal to accept a draft board's determination that he was guilty on that count—a preposterous state of affairs that highlights the conflict between regulation and statute.

Because of this inconsistency, the provisions of the Selective Service Act which authorize the issuance of implementing regulations cannot legitimately be used to support reclassification. Hershey's October 26 letter argues:

The military obligation for liable age groups is universal and . . . deferments are given only when they serve the national interest. It is obvious that any action that violates the military selective service act or regulations, or the related processes cannot be in the national interest.

The assumption here implicit is that the Selective Service Act permits the President by regulation, and the Selective Service System by administrative interpretation, to establish whatever classification system they, as distinguished from Congress, deem to be in the national interest. The Act delegates no such unlimited discretion; it sets forth the precise scope of the President's authority to refine the criteria for deferment, and it varies among the various statutory grounds. For example, the Act defers the Vice President and numerous other specified public officials; no authority to contract or expand this category is delegated to the President. Similarly, the exemption accorded the clergy is without qualification. On the other hand, deferments for dependents, for graduate study, and deferments on account of occupation or extreme hardship are, the Act says, to be granted under "such rules and regulations" as the President may prescribe.

The authority which the statute vests in local draft boards to determine a registrant's classification does not permit denial of deferment on arbitrary grounds, i.e., grounds suggested neither by the express terms of the Act nor by the rationales underlying the particular deferment. Reclassification of those for whom the statute insures deferment or exemption without the qualifying phrase "under such rules and regulations" as the President may prescribe is a clear violation of the statute. Even with respect to those deferments about which the statute envisions a measure of Presidential rule making, the delinquent reclassification procedure outsteps the bounds of that authority. Such an across-the-board threat to deferments or exemptions is unrelated to the purposes for which the specific grants of rule-making power appear intended. When it is added that the policy of rescinding deferments granted to those a board considers violators of the Act or regulations is inconsistent with the method of enforcement deliberately selected by Congress, it becomes clear that the regulation constitutes as much a violation of Congressional will when applied to a student or a registrant with children as when applied to a minister. Hershey has it backward when he asserts that if Congress disagrees with his interpretation of the law, it can amend the Selective Service Act.

The General's attempts to explain the need for reclassification reveal the same flaw; they contradict decisions incorporated in the Act. He laid stress recently on the delays of the judicial process and the unavailability of potential draftees while prosecutions are in motion. The number of cases filed (1,388 during the first four months of this fiscal year) is insignificant in comparison with a total manpower pool of 18 million and annual military needs of about 1 million. More important, manpower needs and the time required for trial are not new considerations and must have been weighed by Congress in its preference for enforcement by the Justice Department and the courts over more rapid but less formal procedures. The Act furnishes a device for reconciling the need for fairly strict enforcement with the national military manpower requirements. Since 1940, the draft law has authorized the President to prescribe rules and regulations governing the parole for service in the armed forces of those convicted of Selective Service Act violations. During World War II, this section was implemented, and a significant number of those convicted took advantage of it. Selective Service Regulations no longer provide for such parole, presumably because manpower needs do not require tapping this source.

It might appear that the intent of Congress in 1940 is no longer relevant, Congress having re-enacted the Selective Service Act on numerous occasions since the reclassification procedure entered the regulations in 1943. Surely Congress was not unaware of the practice; cannot the failure to condemn it be read as implied endorsement? Where the effect of contested regulations is to inflict a harsh penalty on an individual without a full hearing, the Supreme Court has rejected this classic argument. Before it will weigh the constitutionality of a procedure of doubtful validity, the Court has demanded a clearer expression of Congressional intent than is provided by mere acquiescence in administrative practice. The reclassification procedure does raise just such issues of constitutionality.

Nothing in the Selective Service Regulations instructs draft boards on sufficiency of evidence. It may declare a registrant a delinquent on the basis of whatever evidence it chooses. A hearing is not automatically granted before such a declaration and reclassification. Local Board Memorandum No. 85, which accompanied Hershey's letter on demonstrators, suggests that whenever a board receives a registration card separated from its owner, sufficient basis exists for reclassification. If the registrant thereafter demands a personal hearing, he is granted it; but he is not entitled under the regulations to the assistance of counsel. In the hearing, the registrant is furnished none of the protections which would be a matter of constitutional right if the same issue were being tried in court under the Act's criminal section: no transcript is kept; no reasoned opinion with specific findings of fact and conclusions of law can be expected. Further, while in court the defendant's guilt would have to be proved "beyond a reasonable doubt" and the Fifth Amendment would prevent his silence from being relied on to support conviction, a local draft board suffers no such restraint. The board operates under no more definite guide than the general instruction that the registrant bears the burden of proving his eligibility for deferment to the board's satisfaction.

There is no doubt that local-board hearings fail to meet the constitutional standards which apply to criminal proceedings; but the principal issue in any court test of the procedure will be whether those standards apply in the administrative context. Typical classification decisions, involving such points as whether a registrant is a full-time student or a regular or ordained minister or a conscientious objector, have withstood constitutional challenges for the reason that minimum standards of administrative due process in civil matters are complied with. But the Constitution requires more of a criminal trial, and the Supreme Court has held that when government action is designed to mete out punishment, it must be held to this higher standard, even though the labels "criminal" and "punishment" may not be used. In 1963, the Court held that a penalty, unambiguously imposed by statute (in that case, forfeiture of citizenship for the act of leaving or staying outside the country to avoid the draft), could not be imposed since no provision was made for "a prior criminal trial and all its incidents, including indictment, notice, confrontation, jury trial, assistance of counsel, and compulsory process for obtaining witnesses." In the same opinion, the Court listed the factors it deemed relevant to a determination that government action was in substance a penalty. Because of their intent and effect, it is highly likely that the reclassification regulations will be deemed to impose a penalty; if so, they will fall.

Eventually, the federal courts will have to express themselves on these issues; test cases are now pending. It is a comment on the Administration that litigation should be required. As General Hershey has pointed out, litigation is time consuming. It also requires registrants willing to face imprisonment. The President ought to rescind the regulation which now gives the color of authority to the policy of reclassification.

As yet the White House has tried only to dodge the issue. On December 21, Kingman Brewster, Jr., president of Yale University, wrote President Johnson on behalf of the presidents of Princeton, Pennsylvania, Harvard, Dartmouth, Cornell, Columbia and Brown, imploring him "to make it crystal clear that there is no intention to let local boards assume the judicial role of determining the legality of individual conduct and that there is no intention to undercut or bypass fundamental judicial processes."

The reply, from special assistant Joseph A. Califano, Jr., asserted: "The Selective Service System is not an instrument to repress and punish unpopular views. Nor does it vest in draft boards the judicial role of determining the legality of individual conduct." This is a meaningless, in fact highly deceptive, assurance as long as the regulations issued by the President permit reclassification upon the determination by a draft board that one of its registrants is "delinquent."

It need hardly be said that the President ought also to relieve General Hershey of his present office. The nation requires a Selective Service director who will respect judicial decisions and recognize that there are legal limitations to his authority. As Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas remarked recently to a Colgate University audience: [Hershey] "is a law unto himself and responds only to his own conversation." He is also on record as not being particularly concerned with the law's express goal of fairness. During the 1966 Congressional hearings, he stated:

I enlisted in the National Guard in Indiana when I was sixteen years old, and there were a thousand other kids that didn't, and there was nothing fair about the fact that I assumed voluntarily a responsibility they ought to share and therefore there is a limit to what you can possibly do, and I think we have gone hogwild on the individual rights in this country, whether group rights had to suffer because of it.

The Selective Service System's degree of control over the lives and liberty of individual citizens is unique among administrative agencies, as is the political stress under which it often must function. As presently structured it is less subject than most agencies to judicial supervision. It is exempt from the Administrative Procedure Act which requires most federal agencies to follow formal hearing procedures before promulgating important policy. As Hershey has repeatedly demonstrated, the director can, if he sees fit, issue national policy in informal letters. This fact, combined with nearly complete local-board autonomy and the Act's prohibition of judicial review of classification decisions prior to acceptance or refusal of induction, hinders close review by the courts. To maintain as director a man who listens to neither the Justice Department nor the courts, but only to himself, certainly "cannot be in the national interest."

FROM PEACE TO WALLACE

CALIFORNIA RUNS THE GAMUT

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

The day after it became apparent that the Peace and Freedom Party had qualified for the ballot in California, the party's youthful leaders held a press conference at their grubby, one-room headquarters on West Pico Boulevard in Los Angeles. As the session neared its end, a young volunteer edged his way over to the table where the party organizers were seated and suggested, "Why don't we tell the reporters what we think of them?" Amid laughter, one of the organizers answered, "That wasn't on the agenda, but as long as it has come up, maybe we should talk about it." And they did—impartially charging newspapers, radio and television with neglect of the Peace and Freedom Party and with consistent bias in favor of George Wallace and his American Independent Party (AIP). One party leader summed up to the satisfaction of his colleagues: "Look, you didn't know what was going on. You thought we were just another bunch of kooks."

The denunciation had a familiar ring to reporters who had covered another news conference ninety minutes earlier in nearby Santa Monica, where Wallace, celebrating the newly won legal blessing for his American Independent Party in California, taunted the newsmen for underestimating his strength, and one of his supporters yelled, "Tell that to Huntley and Brinkley." The prophets of journalism had offended both ends of the political spectrum—by predicting that neither had much chance of collecting the 60,059 registrations required under California law to get on the ballot.

Wallace's achievement was the less remarkable. His supporters had waged a campaign at an acknowledged cost of "hundreds of thousands of dollars." (Some estimates put it at $1 million.) A nationally known and controversial political figure, he got lavish news coverage and appeared on numerous television programs. By contrast, the Peace and Freedom Party, lacking a "name candidate" or any candidate at all, and scrounging for nickels and dimes, was largely ignored. As late as mid-December, hardly anyone, including its organizers, expected the party to qualify, although several thousand students fanned out over the state during the Christmas holidays to pick up registrations. Then, ironically, the Wallace headquarters, by announcing in the last week of December that its drive had been successful, supplied the Peace and Freedom Party with vital, last-minute momentum. Thousands of dismayed liberal and left-leaning Democrats registered with the party.

These two dissident political movements, sprouting in the fertile soil of California, are now heading in opposite directions for the New Jerusalem, each confident that it has correctly linked its goals with the aspirations of the American people and both proclaiming eventual success. Extreme opposites in political and personal philosophies, they have in common a deep sense of alienation from the main current of events and a hatred of the Establishment, which they both define as the "liberal establishment." An ultraconservative member of the California Republican State Central Committee, who threatens to bolt to Wallace if the GOP nominates "some idiot like Rockefeller or Romney," put the proposition simply: "The real conservatives are sick and tired of the goddam left-wing liberals that run this country." Read "radicals" for "conservatives" and that statement accurately reflects the sentiment of the Peace and Freedom Party. Leaders of both parties label themselves "the wave of the future," and both factions are certain that if the news media would only deliver their messages, uncorrupted, to the public, the response would be immediate and favorable.

The Peace and Freedom Party, although now qualified for the California ballot, is an organization in name only. Contemptuous of the power structure, which inevitably it describes as "the white power structure," disdaining political organization and all forms of authority, the party must nevertheless create its own power structure if it is to have even short-term political influence. Its leaders, mostly under 30, recognize this and have issued a pronouncement remarkably like those from the two major parties. The party's immediate plans are to (1) solidify the state-wide organization that put the party on the ballot; (2) plan a state-wide convention, probably in San Francisco in March; (3) look for potential candidates prior to the convention; (4) approach groups with similar goals in other states, and (5) raise money to pay for these activities.

The party's first post-registration planning session, January 6 and 7 in Pasadena, demonstrated its free-floating character. On two days' notice, 200 persons hastily gathered in a Friends Meeting House, which proved to be an appropriate setting. Most of them spoke when the spirit moved them and many encountered the mysterious Robert's Rules of Order for the first time. They devoted the first two hours to a jumbled debate on a motion to exclude the news media. One earnest delegate from Marin County commented, "This is contrary to everything we stand for." But another, trembling with sincere animosity, said, "We should kick the press out and later give the reporters only what we want them to know." Finally, they reached a compromise whereby reporters were to be banned from the initial session, but admitted later. Except, that is, for TV: the delegates agreed that the presence of cameras inhibited frank discussion. As it turned out the argument was premature; the press ignored the session.

In the argot of the hippies, the temporary chairman said: "We'll just rap around for a while, get acquainted, and shed some of our hostilities." A sympathetic observer, evidently gifted with extrasensory perception, reported that the "rap around" interlude served "to define, clarify, sort out and give priorities to a multitude of issues," which nevertheless remained nebulous, unranked and unclarified. The problems of homosexuals got sympathetic attention. It was agreed they were discriminated against, along with students, women and the poor. Vietnam was scarcely discussed, perhaps because there were no differences to provoke comment. The session devoted several hours to "the movement for black liberation," but the only tangible result of the meeting was the appointment of a steering committee to prepare another planning session which, in turn, would work out the specifics of a state convention.

The Peace and Freedom Party totally rejects the war in Vietnam and strongly identifies with the struggle of the blacks, but it also represents a third impulse which may in the long run prove equally significant. That impulse is a flat rejection of conventional two-party politics and a disaffection with "liberal materialism." The movement has the potential to become the base of a new and revitalized Left in the United States to counterbalance the extreme Right. But despite its unexpected success in becoming a legal political party, the Peace and Freedom Party has today an aura of surrealism. It is principally white and middle class; it has no working-class base and its connection with the black community and other minority groups is tenuous.

The party's attitude toward the old Left is one of bored tolerance, but nothing succeeds like success, and since January 2 the handful of public Communists in California have been circling around the Peace and Freedom Party, offering their counsel as elder statesmen of political adversity and ostracism. They began with a mea culpa in the People's World. Last spring in California, talk of a third party on the Left had met with amused disbelief that anything much could be accomplished. "Among those who held these views," said the People's World, "were representatives of the Marxist Left, including members of the Communist Party." That was a mistake, the paper concluded, and explained that Communists, working fraternally within the Peace and Freedom Party, could have nudged the party along in the proper direction. They "could have pointed out to third party activists and Democrats alike the complementary nature—in the immediate future—of this third-party drive and the California Democratic Council-sponsored Peace and Equality slate." Briefly put, a united front against the war in Vietnam could have been formed with anti-war Democrats, an echo bouncing across the years from the 1930s.

Peace and Freedom leaders, "doing their own thing," are tuned out to the message. When aging Communists and well-meaning liberals of FDR vintage attempt to talk coalition politics with them, their eyes glaze. The Communist appeal for cooperation with all anti-war movements brought this comment from one of the Peace and Freedom recruits: "To many who have participated in the successful Peace and Freedom campaign this will seem like the impossible riding of two horses going in different directions and may lead to a continued isolation of the C.P. from the peace party."

Shunting the Communists aside, not from any fear of association but because they see communism as square, Peace and Freedom leaders are regarded as a little square themselves by many of the black militants whom they court. The party wants to broaden its appeal by engaging the active support of the blacks, and they have had a limited success, despite their rupture with a black caucus last September in San Luis Obispo. At the party's first organizing conference, the blacks, following the example set at the New Politics convention in Chicago (see The Nation, September 25) demanded 50 per cent of the voting strength. When this demand was rejected, the blacks walked out. The few Communists who were present, accusing the peace party organizers of racism, also withdrew. Since then, the Peace and Freedom leadership has made continuous overtures to the blacks, joining, for example, in the defense of a Black Panther Party member accused of murder. While many militant Negroes spurn electoral politics, they are willing to cooperate with radical whites on the basis of Stokely Carmichael's dictum of specific coalitions for specific purposes.

Abu, The Tribune (London): Ben Roth

If Peace and Freedom leaders, as surprised as anyone else by their recent success, have yet to devise a specific program, the American Independent Party, defining the central issue as "the power of government to compel social change," outlines a simple, four-point policy: defense of individual property rights, local control of schools, maintenance of law and order, and the right of labor unions to decide their own patterns of seniority. All this reduces itself to opposition to black demands for equality; in brief, racism. Property rights means the right to exclude blacks from owning property in white residential neighborhoods; local control of schools means segregation on the basis of color; law and order means suppression of black riots; union seniority means exclusion of blacks from equal treatment by unions. A strong current of neo-America First isolationist sentiment divides AIP supporters on the war in Vietnam. To them, the great issues are race and the power of the "liberal establishment," as they view it, to force social change.

Youngsters who will vote for the first time this year make up perhaps 30 per cent of the Peace and Freedom Party. Spin-offs from the liberal California Democratic Council and miscellaneous older radicals make up the remainder of the 90,000 registrations claimed by the party. The disgruntled and fearful middle-aged dominate the Wallace rallies in California, although all Wallace supporters cannot be put into this category or necessarily be labeled extremists. Many business and professional men of seemingly moderate views favor him, and he has been warmly received by several civic groups, including the prestigious Commonwealth Club of San Francisco.

Wallace has drawn heavily for leadership in California on ultraconservative Republicans, who have found even Ronald Reagan too liberal. A half dozen members of the Republican State Central Committee have defected to Wallace, and more members of other Republican organizations are likely to follow. Wallace's biggest concentration of strength is in Los Angeles County. When his party registration reached 71,000 in December, 33,000 signatures had been obtained in Los Angeles County and 17,000 in other Southern California areas. At that point, the AIP had 12,000 registrants in the Central Valley and mountain counties, but was weakest in the San Francisco Bay area, with 9,000 registrations. Wallace's total now approaches 100,000, but his relative strength in various areas of the state remains the same. In one small community of south central Los Angeles Co., Bell Gardens, the AIP outnumbers the major parties in registered voters. The figures are: AIP, 3,058; Democratic, 2,875; Republican, 1,291. Wallace scored his greatest success in white working-class residential areas adjacent to the black ghettos. Where Wallace is weakest, around San Francisco, the Peace and Freedom Party makes its greatest appeal, registering some 40,000 voters, a figure about equal to the number obtained in the more heavily populated Los Angeles Co. The Berkeley campus of the University of California, with 5,000 registrations, is Peace and Freedom territory. Aside from the San Francisco and Los Angeles areas, adherents to the party are scattered thinly about the state.

Wallace makes his greatest mass appeal in California to transplanted Southerners, who are Democrats in name only. They generally are more conservative than the average California Republican, and bring with them their conventional racial prejudices. In moments of optimism, Wallace supporters dream of a new political combination in this country, an alliance of the South with the industrial workers of the North. While the writings of Walter Lippmann are infrequently displayed on the coffee tables of Wallace supporters, they have read with generous approval his recent article predicting the smash-up of the New Deal coalition of workers and minority groups (see also "The New Tide of National Politics" by Edward Schneier; The Nation, January 22). Wallace says his candidacy will hurt both major parties equally, but in California he is likely to take more votes from Republicans than from Democrats. A hard-line conservative Republican predicts that if his party runs a liberal candidate for President, Wallace "will take the entire right wing of the party and will run ahead of the Republican candidate" in California. The wish may be the father to that unkind thought, but there is no doubt that the Alabamian arouses a rumbling growl of approval from the right wing.

Neither the Peace and Freedom Party nor the AIP expects a large part of its following to defect to the major parties when the chips are down in November, and both discount the twenty-year-old precedent of Henry Wallace and the Independent Progressive Party. At the last moment, much of Henry Wallace's support flopped over to Truman. This history may not repeat, for today dissidents both Left and Right are more thoroughly disaffected from "the system," because of the war and racial rebellion, than were the progressives and the South two decades ago. Sighting from diametrically opposed positions, Left and Right nevertheless agree that they find great difficulty in detecting any difference between the positions of the major parties.

Wallace supporters will exert what influence they have solely through his candidacy for President. The Peace and Freedom Party will nominate a Presidential candidate, but also plans to enter candidates for local, county and state offices. This will probably require a court challenge of the state election code, which states that a party's candidate must have been a member of that party, and no other, for twelve months prior to filing for office.

Whatever difficulties they face, the two new parties have no monopoly on problems. Since 1964, California Democrats have groped, grouped and regrouped in wild confusion. The volunteer California Democratic Council has split from the regular organization and is about ready to announce its anti-Johnson peace slate of delegates for the National Democratic Convention. Last month, the CDC endorsed Sen. Eugene McCarthy. Attorney General Thomas Lynch, the only Democrat in a state-wide office to survive Reagan in 1966, will head the pro-Johnson delegation. If Lynch can fit together a happy group, including such feuding figures as former Gov. Pat Brown and Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles, he will have accomplished one of the neater political tricks of the year. (The division in the Democratic Party is exemplified in the former Governor's family. While Brown will be on the regular delegation, his son, Edmund, Jr., is a member of the CDC peace slate.) It is not at all certain that the regular slate will be able to defeat the CDC delegation, particularly if McCarthy's campaign produces any enthusiasm.

On the Republican side, Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel has been running for renomination for the past year, and Max Rafferty, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, has been pacing back and forth in his office, hooting at him. Reagan, intent on parlaying his 1966 triumph into the Republican Presidential nomination, wants to avoid a disruptive party struggle, but he has not had much luck in trying to quiet Rafferty. A Rafferty-Kuchel brawl will be a test of the ultra-Right's strength in California.

Theodore Roosevelt's old epithet, "lunatic fringe," is usually applied in this country to any departure from the political norm. But if splinter-party efforts, whatever their origin and philosophy, take on that quality, they may have come by it quite naturally from the lunatic Center, which usually shoves aside debate over great issues like war and race in favor of electioneering razzle-dazzle. The growing distrust of politics in American life, particularly among the young and the minority groups, is hardly evidence of mental instability.

THE BLACK HESSIANS

CHARLES R. EISENDRATH

Mr. Eisendrath is a reporter on the Baltimore Evening Sun. He has recently returned from army training in the Maryland National Guard.

Along with new assault helicopters, new infantry tactics and new questions about victory and defeat, the "New Kind of War" in Vietnam has bred a new kind of American soldier.

He has been extracted from the urban Negro ghetto by choice, chance and policy, and is being psychologically custom tailored for his war. The result is a semi-mercenary, fighting a campaign characterized by critics and advocates alike as carrying overtones of colonialism, in effect, if not intention. And, like his war, the new kind of American soldier responds to analysis by shattering into paradox.

His family and neighbors of civilian life mount the most militant reform movement in recent American history—one which in annual, incandescent fury flattens whole precincts—but abroad he fights the most conservative of wars. He fights, moreover, as a volunteer—a professional—returning for more than his share of front-line duty in numbers proportionately far greater than his white comrades.

Consequently, he dies in greater numbers. Department of Defense figures indicate that he dies almost twice as fast in the army as he should, statistically. Twelve per cent of the army in Vietnam are Negroes. Twenty-one per cent of army deaths by hostile action in Vietnam from January 1, 1961, through July 1, 1967, were Negro deaths.

Mahood, The Times (London): Ben Roth

"This Is Proving To Be Excellent Training for Civilian Life"

What brings this poor man—this revolutionary—to fight what New York Times columnist James Reston and others have called "a poor man's war"? What makes him re-enlist after fulfilling his military obligation? It becomes clear during interviews that he finds in the Vietnamese War many of the attractions that poor men have always found in fighting rich men's battles.

It is ironic that in this country, where textbooks traditionally malign "The Hessians," hired by George III to fight rebellious colonists, the low-income Negro-turned-soldier increasingly resembles a "Black Hessian." As a hired gun, the Black Hessian, in his own version of army lingo, "re-ups for the benefits." These are considerable. They range from money, security and pensions to some of the goals his civilian neighbors march, demonstrate and destroy to achieve. Nobody seriously argues today that the army—especially the fighting army—throws many obstacles in the path of Negro advancement through the ranks. On the contrary, the nation's largest and only compulsory service is widely cited as its most democratic bureaucracy. Besides equal opportunity and prestige literally wearable on the sleeve, the Black Hessian's hierarchy of benefits includes money—quite a bit of it.

Within two years—when the draftee must "re-up" or get out—an 18-year-old unemployed and possibly "unemployable" Negro from ghetto streets can be making in the normal course of combat more than is earned by the average American male aged 20 to 24 of any race, and almost as much as a newly commissioned second lieutenant. Another three years puts him a full 56 per cent ahead of the average earnings among his Negro age group in civilian life. These relative advances don't take into consideration fringe benefits like free medical attention, clothes and PX prices. And the benefits don't stop with active duty. The Black Hessian can retire in twenty years with a pension—and probably a trade.

Soldiering was made to taste still sweeter last December by the third major Army pay raise since 1965, when the U.S. began its massive build-up for Vietnam. The 5.6 per cent hike lifted basic pay about 25 per cent above 1964 levels—a rate of increase that almost tripled the cost of living climb in the same period. "The raises," remarked an urbane officer attached to the Comptroller of the Army, have been designed "to keep our qualified personnel in the service."

Sgt. Lawyer Jenkins understands all this very well. At 29 and lacking a high school diploma, he looks forward to signing another three-year hitch this year with something of the attitude of a corporation junior vice president facing transfer from New York's glamour to a higher paying job in Peoria. He stands to leave his soft job stateside as a drill sergeant for a fighting job in Vietnam, and he isn't crazy about the idea. As he enjoyed telling his platoon of basic "trainees," he considers himself "a lover, babe, ain't no fighter." Nevertheless, Jenkins, who has repeatedly failed the officer's candidate school test, will "go if they need me."

"They" do. Unable or unwilling to hire enough allied troops with military aid, the United States has come increasingly to press the war with the Lawyer Jenkinses of its manpower pool. His casualties are high, said an army spokesman, because he picks professional line outfits—the Airborne, the Rangers, the Special Forces—to get hazardous duty pay on top of combat pay on top of regular pay, which he considers not bad to begin with. As Jenkins put it: "Where else could I have it this good, man? I'm up tight right here!"

What better attitude could there be in the bosom of a man about to enter a fight with few rules, uncertain backing, and no goals other than to get out of it as soon as possible? Largely without the preconceived notions of world politics that the more fortunate pick up in school or in the press, the Black Hessian is ready to accept the army version—so long as the "benefits is good."

But there are factors beside benefits in the genesis of the Black Hessian. A thicket of prevailing social conditions and deliberate governmental policy brings him from the ghetto to his first confrontation with a drill sergeant—who is often someone very like himself, a Lawyer Jenkins.

Given an initial inclination to stay clear of the army during an unpopular war, any man's route into the service depends to a great degree upon his wherewithal and savvy. The ghetto dweller faces mountainous disadvantages by comparison with the rest of his draft-bait generation in avoiding the military in general, the war in particular. He doesn't go to college, hasn't mastered a critical trade, and hasn't studied the fine points of physical defects and hardship clauses, all of which can lead either to exemption from military duty, or to soft, behind-the-lines jobs once in it.

Moreover, the low-income Negro's inferior education leaves him unarmed against a skillful recruiter's shower of carrots and sticks. Available for dangling before recruits' eyes are, first of all, the purse, privileges and promotions aforementioned. Then comes the sleeper—"Choice, Not Chance," indicating that volunteering enables the recruit to select his assignment.

The selection costs a year and doesn't buy much. The signer often gains little more choice than appears at the finger tips of his brother who gets drafted for two years. "This man's army" differs very little in that respect from "This man's father's army." The infantry is still full of men who raised their hands to become clerks.

At recruiters' desks and at reception centers, the ghetto man's education points him toward the rice paddies. Tests given at both places determine where the army will use a man, and since the Negro is disadvantaged in general background, verbal skills and vocational training, he falls flat—which is to say he falls into the infantry—"Queen of Battle."

These factors do not imply a diabolical racist plot, as some super-militants of the civil rights movement suggest. They simply result from the confrontation of a socially isolated group with the demands of a war nobody wants to fight. Nobody, that is, with anything to lose.

The National Guardsman is the archetypal soldier with something to lose. If he didn't think his civilian position worth some sacrifice why wouldn't he submit to the draft and get it over with in two years, instead of prolonging the agony over six, in periodic parodies of martial rigor? Only by joining reserve programs can young men satisfy civilian ambitions and military obligations simultaneously.

It was the Guardsman who met the potential Black Hessian in the streets of Detroit, Milwaukee and Newark last summer. And the supreme irony of the confrontation was that in many instances the Negroes failed to realize who he was, or that they "could take his route" instead of going to "Nam" in his place. The sniper, the brick thrower, the looter, simply doesn't know who he's up against—doesn't know that the man with the bayonet or the obsolete M-1 on Main Street will probably never fight much farther away from home. If the connection were made, the riots might be worse.

One example of Negro ignorance on this score is a young Negro enlistee who went AWOL from Ft. Dix last July to be in his home town of Newark for the riots. Minster Hoops is a man of considerable verve and humor. He took his buddies' orders for color television sets before he left—and he filled them.

But for all Hoops's ghetto savvy, he returned to the barracks full of naive questions. Taking a white Guardsman aside, Hoops had asked him about his unit. Was it really never going to Vietnam? Was the period of active duty really less than six months? Hearing the answers, the Negro's face contorted in a smile bitter as a virgin's first taste of ignorance.

"Whitey wouldn't never tell us nothin' 'bout that thing, would he?" he hissed. Hoops had never heard of the Army National Guard, nor the Army Reserve, nor the Air National Guard, nor the Coast Guard Reserve—programs that shield hundreds of thousands of young men from the Vietnamese War—and Hoops's ignorance is typical. Failure of communication probably goes as far as discrimination to explain the Guard's lily-white status.

The riots merely compound the ironies. Uprisings in the ghetto lead to campaigns to preserve the Guard, as Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara learned when he first tried to reorganize it. In an age when local political capital can be accumulated by handling a riot with the "home guard" instead of the federal troops, municipal and state leaders argue the riots necessitate leaving the Guard intact. Gov. George Romney of Michigan apparently thought the distinction between federal and home troops vital enough to hesitate precious minutes as Detroit burned before reluctantly sounding the alarm that brought in Maj. Gen. John Throckmorton's 82nd Airborne to bolster the sagging, ill-disciplined Michigan National Guard.

Finally in the making of the Black Hessian there is the Selective Service law itself. Renewed largely unamended last year despite considerable flap, the draft's increased calls reflect the decision not to summon the reserves, and not to do away with deferments for the highly vocal college students.

Unable to skim the cream by eliminating deferments, the draft sank its tap into the silent, dark dregs. In December, 1966, Mr. McNamara announced the "liberalization" of qualifying mental aptitude scores for induction into the army. Thousands of low-income Negroes previously protected by their own ignorance now felt the weight—and learned of the opportunities—of the New Kind of War in Vietnam. The raising of the Black Hessians was under way, and continues.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Primer for Revolutionary Guerrillas

REVOLUTION IN THE REVOLUTION? Armed Struggle and Political Struggle in Latin America. By Régis Debray. Translated by Bobbye Ortiz. Monthly Review Press. 126 pp. $4. Grove Press. $1.95 paper.

EQBAL AHMAD

Mr. Ahmad, a Pakistani citizen, is assistant professor at the School of Labor and Industrial Relations, Cornell University. He spent two and a half years in North Africa (1960-63), first as a Rockefeller Fellow and later as associate director of the International Cultural Center. His piece on guerrilla warfare, "How to Tell the Rebels Have Won," appeared in The Nation, August 30, 1965.

It is an irritating, inspiring and saddening book. Nothing I have read in recent years conveys more vividly the hopes, the despair, the courage and the utter confusion of radicals in the Third World, particularly in Latin America. It is written by a young French intellectual of romantic disposition whose chief revolutionary experience, until the publication of this book, had been a sojourn in independent Cuba and acquaintance with Major Castro. The Cuban revolution influenced his theory; Castro encouraged its publication; his government initially assured its wide distribution. Later, Debray went to Bolivia as a journalist, joined Che, was arrested by the military, and has been sentenced to thirty years in prison. Had it not been for his important associations, this book would probably have attracted little serious attention as a theoretical work except by polemicists keen to engage in a debate.

It is not an easy book to summarize. Its most remarkable qualities—deep commitment, stirring romanticism, concern with the transformation of men into human, poetic, heroic figures—cannot be summarized. Furthermore, it is part panegyric and polemical, although mainly programmatic—theoretical if you wish. The underlying panegyric is for Castro. The polemics are against Latin American parties—Communists, Trotskyists. Reformists all!—who claim to be revolutionary but are actually selling out to and begging to be co-opted by the capitalist establishment. The theory paves the Latin road to revolution. These three elements are closely linked and interdependent.

The basic framework within which this book moves concerns the uniqueness of the "tactical content" of the Cuban among modern revolutions, and its importance as a model for Latin America. Debray believes that the Russian, Chinese and Vietnamese revolutions are poor examples for South American countries because each revolution must respond to its regional and national peculiarities. Learning from foreign examples can cost dearly through the adoption of tactics unsuited to local conditions. Hence, "one may consider it a stroke of good luck that Fidel had not read the military writings of Mao Tse-tung before disembarking on the coast of Oriente. . . ." Debray continues: "But once again in Latin America, militants are reading Fidel's speeches and Che Guevara's writings with eyes that have already read Mao on the anti-Japanese war, Giap, and certain texts of Lenin—and they recognize the latter in the former. Classical visual superimpositions, but dangerous, since the Latin American revolutionary war possesses highly special and profoundly distinct conditions of development which can only be discovered through a particular experience. In that sense, all the theoretical works on peoples war do as much harm as good."

Cuba under Batista, then, is assumed to represent conditions analogous to the rest of Latin America with the exception, perhaps, of Uruguay, the only country Debray identifies as one where "conditions for armed struggle do not exist at present." He speaks of but does not discuss the "objective and subjective" conditions of revolution. The existence of objective conditions is assumed, as is the commonality of political, social and economic configurations in Latin America. (From his examples it appears that he is concerned mainly with the Andean region.) The formation of subjective conditions, he presumes, will be hastened by the creation of guerrilla "focos" that will "cut off any possible retreat by declaring a war to the death." More disappointing is his admitted inability to come to grips with the Cuban revolution. In the introduction he decries the current clichés, the "flagrant oversights," the "conjuring trick" of "reducing" Cuba to a "golden legend"; makes a passionate plea against overlooking "the essential, the complex reality of the Cuban insurrectional process," its "inner working," its "how rather than the surface glitter." But, he adds with characteristic integrity, the "continuing lack of detailed history of the Cuban insurrectional process . . . constrains us to reduce our references to allusions whereas what is needed is a systematic investigation."

On the basis of these allusions and in the absence of any systematic comparisons between Cuba and other American nations, we are given a certain prescription for revolution which inverts the process of revolutionary warfare, flies in the face of past theory no less than practice, and even contradicts the earlier views of America's most articulate theorist of revolutionary war—Che Guevara.

Despite its faults as a theory of revolution, it is an important book, and not only as the latest formulation of Castroism. As an expression of the thirst after freedom from U.S. domination, the search for sovereignty and social justice, it is a touchstone of Latin aspirations. Its rejection of the traditional leftist parties as instruments of self-seeking politicians will appeal to the youth alienated by the sad performance of their elders. Above all, the tactical model which Debray eloquently outlines has a certain congruence with the psychological make-up and political culture of Latin America. One is reminded of the sacrificial heroisms of the Spanish Civil War; and of bullfights and matadors. There is the stress on individuals as units of action, the passion for living heightening the fascination with death, a profound sense of loneliness, enormous courage and unrelenting heroism. In this cultural symmetry lies perhaps the strength and popularity of Revolution in the Revolution?. Therein lies too the assurance that the legend of Che Guevara will grow among the people of Latin America and take its place second only to Bolívar's.

The core of Debray's tactical model is his stress on the primacy of military foco (a Spanish word used to describe the unitary focus of guerrilla operation) in the formative stages of an armed revolution. He believes that only a mobile, flexible, aggressive foco can create the conditions for gaining mass support and for political organizing. By inflicting losses on government forces it will subvert the legitimacy of the system, end the peasants' habit of obedience to it, and will eventually provide the protective shield necessary for organizing the mass. Successful military action "catalyzes the people's energy and transforms the foco into a pole of attraction." The best form of political work is armed attack on the enemy. De-bray states: "The destruction of a troop transport truck or the public execution of a police torturer is more effective propaganda than a hundred speeches. . . . The agitational and propagandistic impact resides in this very concentration of effects. A significant detail: during two years of warfare, Fidel did not hold a single political rally in his zone of operations." [Italics added.]

He draws a contrast with Vietnam: "Whereas in Vietnam the military pyramid of the liberation forces is built from the base up, in Latin America . . . it tends to be built from the apex down—the permanent forces first (the foco), then the semi-regular forces in the vicinity of the foco, and lastly or after victory (Cuba) the militia." This, Debray rightly claims, is a radical departure from the insurrectional process observable in China, Vietnam and Algeria; it also inverts the theories of such men as Mao, Giap and even Lenin. This view leads to the reversal of the stages of revolutionary development not only in the military but also in the political and organizational aspects of revolutionary warfare. The incumbent government is outflanked before it is outadministered. The military factor takes precedence over the political. Tactical considerations must precede questions of overall strategy. Political parties cannot initiate the guerrilla movement; rather, the guerrillas later galvanize into a party, and establish a Socialist state. The guerrilla (operational) and political leadership must be combined in the same man.

During the initial stage of insurrection, the most important factors in insuring the security and success of the foco are aggressiveness, mobility and secrecy (about its whereabouts, strength and supplies). It must also be concerned with the safety of the population within the zone of operations. These basic requirements of survival and success define the foco's relationship to the population, as well as its military and political style. Debray makes a convincing case against armed self-defense. He points out that in Colombia and Bolivia armed zones of peasant and workers' self-defense were defeated, in 1964 and 1965 respectively, with substantial losses to the population. He writes poignantly of the tragic isolation of Bolivian miners in revolt; in a hostile, cold, arid milieu, the scattered miners were starved, surrounded and subjugated, one isolated community after another. Unless it results from guerrilla victory and is protected by a mobile front, a self-defense zone will be isolated and destroyed or, left to itself, will be institutionalized and atrophied. "The failure of armed self-defense of the masses," says Debray, "corresponds on the military level to the failure of reformism on the political level."

Equally cogent are his arguments against guerrilla base areas whose establishment demands a combination of favorable circumstances—extensive territory without modern roads and rails, high population density, common border with a friendly country, weak enemy air power, numerical weakness of government forces—none of which is present in Latin America. Hence, during "the initial stage, the base support is in the guerrilla fighter's knapsack." The only viable alternative, then, is the mobile foco "independent of the civilian population, in action as well as in military organization; consequently it need not assume the direct defense of the peasant population. The protection of the population depends on the progressive destruction of the enemy's military potential; . . . if the principal objective of a revolutionary guerrilla force is the destruction of the enemy's potential, it cannot wait for the enemy to approach before taking the initiative. . . . In every case this objective requires that the guerrilla foco be independent of the families residing within the zone of operations."

Debray's foco theory does not reject organic ties with the civilians simply for the fear of exposing them to governmental repression, although it is undoubtedly the most attractive aspect of his study. Nor is it only a matter of concern with achieving maximum mobility and initiative. One discovers something deeper and disturbing—an awareness of distance from if not exactly a distrust of the rural population, an unadmitted estimation that the objective conditions for revolution do not exist in Latin America, total disbelief in the political processes and existing political parties as possible instruments for independence and social revolution and, above all, a desperate drive to create the revolutionary environment through armed action and thus to defeat the increasing interests of the U.S.

The foco is not only organically distinct but is also isolated from the population. Says Debray: "Various considerations of common sense necessitate wariness toward the civilian population and the maintenance of a certain aloofness." (He explains, however, that "this vigilance does not necessarily mean mistrust.") This feeling of isolation, as well as his estimation of the revolutionary environment, are most clearly expressed in the chapter on "Armed Propaganda." The foco begins in sparsely populated, highly dispersed regions because, he says, "no new arrival goes unnoticed in an Andean Village. . . . Above all else, a stranger inspires distrust. The Quechua or Cakchiquel (Mayan) peasants have good reason to distrust the 'outsider,' the 'white man.' . . ."

While arguing against involvement, during the first stages of insurrection, in political work among peasants, Debray indicates that the local governments enjoy legitimacy (he does not use this word; I am using it in the passive sense of legitimacy by tradition or by default) in the rural areas, while peasants regard the revolutionaries as alien. These passages are crucial to understanding his theory and deserve to be discussed at length:

The poor peasant believes, first of all, in anyone who has a certain power, beginning with the power to do what he says. The system of oppression is subtle: It has existed from time immemorial, fixed, entrenched, and solid. The army, the guardia rural, the latifundista's private police, or nowadays the Green Berets and Rangers, enjoy a prestige all the greater for being subconscious. This prestige constitutes the principal form of oppression. . . . The neo-colonial ideal is still to show force in order not to have to use it, but to show it is in effect to use it. [Italics added.]

The guerrillas are not dealing in Latin America "with a foreign expeditionary force, with limited manpower, but with a well established system of local domination. They [the guerrillas] themselves are the foreigners, lacking status, who at the beginning offer the populace nothing but bloodshed and pain." [Italics added.]

Also, incumbent regimes have been greatly improving their control, facilities, instruments of repression, and even their adjustive mechanisms. Highways have greatly expanded, skirting the jungle, and linking up countries and capitals; airstrips spot the formerly impenetrable tropical zones. United States sociologists and economists have been mapping out man and his milieu in detail, making available to their government employers hitherto unknown information. "Thousands of Peace Corpsmen have succeeded in integrating themselves in rural areas—some of them by dint of hard work, patience and at times real sacrifice—where they profit by the lack of political work by left-wing organizations. Even the most remote regions are today teeming with Catholic, Evangelical, Methodist, and Seventh-Day Adventist missionaries. In a word, all these close-knit networks of control strengthen the national machinery of domination." And of course, there are the special forces trained and equipped for counterinsurgency.

Three interdependent points emerge from the above quotations: (1) Debray's high estimation of the entrenched nature and increasing effectiveness of government control in rural areas; (2) his stress on power rather

...AND THEN THE NEW YORK FREE PRESS WAS CREATED.

The New York Free Press was created by Lyndon Baines Johnson, American Universities, The New York Police Department, Kennedy the Cop, the shake-down, the payoff, and white lies. As publisher of the New York Free Press, I hereby make the following New Year's Resolutions. 1) This paper will never cop out to anybody. We will create no liberal heroes. Neither Kennedy, Lindsay, McCarthy or any of today's "good guys" should ever feel safe with a Free Press. 2) The Democratic Reform Movement of New York City beware. We're going to make your betrayal of principle an important part of our city coverage. 3) Columbia University, we are not going to take your word that the C.I.A. contract disclosed by our staff was the only one you hold. We're still digging and we'll catch you again. 4) This newspaper will make a fight in 1968 to have every cop wear a name plate above his badge for identification purposes. 5) We will give our readers the most comprehensive, incisive and honest Arts Section that a great staff can produce. 6) This paper doesn't accept the morality that makes fuck a dirty word to be censored in a "responsible" press and Napalm a justifiable tool in winning an immoral war. 7) I promise to make all editorials short so as to allow as many views as possible to get into the paper. Please remember that our motto, "You Can't Trust Us," is the only protection we can offer our readers. As long as we stay uncommitted, you can trust us when we say "You Can't Trust Us."

Jack Banning

Nat Hentoff — "To be both really alive and persistently relevant, is to be a rarity among newspapers. The New York Free Press is a rarity."

Alan Schneider — "One of the great new voices in the theatre — John Lahr is a critic who understands the sounds and voices of the stage."

Paul Krassner — "Don't take my word for it. Read it."

Andy Warhol — "I like it. I really like it. Battcock's art articles are really good."

Ossie Davis — "Never before was an independent and courageous voice more necessary. The New York Free Press represents a literate conscience by its unrelenting probing of the American Establishment. Its greatest asset is its unpredictability."

Local Politico — "The New York Free Press's political coverage by Paul Rockwell is both irresponsible and dangerous."

Michelangelo — "J-C Soares' caricatures sometimes look very familiar."

NEW YORK FREE PRESS, N-1
200 W. 72nd St., N. Y., N. Y. 10023

Gentlemen,

I wish to take advantage of your offer which entitles me to a year's subscription to New York Free Press (52 issues) and the Soares poster above which will retail for $2.95 (3 feet deep x 4 feet wide).

☐ Enclosed is my check for $4. ☐ Please bill me.
(We will pay postage and handling charge if you enclose payment.)

☐ Send me.....additional posters at $2.95 each (plus 50¢ handling/postage).

Name

Address

City

State Zip

than on the revolutionary process ("disorienting social processes" in the "scientific" jargon) and the concomitant belief that the peasants' acceptance of government is based mainly on fear of its coercive apparatus; (3) his view that the revolutionary elite is considered alien by the peasantry, and that there is between them no commonality of interest on the basis of which a political hookup could occur. I do not know much about Latin America. Therefore, I cannot judge the validity of these assumptions; but it seems to me that although the foco theory is derived from the Cuban model, the above assumptions logically lead, given commitment to revolution, to its generalization for all South America; those not inexorably committed to seizure of power would probably seek different routes to sharing it.

The belief that peasant cooperation with the government results from the fear of its coercive power, leads logically to the primacy of the military foco as a means for subverting the government's legitimacy. As Debray says,

"unassailability cannot be challenged by words. In order to destroy the idea of unassailability—that age old accumulation of fear and humility . . . there is nothing better than combat." The feeling of isolation, of being considered alien by the peasantry, must necessarily mean that guerrillas, for their own survival, must avoid the populace until they believe they have proved their armed superiority over incumbent forces. Hence Debray's initial rejection of political work, including "armed propaganda," in villages; hence, too, the deep fear of betrayal, suspicion of every liaison man (peasant or guerrilla) as a potential traitor, and the three "golden rules"—constant vigilance, constant mistrust, constant mobility. (Contrast these with the famous Three Tasks of the Army, The Three Main Rules of Discipline and Eight Points of Attention.) A combination of the three views understandably produces a theory of revolutionary despair which relegates politics to a secondary position: says Debray: "The main point is that under present conditions the most important form of propaganda is military action Given the social, ideological and psychological conditions of the peasantry in the majority of Latin American countries, given the diverse intelligence agencies at the enemy's disposal (strongly reinforced since the Cuban Revolution), an agitational group whether armed or not will be watched, uncovered and liquidated: in embryo if necessary."

tion is virtually impossible." The party, then, cannot create or lead the guerrilla force. Rather, the guerrilla force under a centralized command will beget an eventual party: "The Vanguard party can exist in the form of guerrilla foco itself. The guerrilla force is the party in embryo." Debray seems very confident that the foco forms the natural nucleus for the development of party; his arguments are sadly reminiscent of the earnest, confident assertions and promises one heard in Ghardimou and Oujda from officers and men of the Algerian liberation army.

Debray's rhapsodizing about the virtuosity of life in the mountain, its liberating, resuscitating effects on man ["Class egoism does not long endure"; "Petty bourgeois psychology melts like snow under the summer sun"; "Bureaucratic faint-heartedness becomes irrelevant"; "Where better than in the guerrilla army could this shedding of skin and this resurrection take place"] is charming and familiar; his sense of wonderment at the courage and self-sacrifice of the guerrillas is understandable. But personal virtues and even group experiences do not easily transfer to national and public institutions. And statements such as "When the guerrilla army assumes the prerogatives of political leadership, it is responding to its class content and anticipating tomorrow's dangers. It alone can guarantee that the people's power will not be perverted after victory . . ." are too sweeping.

A thousand or so guerrillas did not make possible Cuba's transition from liberation to socialism; the post-Liberation alliance with Communists probably did. Today the specter of a stagnant, bureaucratizing Algeria under the liberation army haunts us. Without an operative commitment to a functioning and consistent ideology, and without institutions that would insure a degree of adherence to the principle of accountability, even guerrilla leaders can degenerate into self-seeking politicians, or the people's army can become a self-perpetuating junta.

As a theory Revolution in the Revolution? is radical but wrong. It corresponds closely to the theory of revolutionary warfare favored in Washington. It views revolutionary war "in its formative stages," as essentially in military terms. The civilian population is ignored until after a certain success has been achieved. Government's legitimacy is viewed in terms of coercion; hence military action becomes the chief instrument of subversion. The revolutionaries, considered "outsiders" by the population, tend to view the civilians as spectators who will join the winning side.

At places the coincidence of official American opinions with Debray's formulations are startling. When W. W. Rostow made his famous statement that

YOU SHOULD KNOW CANADA BETTER!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Editor: C. W. Gonick

Leading forum of Canadian opinion. Independent and lively.

Send $4.00 for a trial year's subscription—8 Big Issues

Write:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg, Canada

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FAMINE 1975! America's Decision:
Who Will Survive? by William and Paul Paddock (Little, Brown, & Co., $6.50) $5.20
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A
critique of American Foreign Policy
in the Cold War by David Horowitz
(Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.55
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by
Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose
Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ PRISON NOTES by Barbara Deming
(Grossman, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by
Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE NEW RADICALISM
by Christopher Lasch (Knopf, $6.95) $5.55

Remittance accompanying orders
should be made payable to THE
NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

1-29-68

the guerrillas enjoyed considerable advantage over the government because "its task is merely to destroy while the government must build and protect . . ." those who knew something about revolutionary warfare laughed at him. Debray, to my knowledge, is the first revolutionary writer to agree with Ros-tow: "The government must, since it is the government, protect everywhere the interests of the property owners; the guerrilleros do not have to protect anything anywhere."

These similarities between a revolutionary and counterrevolutionary theory are not coincidental. They stem from the fact that both start with the same basic assumptions about the nature of guerrilla warfare. Debray's "foco," I am afraid, is a tailor's fit for the American counterinsurgency program. Che Guevara's Bolivian campaign was an example of the pitfalls of the foco theory; it also proved how successful counterinsurgency can be against this kind of adventure.

I should quote Debray with strong agreement: "When the list of martyrs grows long, when every act of courage is converted into martyrdom, it is because something is wrong. And it is just as much a moral duty to seek out the causes as it is to pay homage to the murdered, imprisoned comrades."

A Most Uncommon Reader

COLLECTED ESSAYS. By Virginia Woolf. Harcourt, Brace & World. 4 vols. $5.95 each.

MARY ELLMANN

Mrs. Ellmann is currently preparing a book about women novelists for Harcourt, Brace & World.

While the products of creativity are generous, the state of creativity seems invidious when it is not incommunicable. Muttering darkly to herself in A Writer's Diary, Virginia Woolf almost conveys this painful state; but in her essays, whenever she appears before the public as Novelist Proper, she is constricted, confined like other dignitaries to either sententious or sublime gestures. And yet, no writer perhaps has ever met the same public more easily in the guise of Common Reader.

The critical statements of all novelists, of course, are oddly interesting, as a way of watching their efficient biases at work. Like mice looking for seeds in sawdust, they sift materials unerringly for those bits upon which their own talents may feed. But Virginia Woolf, whom we equate loosely with subjectivity, read books the way all we blotters read, with the impersonal, eclectic and passive motive of pleasure. Writing a novel was like being locked in a cell, a necessary but excruciating self-absorption. Reading was being let out. Gradually, her own imagination merged with the possibility of madness, and the imagination of others with sanity. When, as Leonard Woolf has reported, doctors suggested equanimity as they might suggest an ice pack or a Bandaid, she grew afraid of herself, and turned that poor long head of hers away from its first work. She thought to save herself by reading, and by writing quick, short, rational, "serene" articles—in fact, celestial book reviews.

Even earlier, in comparative health, she had divided existence neatly, as she divided Roger Fry, into "reason and sensibility," and respected both faculties. If anything, she respected the critical faculty more, since she felt it to be the weaker in herself. Her parents, the Leslie Stephens, had invited all the academic brains to dinner, where their daughter heard them, over fresh salmon, at their most sprightly and benign. Perversely, she continued to feel untrained for not having heard them in front of their blackboards.

She retained, as a result, a certain critical modesty. Her judgments are not timid or evasive, but they never swagger. There are none of those great round puffy pronouncements that eventually float, like dirigibles, into publishers' ads. Secure in her novelist's fame, Virginia Woolf nonetheless applied to her critical pieces an "insect-like conscience and diligence," feeling even for these essays "the weight of every word" in her fingers.

At the end of her life, she was still planning to go through everything English from Chaucer to Lawrence, "like a string through cheese." And consistently, one of her last professional experiences had a classic humility. An Ellen Terry essay was turned down by Harper's Bazaar and tried out again, as any enduring hack would have tried it, on another magazine.

Bad reviews of her own work gave her insomnia; by morning she could recite them. But writing her own essays she felt nothing alien or unnatural about them. Her aesthetic premises were simple: the universe was stable; from it, individual minds took impressions. A novel was the artful ordering of one's own chaotic impressions; criticism was the comprehension of others' orderings. The impressions or "perspectives" of other writers, then, were more easily governed than one's own—or rather, governed in advance. They too were spontaneous and irrational but, like ideal children, docile as well. The mind might play over them at will, giving one perspective one day's delighted and devoted attention, another perspective another day's.

In the end, four volumes of these spurts of attention had accumulated, and with them a critical effect which is not entirely agreeable. Just the number of separate short subjects is disconcerting. They seem static now, like rows of little scent jars on a shelf. Their variety alone makes them rather Addison-and-Steele-ish, flitting and gratuitous. Monday, a 1,500-word visit with Oliver Goldsmith; Tuesday, Sara Coleridge; Wednesday, the Gothic romance. We miss what we are now accustomed to: turbulence, an illusion, no doubt, of the argument's desperate necessity and of the subject's resistance to exegesis. Virginia Woolf's subjects stand still, waiting in line to be brushed and combed and bundled out the front door to the Times Literary Supplement. One longs for some one of them to turn intractable, rude, enigmatic. James Joyce so misbehaved, and (as it seems, inevitably) incomprehension of him fell into terms of deportment: a writer who had lost his conventions, who was uncertain whether to eat with his fork or his fingers. The novelist felt for his supposed quandary, even shared it; the critic, on the whole, preferred to describe the now subdued solutions of the past. These were amenable to interpretation: they responded readily to sensitive appreciation. But all too readily. The very polish of the essays seems their undoing, the loss of the subjects' vital, if raw and angular, complexities. Virginia Woolf's diary now, angular itself, harsh and unhappy, contains for us the more valid criticism.

But then all this suavity can't be for nothing. It is true that the essays are not revolutionary—they will not found a Woolf school of criticism. They lack the presence which an original method takes on, standing implacably, even opaquely, between the reader and the text. They have instead a decorous transparency. Over the years, they seem to have become somewhat more flexible and idiomatic; but the editor, Leonard Woolf, has obscured even this slight development by arranging the essays, not by the time at which they were written but by the time at which the subjects lived. A dubious principle, like planning a menu (apples, beets, catfish, dogfish, etc.) by following the alphabet.

At any rate, Virginia Woolf was ultimately dissatisfied too, wanting some new way, something in the essay (as in the novel) "less stiff and formal" than before. But still the balances, the antitheses, the mellifluousness prevailed. They seem now faintly archaic, too pretty. On the death of Gibbon:

And as he sank into a sleep that was probably eternal, he could remember with satisfaction the view across the plain to the stupendous mountains beyond; the white acacia that grew beside the study window, and the great work which, he was not wrong in thinking, will immortalize his name.

Of course, one might say here that Gibbon is infectious, that these frozen ripples are caught from the subject. But there really is a problem of immediate eloquence throughout. Even figures of speech arrive too promptly: why, because Crabbe was the son of working people and took an interest in weeds, must he at once be called a weed? Clever, of course—also too soon, and too much like that English identification of corpses by class, rather than by sex or age or warts and moles. "One hesitates to call Jane Eyre a lady."

Still, all the world can't be Roundhead. The essays are often amusing, witty, apt, the delicate darts all on target. That range of thought in which the past shapes itself into comic and yet engaging emblems of life, is perfectly rendered: Laetitia Pilkington, for example, the rowdy little littératrice who knew Swift and too many less distinguished men, or Lady Dorothy Nevill, who was the first hostess in London to serve guinea pigs for lunch. (Efforts have, after all, been made with that cuisine.) It is not all indulgence, either. The strangeness of Lewis Carroll, "on the beach at Eastbourne, with little girls whose frocks he pinned up with safety pins," the absurdities of Aurora Leigh, the tedium of Arnold Bennett's urban villas, the hollowness ("all shell") of Sinclair Lewis' Babbitt—unmistakably, someone has read with rigor as well as taste. And even when (as often) Virginia Woolf's generalizations are truisms, her particulars excuse them. Everyone knows that social relations shift, but the "homely illustration" is still news:

The Victorian cook lived like a leviathan in the lower depths, formidable, silent, obscure, inscrutable; the Georgian cook is a creature of sunshine and fresh air; in and out of the drawing room, now to borrow the Daily Herald, now to ask advice about a hat.

Georgian cooks and Georgian critics are so rare now, it would be wrong to dismiss them.

Visions of Black Genocide

THE MAN WHO CRIED I AM. By John A. Williams. Little, Brown & Co. 403 pp. $6.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL

Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

Henry James told us to judge not the intention of a novel but its execution. We should grant the novelist "his idea, his donnée," and measure how well he interrelates the parts of his work, for, James says in "The Art of Fiction:"

A novel is a living thing, all one and continuous, like any other organism, and in proportion as it lives will it be found, I think, that in each of the parts there is something of each of the other parts.

But I wonder what James might have made of John A. Williams' The Man Who Cried I Am, a novel which hangs together but founders on simplistic assumptions.

Williams has tried to write the big inside-black-America novel. He traces the high points (very high) in one black novelist's life, Max Reddick, and, along the way, gives the word on New York's literary power structure, black-white sex and political perversion in high (the highest) places; finally he reveals a Pentagon contingency plan to exterminate 20 million blacks! All of this rides on a level of melodrama far above the plausible. Nothing casual or trivial happens to anybody in Williams' world; we move from cancer to cannibalism, from sodomy to suicide, from masochism to murder. Apparently there are no hangnails in hell!

His style matches his reach in this internally consistent novel. Sometimes he manages a Fitzgerald-like stylistic shimmer, but more often he pushes too hard. Scenes are roughly sketched, in excessive imagery—"overhead shells flew, sounding like the taffeta skirt of a kooch dancer"—and monologues are prolonged by ponderous accusations against Mister Charlie (what "you" did to "me"). Dialogue is consistently implausible. Magrit, Max's Dutch wife, leaves both him and the U.S. with a piece of rhetorically balanced invective which must rank high among literary lines that were never said by anybody:

"Enough of this crazy land," she hissed at herself in the mirror, "where everyone speaks in superlatives but exists in diminutives."

In keeping with his deadly "serious" concerns—white exploitation and black survival—Williams avoids any tone brushing humor. Once he almost slips into wit. Max, lonely in New York, says to himself: "Eight million people in the city and not one of them had thought to call." This may seem funny—that he is putting himself on—but when he adds, "Not a single one," we can see that Max is a creation incapable of self-irony.

Williams' characterizations are bold, without ambivalence, because he is interested only in characters to the extent that they demonstrate thematic propositions. This works well enough when his characters are involved in situations which stay within reasonable contexts, as when Harry Ames (Richard Wright) is nominated for, but denied, a literary prize, and members of the Jewish-liberal-publishing community rush to his defense both to ease their own consciences and insure financial pieces of a hot property.

But Williams' polemical concerns sometimes make him ignore the extent to which people make events, as when Reddick forgets about his own role and holds white society—which had dangled and denied middle-class respectability—solely responsible for the abortion and death of a girl he had impregnated and misled. She would not marry him unless he had a good job; he promised but couldn't get one that satisfied him; she resorted to abortion and accidentally died. Williams apparently feels that noting the degree of Max's guilt for her death would be quibbling, avoiding a larger truth—the way white values maim and destroy the best blacks. We could grant this contention and still complain that his insistence on it as the only truth in this situation is nonsense.

Plot, style and characterization fuse in an embodiment of big (the biggest) ideas. On the evil of man—"Ah, the world got what it deserved." On American lusts—"Americans made their cars like women." On Stevenson's losses to Eisenhower—"Intelligence is the enemy of the American people." On black-white love—"It was one thing to sleep with white women, but quite another to marry them." It may be valid to sacrifice technique for theme if you have something to say, but nothing should be given up for such roasted chestnuts.

The biggest idea in the novel, the one from which all else hangs, is not, like those above, part of the routine, contemporary, middle-brow liturgy; Williams' central theme is, in this context, strikingly original and utterly simplistic. White society is so bigoted and self-protective that it evolves "King Alfred," a plan to exterminate its Negroes. Williams' conspiracy theory posits an interlocking directorate in the white establishment to put off and, if necessary, wipe out unruly blacks.

Of course anything is possible. God knows what contingencies are planned for in the Pentagon! But it is an unlikely possibility that deflects attention from the ways power and prejudice actually work. Inevitable black genocide is a risky thing to base your whole vision upon. It is, too, based upon a questionable view of history as cyclical—what happened to Jews and Gypsies in the forties will happen to Negroes in the sixties. This theme does serve, however, to motivate an ending which is as explosive and thin as that in any James Bond film. It also helps to justify the simplifications and exaggerations of his fictional elements. Each part contributes to the whole. Excessive style supports extravagant theme which, in turn, simplifies characterizations and plot. It is "all one and continuous," but not, I think, "a living thing."

James said, in the same essay: "The only reason for the existence of a novel is that it does attempt to represent life." Williams attempts a just and painful representation of "life," but fails because he takes a valid perception—white savagery to blacks—and rides his idée fixe into the ground. It is true, his novel demonstrates, that white power is a murderous, cold power, but Williams might reread his Baldwin and Bellow to see how limiting prejudice is as a controlling vision. In "Equal in Paris" Baldwin discovered himself beyond racial persecution but still subject to the deepest kind of human antagonism. And Augie March realized, when kids beat him up and called him "Christ-killer," that had he not been Jewish they would have found some other reason.

Baldwin and Bellow show an understanding of "life" that is more various and penetrating, perhaps even more damning, than Williams' black, bleak novel.

finally convinced that he is going to die, as the Queen remarks, "at the end of the play"? He cries out: "Why was I born if it wasn't forever? . . . I came into the world five months ago. I got married three months ago." He didn't learn or accomplish what he should have: "I never had the time, I never had the time." He is outraged, inconsolable, amazed and utterly at a loss to conceive of the mystery and meaning of his existence.

The play is a beautifully written dramatic poem. Funny, unrealistic and altogether real. Is it therefore a tragedy or yet another black comedy? The paradox and charm of the play are that out of his despair, and perhaps to his astonishment, Ionesco has written a hymn of praise to every instant, event and ordinary phenomenon of life. In a delicious exchange, the King bids the rather downtrodden housemaid to describe her daily routine. The details are drab, but he finds rapture and excitement in each of them. The girl concludes, "a bad life, Sire," to which he replies, "Life can never be bad. It is a contradiction in terms." We must learn to appreciate everything—even to the color of a carrot. In brief, a frightening and lovely play, an inspiration.

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

Exit the King (a literal translation of the French title would be The King Dies) is for me the APA's most satisfying production: it is in fact a good production (at the Lyceum).

There have been more ambitious APA productions (War and Peace, Pantagleize); some have been more immediately engaging (You Can't Take It With You); some have been somewhat more evenly cast (The Show Off); but Ionesco's Exit the King seems to me its most complete realization of a dramatist's intention and scenic idea. Ellis Rabb as director has understood the play thoroughly and has found the right means to project it concretely.

The APA production is superior to the one I saw in Paris, though Jacques Mauclair who played the King there and directed it conveyed a childlike pathos that was most affecting. I saw the play again in Warsaw where the director, an intellectual who had a literary understanding of the Theatre of the Absurd, did not know how to direct. In London, with Alec Guinness playing the King in a production staged by the admirable George Devine who did so well with The Chairs, the heavy-handed performance conveyed very little. Guinness seemed more concerned with his own characterization than with the play's essence.

Exit the King is Ionesco's most sympathetic work. The Lesson and The Chairs are perhaps more original, in the sense that they bear the unmistakable stamp of the author's personality. Rhinoceros is more acceptable to a wide public—more "entertaining"—but Exit the King is the most integral expression of the playwright's inner being. It is also the closest to our own usually unavowed trepidation.

Ionesco has an ineradicable preoccupation with death. Unlike the Spaniards, it haunts him, not as something majestically awful but almost as a child trembles at the unknown dark. His fear is more akin to a universal bewilderment than to the perception of death so commonly transcribed in literature as something ominous, mournfully, heroically tragic, or just crushing. Americans usually evade or gloss over the subject altogether.

The treatment is extremely simple. The King who is dying in this relatively short play is Berenger, the name Ionesco gives to most of his little men, the nonhero. He is not Everyman but Anyman. He exists only for himself; he is central to everything he beholds. In a wonderful passage he is told that he "invented gunpowder and stole fire from the gods. . . . He discovered the way to make steel . . . he made the first balloon, and the zeppelin. . . . He built Rome, New York, Moscow and Geneva. He founded Paris. He created revolutions, counterrevolutions, religion, reform and counterreform. . . ." To which the King's maid observes, "You wouldn't think it to look at him."

How does His Majesty react when

Richard Easton is excellent as the King: foolish, terrified, his eyes full of startled incomprehension. He moves from an absurd effort at pride and grandeur to the puling impotence of a sickly baby and again to the recovery of strength

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

1-29-68

226 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

in the contemplation of the glory he seems to have missed.

Eva Le Gallienne, the Queen, is all hard reason and an oracle of disaster. The actress' velvet voice and ever-present aspiration to nobility take on tones of tartness and severe irony I have never heard from her before. Pamela Payton-Wright brings plainness, not without humor and buried enticement, to the role of the court chambermaid.

The point to be made clear about the production is not the total success of any of its constituent elements but the soundness in the conception and execution of the whole. This includes Rouben Ter-Arutunian's setting in electrically silvered cellophane which contributes to an atmosphere of lightness within a realm of shades. The "picture" has the bare look of an expiring world where creatures once men have turned into wraiths.

Exit the King may not find as much favor as have other APA productions this season: its theme and form may encounter resistance. But the intelligent playgoer must not fail to see it.

Charles Dyer's Staircase (Biltmore Theatre) can be set down as a clever play. There is some question, however, whether its cleverness is commendable.

It is a domestic comedy. The fact that its locale is a suburban London barbershop and that the husband and wife are two males does not alter the character of the entertainment, though it makes a difference in its complexion.

The play is largely given over to bickering, needling and finally to a little smooching and cuddling between the couple. There is very little incident. The dramatic thread—if it can be called that—is the possibility that the "husband" (the predominantly aggressive one of the pair) has been summoned to court for having appeared in drag at a dive and having sat on a young man's lap for a moment. The accused's alibi is that he was only doing a bit of his old pantomime act. He was once a variety hall performer and also claims to have played Shakespeare. He has even retained his Equity card, though he has long since had no employment other than as the second barber in his consort's establishment. We never learn the verdict on his case.

What justifies calling the play "clever" is the fast and funny dialogue. The humor is low camp bitchy. It did not make me laugh much, but the audience at the final preview found most of it uproarious. Still the writing is fluent and bounces with a certain stage agility. It provokes delight in those who relish a lather of the ill-concealed hostility that is abundant in the present-day public. It takes the form here of a parody on the mischievous volubility of certain queens. And the conceit of the eternal ham is always a sure source of jokes.

Another aspect of the play's cleverness is the introduction of pathos and, remotely, of social significance. For the cruelty of the situation—the articulate and mercurial "husband" constantly ridicules his mate—is softened by the realization that these two unfortunate blokes are lonely. Their shop is the opposite of fashionable. They depend on each other, need each other desperately, just as any isolated and ostracized couple may do. The further thought which might occur to the "better audience" that may see the play (as it did in London where the play was presented by the Royal Shakespeare Company with Paul Scofield) is that even the least glamorous homosexuals are as worthy of compassion as you and I. Their peculiarity does not make them any less than human, and are we not all a sorry lot! But this is only a dodge and the fun the play offers is on the superficial and somewhat hypocritical level which I have indicated.

The direction by Barry Morse and the acting are on the whole very good. Milo O'Shea (the Bloom of the filmed Ulysses), through the simplicity, effortlessness and lack of gimmicky alloy in his performance, makes us sense the gentler man's forlornness, mingled as it is with unforced humor and warmth of feeling. O'Shea raises the play above its obvious tonality. Eli Wallach, on whom the text places the greater burden, works hard carrying it. He must undertake the posturing of the spoiled and spiteful Thespian, as well as the symptomatic mannerisms of the flagrant queen. His is an altogether efficient and ingratiating job which is at its best when the script permits him to display either funk or fondness.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

The Scandinavians are greatly preoccupied with sex, but they can't seem to get the hang of it. Indeed, it appears to addle their wits, just as the old tracts for boys warned us it would. If their films can be taken as evidence, the Swedes and the Danes in particular are so stimulated by their celebrated "new freedom" in genital matters that they are in a state of perpetual rut, frustrated by the very availability they have established, and laboriously seeking new embellishments to a game whose moves are finite and long since thoroughly explored. And the worst of it is that they approach the delights with no glint of humor, seeming like mourners in glutony.

The most recent example is Venom, from the Danish director Knud Leif Thomsen. The deus ex averno of this item is a young sexual racketeer who subjects a bourgeois family to a kindergarten repertory of nihilistic frightfulness that stuns them into the compliance of Pavlov's dogs. Anyone can do the devil's work if his victims persist in throwing him fat pitches—I have not seen anything like this since McCullough used to sit in a stage box and feed lines to Bobby Clark. The wicked fellow enthralls the daughter of the house with a small assortment of clichés as to the perversity of chastity, leaps upon her, and photographs her transports with a handheld camera (a feat of dexterity that was not entirely explained). Her parents quite see that the chap is unsuitable, but cannot scotch his game because they are themselves tormented by the itch of honeymoon nostalgia.

All this is plausible in a way—a great many adults are sexually retarded and a great many parents have little success in regulating the conduct of their daughters. But plots that depend on nobody taking a sensible step make me impatient. The step may not work, but in the interest of dramatic responsibility it should at least be tried. In the end, the father does throw the youth bodily out of the house, and his photographic paraphernalia after him. This, I believe, was intended to indicate moral defeat, but it occurred to me that if it had been done earlier we could all have gone home sooner.

The direction of Venom is pedestrian, plodding along from point to point with the prolixity of slick-magazine romance. The playbacks of the young man's blue cinema documentary of himself and friends at sports have been deleted with a broad X which eliminates everything but an occasional arm and torso. This permits the audience to conjure up exploits that Mr. Thomsen could not possibly have shown and might have found inconvenient to film. Even so, the picture dwells on crotch shots, exposed breasts and anatory wrestling to a degree that justifies the exhibitor in posting an "adults only" notice and enjoying a profitable run.

Further south on the Continent people seem to be on better terms with sex. They are by no means indifferent to it, but treat it as a comparatively old and familiar phenomenon and do not become asthmatic at the suggestion that its presence is about to be felt. Thus an Italian director new to the American screen. Marco Bellocchio, offers in China Is Near a picture that uses sex lavishly, and wittily, to demonstrate how people get the better of one another in this adequately wicked world. Mr. Bellocchio's business is social satire on a theme that has preoccupied the Latins from the start: that the arrogantly rich and powerful are creatures of lust and illusion who will inevitably be toppled by their equally lustful but much more realistic servants. The rich in this case are a brother and sister in their middle years, he a bungling candidate for Socialist office, she a woman of powerful will and appetites, who will bed with almost any man but thinks no man good enough to marry. The servants, themselves lovers, are aide and secretary to the candidate. A younger brother of the family is a junior functionary of the Church and a Maoist radical, whose exploits give a sardonic counterpoint to the film and supply its title.

The pairings and pregnancies of China Is Near are too complex for convenient summary, and though the frame is familiar enough, the spectator should not be deprived of his own encounter with Mr. Bellocchio's interplay. What I want to praise are the methods and standards of the film. The director's attitude toward narrative is one of quick-minded impatience. He never carries a scene beyond the point where its outcome has become obvious, and the following scene almost invariably picks up a few steps beyond the situation toward which the previous one was clearly heading. It takes a few minutes to catch on to this technique, but the motive is not quirky self-indulgence—the ellipses give the film a wonderfully light and rapid pace, in elegant harmony with the worldly amorality of the proceedings. Then too, the director gets splendidly informative, though quietly stated, performances from his cast, particularly Glauco Mauri and Elda Tattoli as brother and sister, and Paolo Graziosi and Daniela Surina as the proletariat climbing the ladder of sex. They are people, not types, yet what they represent and where they fit in projects vividly even to an audience unfamiliar with the conventions of Italian politics and the manners of Italian society. The upper class is hard, their inferiors are tough; the strife between them is formidable, engrossing and repeatedly hilarious. The photography of the film is masterful; it never calls attention to itself with contrived shots or obtrusive effects, but its cameras gather visual details and allusions with an efficient energy that seems to absorb you into the milieu. I got the "feel" of the place with a rapidity and sureness that gave me the stimulating sensation of being brighter than usual.

China Is Near appeals to its viewer's wits, humor and experience with a relaxed assumption that it will not appeal in vain. It is devoid of illusions about human behavior, but, unlike Venom, not without respect for human individuality or pleasure in the human comedy. It names its spades without bluster or leering. It is a picture for adults, all right, but no one demeans himself by saying so.

RECORDS

BENJAMIN BORETZ

DVORAK: Symphonies 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9 with overtures: Hussite, Amid Nature, My Home, Carnival, Othello. London Symphony Orchestra: Istvan Kertesz, cond. London CS 6523, CS 6524, CS 6525, CS 6526, CS 6511, CS 6495, CS 6527.

This collection is of far more than historical or repertorially novel interest and value. The abundant compositional intelligence and craft revealed from the very first of Dvorak's symphonies, and their progressive development toward individuality and mastery in terms of essentially traditional resources, demonstrate a true musical professionalism that has always projected a remarkable kind of musical experience, a kind that is a special dimension in the work of Tchaikowsky, Ravel, Debussy and even Stravinsky. And at a time of intensive journalistic support for compositional amateurism and vacuity, the purity with which music like Dvorak's generates the sense that musical "content" arises uniquely from the shaping of individual musical events into significant musical relations has particular instructive force.

Thus one finds in Dvorak's very first symphony a strong association with Beethoven via Mendelssohn, through which nevertheless is revealed some surprisingly original ideas and a remarkable awareness of the critical compositional dimensions. In fact, surface "radicalism" is perhaps more evident in that symphony than in any of the later works, from the special ensemble continuities of the second movement (particularly the way sounds of quite different sonorous appearance emerge from within one another), the rather far-reaching contrasts articulated out of continuous unfolding in the third movement, and the strikingly dissonant abrasions of cross-reference, of an almost Verklarte-Nacht-like quality, near the very end. And despite evident trouble in controlling transitions and in producing development without overrepetition and overelabo-ration, the Second Symphony is even more impressive for its handling of a highly "advanced" vocabulary with consummate security and for its boldness in creating continuity. Here, the second movement is particularly interesting for the originality of the sonorities that emerge in the course of elaboration, most notably the writing for solo piccolo and the transparent wind-ensemble passages.

The Third and Fourth Symphonies demonstrate a new awareness of the expanded possibilities for cogency and internal complexity within an externally more limited framework; and the Fifth and Sixth arrive at full maturity with their realization of the possibilities of tonal structure on a total, intermovemental scale, along with a virtuosity in the invention and intercombination of sonority and texture that approach Dvorak's probably most completely realized work, the Eighth Symphony.

Throughout, the London Symphony's execution is exemplary, often quite brilliant; and Kertesz's preparation and understanding seen consistently competent. For the Ninth Symphony, Klemperer's performance is rather more special in its sonorous and connective aspects; and here, too, Kertesz's tempo relations are not as precise as elsewhere.

Of the overtures, the Othello is a much more deeply developed work than the others, but their multiple inclusion is a worthwhile adjunct to an altogether superior addition to the recorded 19th-century literature.

STRAVINSKY: Jeu de Cartes. Symphony in C. Orpheus. Symphony in Three Movements. London Symphony; Colin Davis, cond. Philips 900113 and 900153.

Les Noces and other vocal instrumental works. Pierre Boulez, cond. Nonesuch 71133.

Pulcinella. Soloists, Orchestre de la Suisse romande; Ernest Ansermet, cond. London 25978

The need for young conductors who conduct Stravinsky in the Stravinsky tradition is as obvious as are the dilemmas they must initially face in presenting their performances contemporaneously with Stravinsky's own—which, despite every possible caveat as to conductorial or executive deficiencies, remain definitive. The present recordings of works from the heart of the "classical" Stravinsky literature by Colin Davis should, it seems to me, be considered primarily in terms of their implications and promise in this respect, and spared the invidious comparisons that unavoidably arise. However, such comparisons are important to record purchasers interested only in a superior representation of a particular composition. Thus, I still

PERSONALS

LAWYERS WANTED

Excellent opportunity available — Research Assistant of Legal Services Program on Navajo Indian Reservation. Position entails performing intensive back-up research for the Director and other staff members; formulating and maintaining current a handbook of substantive of federal, state and tribal laws for use of all attorneys, assisting in formulation and conduct of community legal education program; drafting all appellate briefs, drafting proposed federal, state or tribal legislation and participating in development of staff training material.

High competence and commitment to dauntless advocacy of indigents indispensable. Arizona or New Mexico license preferred. Two or more years of experience as appellate court clerk or private research and drafting preferred.

Salary: $8,000 to $10,000 per annum. Housing allotment. Position at Central Office, Window Rock, Arizona.

Send resume and sample of writing to:

Theodore R. Mitchell, Director
DINEBEHNA NAHILNA BE AGADITAH, INC.
P.O. Box 368,
Window Rock, Arizona 86515
Telephone: 602/871-4151

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)

"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 885-0070

PHYSICIAN AND LAYMAN wanted in Vietnam to select war-injured children for evacuation to U.S. for surgery. Minimum 6 months each. Adequate stipend. Contact Mrs. Smith, Committee of Responsibility, 60 Madison Avenue, N.Y.C. (212) 889-4210

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE
Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychodelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 28 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

DISCUSSION GROUP meets weekly, members' homes, Manhattan. Vital, controversial issues of Human Relations, Politics, Psychology, Religion. All viewpoints represented. High I.Q., articulateness, requisites. CA 9-6663

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

WE HAVE BEEN BETRAYED—Our '64 vote was for Peace—Impeach Johnson, recall war supporters; also HOFFA FOR PRESIDENT and WASH OUT WASHINGTON on 6" ruler and 1-1/4" wood discs. 12/$1, 100/$5 (circulars, balloons, bumper strips, telephone dialers, etc.). Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151

McCarthy in '68, Reagan & Lassie in '68, Johnson for Ex-President, RFK in '68, Dump Johnson in '68, Kill for Peace king-size bumper strips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802, Chicago, Illinois 60690

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS!

ALL change of address notices, orders for subscriptions and other correspondence, should be sent to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue,
New York, N.Y. 10014

believe Philips is performing an important service in allowing Mr. Davis this exposure. This seems particularly so because Davis, after a catastrophic beginning with a monstrously distended recording of Oedipus Rex, now appears as, possibly, an English conductor in the Adrian Boult tradition of responsible professionalism. In general, these recordings reveal rather careful study and duplication of Stravinsky's own ideas of the pieces, with the difference in every case being that Davis tends to produce his coherences in terms of the extrusion of external "shape" and "impulsion" rather than from the uniquely particular qualities generated from the interior in Stravinsky's own performances. The achievement of clarity through sluggishness noticeable in the earlier of the two recordings (Symphony in C and Jeu de Cartes) is remarkably rectified in the Symphony in Three Movements and Orpheus. The London Symphony, again, demonstrates superior ensemble and solo virtuosity, particularly in complex passages such as the figurational counterpoint of the second movement of the Symphony in C, the first movement of the Symphony in Three Movements, and the many treacheries, hidden and evident, of Orpheus.

Pierre Boulez's performance of Les Noces is, on more significant grounds, still more problematic. For while harmonic articulation is not an evident concern of Boulez, the transparency of texture and precision of duration he achieves are unmatched in any previous recording, to the extent that many previously lost details (solo voices counterpointing against sustained ensemble voices, for example) are now brilliantly lucid. Yet the result of this kind of precision is, in the absence of the other, accentual nondifferentiation, so that Stravinsky's long-spanned rhythmic profiles never emerge from the multitude of single durations. Thus, though more of Les Noces may be audible in this performance, it may not be coherently enough audible to warrant recommendation of the recording to the inexperienced listener.

At the other extreme, Ernest Ansermet's performance of Pulcinella is inaccurate at best, quite incoherent at worst, and featureless throughout. The orchestra has rough going, stumbling over or stepping on most of Stravinsky's deft accents, but the singers, despite all discouragement, manage a respectable representation of their parts.

TELEMANN: St. Matthew Passion. Theo Altmeyer, Horst Günter, Sena Jurinac, Franz Crass, soloists; Lucerne Festival Choir, Swiss Festival Orchestra; Kurt Redel, cond. Philips PHS 2-994.

Telemann's Passion is so one-dimensional and translucent next to the multi-leveled obliquities of the Bach Passions that, perhaps because they are projected through essentially the same syntactical framework, it is difficult to avoid a priori imputation of triviality to what is really skillful, intelligent and articulate music. Yet this very competence makes one all the more forcibly aware of the limitations: the single metricality and pitch non-density of the chorales; the rather unvarying repertory of techniques, whose application never seems "particular" to the moment, but simply "available" or "characteristic," and the resultant non-emergence of any new techniques to cope with special situations; and, most obvious of all, the almost completely metrical prosody, for which the fantastic ellipses of Bach that constantly extend long lines against the immediate fluctuations of local articulation seems a lost, or perhaps never noticed, art. The performance is as prettily sung, played and recorded as the work is composed.

BERG: Wozzeck. Walter Berry, Isabel Strauss, Fritz Uhl, Carl Doench, vocal soloists; Chorus and Orchestra of the Paris National Opera; Pierre Boulez, cond. C.B.S. 32 21 0002.

As a whole, this performance approaches an accurate representation of the textual and compositional content of Wozzeck, an accomplishment quite beyond the scope of either of the previous recordings. The old Mitropoulos recording was almost tragic in its executive inadequacies, through which some idea of the music struggled to emerge, while Böhm's recent DGG performance was fluent enough to suggest the absence of an awareness that an idea of any sort ought to emerge. Boulez's performance achieves its unique position primarily by its recognition and projection of the special timbral-figurational-rhythmic complexes that are the remarkable "characterizations" in the work's extraordinary music-dramatic structure, in the clarity of "voices," instrumental and human, in the texture (thus avoiding the fatal "merging" that homogenizes Böhm's performance into conventional Germanism, and overwhelms Mitropoulos' into incoherence), and—perhaps most striking—in the accuracy of dynamic detail. But the singing is ordinary: Mack Harrell's Wozzeck and Frederick Jagel's Captain (in the Mitropoulos recording) remain unapproached. The orchestral playing, in both sonority and ensemble, is rather undistinguished—a respect in which the Böhm recording remains superior. However, as a controlled and intelligible performance of a universally acknowledged 20th-century classic, this recording fills an obvious gap in the recorded literature. The fact that it could do so at this late date is astonishing.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1234

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Those who are afraid to enjoy life should be served right. (7,6)
- 9 Purloined by Othello's trash collector?
- 10 The design of chairs can make life sweeter with it. (9)
- 11 Princeton coed? (7)
- 12 Doesn't advance feline attitudes, at times. (5,2)
- 13 Rocks in a soporific vein. (5)
- 14 The railroad's equivalent to steerage quarters? (6,3)
- 16 Sunday dinner, perhaps, has naught about it arranged for the religious teacher. (9)
- 18 Union leader of the North, off at a place of involuntary exile. (5)
- 19 Arch suggestion the result of such winning ways? (7)
- 21 What some do when tired of the sentence? (7)
- 22 Tertiary division. (9)
- 23 Beverage plant. (5)
- 24 This has reached the saturation point in Utah. (5,4,4)

DOWN:

- 1 Involved in the proper name for funding? (14)
- 2 Out-of-uniform fighter? (9)
- 3 Rings for the warden types! (7)

- 4 These are more natural surroundings than a 5. (5)
- 5 In a Windy City ballplayer, a height maintained during early development.
- 6 Sold only on medical prescription. (7)
- 7 They're not capable of rational explanation. (5)
- 8 There's no come-on with such a type. (14)
- 14 The area of drainage. (9)
- 15 Is there no waiting here for food? (9)
- 17 One of the things some people look for in trying on a jacket? (7)
- 18 Obstinate and tough crowd. (4-3)
- 20 Part of the Atlantic in gale weather, dangerous to pilots. (5)
- 21 Certainly not a men's college alumnus from the old country. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1233

ACROSS: 1 Whippet; 5 Salamis; 9 Example; 11 Trier; 12 and 15 down Duncan; 13 Denim; 14 Senecas; 16 Reforms; 18 Greener; 21 Uproots; 24 Endow; 27 Chair; 28 Million; 30 Daybeds; 31 Throned. DOWN: 1 Wreaths; 2 Italian; 4 and 10 The Ides of March; 5 Spooner; 6 Lamed; 7 Mariner; 8 Schemes; 17, 26 and 29 Formidability; 18 Gleamed; 19 End play; 20 Reminds; 21 Updraft; 22 Ovation; 23 Strayed; 25 and 3 White paper; 27 Crier.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

EL GRITO—JOURNAL OF CONTEMPORARY MEXICAN-AMERICAN THOUGHT. Quarterly. Articles, short stories, satire, poetry, art, history. Limited supply of first issue remains. $4.00 year. $1.00 sample copy. Quinto Sol Publications, P.O. Box 9275, Berkeley, California

Read THE NATIONAL CALL—For Dissenters United. A psychological and philosophical approach. For sample copy send stamped envelope. Box 381, Marietta, Ohio 45750

THE WAR ON CAMPUS

A Special Issue of THE NATION
December 18, 1967

ATTENTION STUDENT ORGANIZATIONS

Copies of this special issue can be obtained at the following bulk-order rates:

100 copies, $25; 200 copies, $40;
500 copies, $75 — plus shipping
charges. Check or money order must accompany orders; shipping
charges will be billed separately.

Write: Paul Russell

The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave.,
N.Y., N.Y. 10014

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

TRAVEL

CULTURAL SUMMER TOURS in depth to socialist countries. For professionals, students, artists, writers. Write American Dialogue Magazine, 32 Union Sq., N.Y.C. 10003

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Free offer to readers of this issue:

We'll send, to any friends you name, the next four issues of The NATION—absolutely free of cost or obligation. And with no pesky promotional hoopla, just a letter from our publisher explaining why we're doing it. We want your friends to try reading The NATION, for one month, at our expense.

Let me introduce:

N 1-29

NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP.....

NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP.....

NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP.....

NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP.....

NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP.....

I understand you'll send The NATION free for four weeks to three or more people listed above—without promotional hoopla.

You may ☐ may not ☐ use my name.

REWARD:

—I'm a subscriber. Please send me, free, J. K. Galbraith's new report, HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM.

—I'm not a subscriber. Please send me, free, the next four issues of The NATION.

MY NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP.....

—Please enter my subscription, or extend my present subscription, 12 months. Enclosed is $10.

Among our present friends, who have taken time to congratulate The NATION on its work, are such unlike and important figures as Mayor John Lindsay of New York and Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia.

If you read The NATION, you'll know why we have such vital friends. And you'll understand why all our friends are important to us.

We need creative readers to fulfill our mission in helping to shape the discourse of our time. We think that mission becomes more important, not less, in time of national crisis.

We therefore invite you to help widen that discourse a little, among your friends. There's space at the left to write in their names and addresses.

Have you got a pencil?

Tear out and send to:

The NATION

333 Sixth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

'NATIONAL GUARDIAN' JAMES ARONSON

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 5, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
FEB 7 1968
LIBRARY

Dirksen The Presidents' Chameleon

EDWARD S. GILBRETH

Guatemala Why They Shoot Americans

NORMAN DIAMOND

Activism vs. Reaganism

Meddlers at Berkeley DAVID SWANSTON

REVIEWS

...king It': Norman Podhoretz MORDECAI RICHLER

Third Policeman': Flann O'Brien KEVIN SULLIVAN

5-21-68 PLS-149
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Dachau revisited

Westfield, N. J.

DEAR SIR: In reference to your editorial in the Jan. 1 issue of The Nation, "Problem of Sanitation," I saw the newscast you spoke of and was actively nauseated by it, yet why should I have protested to C.B.S.?

If this is what human beings have become to our GIs, then I believe the American public ought to be so informed, and learn that there are other indirect costs of this war to our country.

What I did do was write to my Senators to inform them of the newscast, and remind them of how much it suggested Dachau to me. I also reminded them that it is their support of Johnson's war effort, by voting him all the funds he needed to keep our soldiers in Vietnam, that made such scenes possible.

If anything, I would suggest that C.B.S. be commended for having the courage to show the newsreel. . . .

Muriel C. Hyman

We have received several letters making this point. The word "protest" was incorrectly used in the editorial. What we had in mind was the fact that, when something particularly distressing or poignant is shown on the air, stations expect to receive phone calls from viewers who feel they must express their reaction to the emotional jolt. The calls did not occur in anything like the numbers to be expected from the coverage of GIs handling corpses with steam shovels and cutting off the ears of the enemy dead.

Editors

pawning the future

Evanston, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I was glad to see your editorial, "War and Taxes" (The Nation, Jan. 8), citing my article and supporting the argument that the proposed tax increase makes sense only as a kind of economic "Gulf of Tonkin" authorization for further escalation of the war in Vietnam. Those opposed to such escalation should certainly oppose the tax increase.

I should, however, like to correct the implication in your editorial that a tax increase would prevent passing the burden of the war on to a later generation. In fact, the tax increase would have little or nothing to do with the extent to which the burden of the war is passed on. This depends upon the very real factors of investment, physical and human, which is foregone now because of the war and hence will have to be made up later. To the extent that because of the war we are failing now to build our cities, educate our young, and in all ways prepare for the world of tomorrow, we are passing a burden on to future generations. This will be true whether we pay for the war through taxes or through inflation.

It is true that, given the extent of war expenditures and destruction, a tax increase that cut down current consumption, rather than investment in education or physical productive capacity, would leave less of a burden to be met in the future. But there is no clear argument that this would be more true of the proposed tax increase than of the "hidden tax" that would come from inflation.

The central economic issue is that the resources being squandered in Vietnam and the political climate which the war creates are causing real burdens now, and will certainly bring on substantial burdens in the future because of all the things that the war has prevented us from doing for our economy now. . . .

Robert Eisner, Professor of Economics
Northwestern University

EDITORIALS

Predictable Incidents

The crash of a B-52 with four H-bombs aboard was our 13th aircraft accident involving nuclear bombs. Most of these mishaps occurred in the United States, but the Greenland incident recalls the midair collision of a B-52 and a KC-135 tanker near Palomares, Spain, which also involved four hydrogen bombs. Three were recovered on land, with some release of radioactive material in a populated area; the fourth fell into the water and was brought up some three months later after an intensive search and a very expensive deep-sea operation.

The B-52 which crashed near the U.S. Thule base in Greenland was flying the Arctic Circle course as part of the airborne alert continuously maintained by the Strategic Air Command. A number of B-52s are always aloft in this operation. In the normal course of events the B-52 involved in the latest mishap would have returned to its base in Plattsburgh, N.Y. However, a bomber flying on alert is always waiting for the command from Washington to arm its bombs and proceed to its designated targets in the Soviet Union.

The idea is to prevent the SAC bomber force from being caught with all its aircraft on the ground in a surprise nuclear attack. A secondary purpose is to keep the crews on their toes. In this instance six crew members parachuted to safety, but the copilot was killed. Unless one is imbued with what C. Wright Mills called "crackpot realism," his death was perfectly senseless. There was not and there is not the slightest chance of a surprise attack on the United States by the Soviet Union under present conditions. And serious hazards are inseparable from such flights. Whenever an accident occurs, the SAC is at pains to inform the public that the bombs were unarmed and could not explode, but it is conceivable—by some sequence of events that is inconceivable to the SAC—that some day one will explode in a bomber crash.

The seizure of the Pueblo by the North Koreans is in the same pattern. It may have been "piracy" on the high seas, but it is a peculiar type of piracy even if the vessel was not in North Korean territorial waters. Electronics and other modern technology make a mishmash of the theoretical lines that once gave some protection against naval encroachment. The fact is that the Navy sent into hostile waters a vessel loaded with electronic gear, supposedly so secret that it was to be destroyed by means of explosives if there was danger of its falling into enemy hands. The top speed of the intelligence-gathering ship was about 12 knots. The North Koreans were known to have patrol craft with speeds up to 40 knots. The Pueblo was armed only with a pair of machine guns. She was a sitting duck for anyone who cared to take her. Although we had any number of fighter aircraft in the vicinity, nothing came to her aid. Even if one takes the position that the mission of the Pueblo was a necessary one, it looks like a thoroughly botched job, not on the part of the commander and his men but as directed by the admirals in charge of all this activity.

At that, the North Koreans were much more circumspect than the Israelis, who mistook the Liberty, another U.S. intelligence ship, for an Egyptian warship and shot her up in the Mediterranean, with heavy loss of life. These incidents are an inevitable accompaniment of our insistence on patrolling the world by land, sea and air, and making our power felt in every nation, large and small. In particular, these troubles are the result of the Vietnamese War, the largest and most gratuitous venture of all. It is quite possible that the seizure of the Pueblo was a diversionary tactic connected with our operations in Vietnam (and our use of South Korean troops there), although what the Communists hope to gain by such a confrontation is far from clear. What is perfectly clear is that to allow a war to drag on, making only hypocritical efforts to stop it, is a highly dangerous business. Predictable, besides the incidents, is the reaction of the troglodytes in Congress. For them, the seizure of the Pueblo was the best news they have had in years. They began whooping it up in the true spirit of their grandfathers, who went to war over the sinking of the Maine, although we still don't know who was responsible. It seemed as if sanity had fled from the habitually bellicose members of the Congress, and they would be satisfied with nothing less than equal mania on the part of the Executive.

Disaffected Establishment

It would be premature, however, to conclude that the United States has turned into a loony bin. Shortly before the B-52 and Pueblo incidents, a group of Americans met in Bermuda and sent President Johnson a memorandum urging a general scaling down of American military activity in Vietnam, even without reciprocation.

This was no ordinary group of petitioners. The invitation was issued by Joseph E. Johnson, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, and an old friend of Secretary of State Rusk, and the conferees were all experienced in military and diplomatic affairs. Among them were Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, chief of staff under President Eisenhower; Charles W. Yost, former deputy chief of the U.S. mission to the UN; Roger Hilsman, former assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs; George B. Kistiakowsky, formerly special assistant to the President for science and technology, and others as distinguished. "There now appears to be a serious danger," the group concluded, "that the momentum of the Vietnam conflict may carry hostilities to disproportionate and even perilous levels. Under the circumstances, there is a need to explore policy alternatives for the future."

The Carnegie Endowment is a high-level organization which normally does not concern itself with policy questions that have domestic political implications. The memorandum to the President does not represent official Carnegie Endowment views, which can be voiced only by the trustees, but the presence in the group of seven officials and trustees is significant. The board of trustees authorized participation in the meeting, and the conclusion reached evidently reflects a growing concern not only among those who did participate but on the part of a

IN THIS ISSUE

February 5, 1968

EDITORIALS

162

ARTICLES

- 166 Guatemala:
Why They Shoot Americans
Norman Diamond
- 168 Dirksen: The Presidents' Chameleon
Edward S. Gilbreth
- 171 Activism vs. Reaganism:
The Meddlers at Berkeley
David Swanston
- 174 Editing on the Left:
Memories and Convictions
James Aronson
- 178 India's Political Scramble
Ved P. Nanda

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 180 Climbing Norman's Ladder
Mordecai Richler
- 181 A Land of Lost Identities
Kevin Sullivan
- 182 Poetry:
Going Home
The Ugly Man
Hampton Bays
Stepping Out
Michael Rumaker
Vern Rutsala
Serge Gavronsky
Carolyn Stoloff
- 184 Subsidy Contamination
Richard Freedman
- 185 Book Marks
Sara Blackburn
- 186 Theatre
Harold Clurman
- 188 Art
Max Kozloff
- 190 Films
Robert Hatch
- 191 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1266 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206
No. 6

large section of what might be called the Foreign Policy Establishment.

The logic is unassailable. No war is a static affair, and this one, as past escalations have shown, is highly dynamic. It is obviously carrying us to perilous levels, and will continue on that course unless the pressure is reduced.

The logic is likewise sound in its insistence on an American scaling down of military activity without imposing conditions. This is good diplomatic practice under the circumstances. If we announced a suspension of the bombing subject to certain conditions and Hanoi acceded (which it shows no sign of doing), we would be bound by these conditions. By announcing a suspension and saying nothing more, we would have a freer hand in subsequent negotiations.

The Bermuda meeting is not the only instance of restlessness in the Foreign Policy Establishment. A meeting in Chicago of Table Ronde, a group of ninety European government leaders, businessmen and intellectuals, was addressed by John J. McCloy, who ran the War Department under Secretary Henry L. Stimson in World War II and was subsequently U.S. high commissioner in Germany and chairman of the Chase Manhattan Bank. No one possesses greater prestige or wields more unofficial power—John Kenneth Galbraith once referred to him as “Chairman of the Board of the Establishment.”

In a criticism aimed directly at the White House, McCloy asked the President to order an immediate reappraisal of the Western Alliance, “with an order to all government agencies making it clear that our relationships with Europe are the most important items in all of American foreign policy” (D. J. R. Bruckner, Los Angeles Times, January 15). The significance of this is that McCloy is troubled by the overshadowing effect of the Vietnamese War on our role in Europe. The Foreign Policy Establishment in New York, from the years before World War I when the House of Morgan exercised predominant power, has always been Europe-oriented. Its members are Eastern Seaboard, Ivy League types, with close European ties. They are sensible of the serious disarray in the Western Alliance. With no dovelike sentiments in their make-up, they see the United States overextended and would like us to revert to prudent policy in the Pacific.

These statesmen would agree with Senator Mansfield that “the logical consequence of greater American involvement [in Vietnam] is still greater involvement. At some point in this process, if it continues, the escalator may well get out of control. . . .”

Crossroads of Decision

The United States is clearly approaching a crossroads of decision. On the one hand, we can continue to plunge into deeper and deeper commitments in furtherance of the “world policeman” role the military want us to assume. This means pushing ahead in Vietnam regardless of consequences, it means more counterinsurgency wherever free enterprise comes under attack. This is the neo-imperialist role—what was piously referred to at the turn of the century as Manifest Destiny. In a sense it also means increasing isolation since—while we can always recruit some partners of a more or less nominal kind—we shall be going it more and more alone, on our own initiative and at our own expense in blood and treasure.

On the other hand, there is what Senator Fulbright has called “a great opportunity,” the prerequisite of which is the rejection of the imperial role. This does not mean that we would do nothing, nor that we would avoid leadership, but that we would lead without the imperial overtones, the heavy military fist, the fanaticism of the anti-Communist crusade. We would exert leadership by example, working through international organizations and multi-national agencies (especially the UN and its subordinate bodies). We would seek a real détente with the USSR, working with it on an interim basis to keep the lid on, to give the forces making for a world community time to gain strength. This is the role suggested by Senator Aiken in his remarkable speech. He wants our policy in Southeast Asia “demilitarized” on moral grounds, and because it must now be clear to everyone—except the hawks in the Johnson Administration and their blind followers—that with all our military power we cannot get the guerrillas out of the rice paddies; the old-style power game is played out. Aiken urges us to reject the delusions which have led the Administration into the quagmire; to pretend that “the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong . . . are integral parts of a unified and monolithic world communism is simply a self-destructive fantasy. . . .”

Perhaps one of the reasons for Senator Aiken’s concern is that he realizes the significance of what happened on January 16—what Patrick Donovan calls “the closing day for the British empire.” The British pullback confronts us with an excruciating problem. Are we going to pick up that burden too, as well as the Middle East and all the other trouble spots of the world?

Britain’s setting sun should be a warning. How does a great power best preserve its influence? By throwing its weight around? By telling new regimes what they can and cannot do? By fighting nationalism? By slipping into the colonial or neo-colonial vacuums left by ousted imperialists? Are we trying to prove that Lenin and Trotsky were right? Or are we responsive to the long anti-imperialist tradition of America, which we began to violate, in areas at a distance from the continental United States, after the Spanish-American war? There is little time left to answer these questions.

Something Like Courage

Defying the protests of thirty-three Congressmen, National Educational Television went ahead and broadcast its condensed version of Felix Greene’s Inside North Vietnam. Its presentation of Dr. Robert A. Scalapino, the academic voice of the Administration, in a panel discussion immediately after the screening was undoubtedly intended to shield the network from the vengeance of the legislators, but David Schoenbrun’s sharp and informed challenge to Professor Scalapino’s astigmatic view of history made the debate a valid piece of public information (not to say entertainment) in its own right.

What was not so satisfactory was the editing of Mr. Greene’s film. Some reduction of footage was no doubt necessary to fit the time limitations of the program, but it is hard to believe that Greene's conversation with the wounded American flier was cut short for reasons of space. This officer's sober statement that America is in a bad war and should get out of it, his expressed conviction that the voters could and should begin the process of withdrawal in the November elections, was journalistically as fascinating material as any the film provided, and its moral content was unforgettable. If N.E.T. cut these passages from fear of reprisal, it set a bad and foolish precedent—bad because it imposed an illusion of free discussion on a reality of political calculation and foolish because the pachyderms of consensus are never placated by a qualified resistance to their demands. N.E.T. is to be commended for what was at least a show of defiance; if its viewers respond as they should, the network may be emboldened next time to be really bold.

Frankel Speaks Out

In an editorial comment in our issue of May 29, 1967, we called attention to an article by Tom J. Farer in Columbia University Forum which pointed out "the lack in our government of a tradition of resignation on openly stated grounds of principle, a lack which is in large measure a function of the unusual indifference, bordering on contempt, of our Establishment to dissent premised on moral scruples." The British have such a tradition, and it has stood them in good stead. Harold Macmillan referred to it recently in an interview with Edwin Newman on N.B.C.-TV. "Your life belongs to you," Macmillan said. When, as in the Suez crisis, individuals who should have resigned failed to do so, they lived to regret it.

In our May 29 comments we recalled what had happened to Henry Wallace, Adlai Stevenson and others who chose to hang on rather than quit and tell the country why. We suggested that Secretary McNamara should resign. When he finally did, we said in "Exit McNamara" (December 11, 1967) that he should have stated his reasons. He could still do so, not out of any captious motive but because of what he owes himself and all of us.

In the December 11 editorial we mentioned the case of Charles Frankel, whose resignation from the State Department was overshadowed by the departure of McNamara from Defense. Commenting on Frankel's excellent work in promoting international cooperation in scholarly and cultural activities, Science (December 15, 1967) concluded regretfully that "since resignation in anger is no longer an accepted mode of behavior in American public life," Frankel had chosen to go in silence, at least in regard to Vietnam. The silence was only temporary, however. Frankel gave a long interview to Richard Dudman, with the understanding that it would not be published until ten days after he left office on December 31 (St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 10).

What Frankel has to say is indeed revealing, not so much in regard to his own attitudes, which could be deduced from his character, but in his description of how we get into such situations as the conflict in Vietnam. When he was offered his assistant secretaryship in State in mid-1965 Frankel was already opposed to the war and said so, but was assured by a White House representative that it was sufficient that he supported the President's desire for negotiation; also that the escalation was only temporary and the bombing would end soon.

When things turned out otherwise, Frankel not only found himself identified with a policy to which he objected but the cultural program suffered from inadequate Administration support and loss of U.S. Government credibility as the war dragged on. When finally Frankel left, it was with a conviction that top State Department people were sincere, but with an equal conviction that they had gone into the war incautiously and had overcommitted themselves through a series of decisions based on overoptimistic assessments. Each time, instead of reacting with increased caution, the responsible officials raised the stakes, hoping thus to wipe out the latest prior error. Then the next intelligence estimate would be tailored to justify the enlarged involvement. The result was "a rolling institutional commitment. All the people who are involved, who go to Vietnam as members of the armed forces or the other agencies, or who are involved in the State Department here in Washington—all become children of the faith." And so the whole enterprise gets out of control.

All of which raises the question: to whom are public servants supposed to be loyal, and in what degrees? To the "boss" or to the country? To the man who appointed them, or to the people and to their own sense of what they owe themselves? After all, as Mr. Macmillan said, their lives are their own.

Now that at last we have had a resignation on principle, the example should encourage others. When Arthur Goldberg has had enough, we hope he resigns not with a whimper but with a bang, so that we may learn more than we now know or suspect about how the Johnson Administration does business. And we hope he will state his reasons then and there. The delay Mr. Frankel imposed on himself was good manners, but bad strategy.

Riot Control: Campus Style

Gov. Ronald Reagan is a busy man, but the California State Senate Judiciary Committee plans to add another function to his duties: de facto chief of police of the state's twenty-seven university and college campuses and their 284,000 students (see page 171 this issue). The committee proposes a California Campus Patrol headed by a Sacramento-based commissioner appointed by and responsible to the Governor, with "primary jurisdiction" for law enforcement on all campuses.

This scheme, which strips university chancellors and college presidents of their present authority over campus police, is a riot-inciting measure that would meet the approval of any professional agent provocateur. Campuses already are sensitive to the presence of outside police, and a campus-based police system, controlled from Sacramento, would stimulate a round of disorders and repression that would likely disrupt every state campus in California. Students, surrounded by the turmoil in the larger society over the Vietnamese War and racial conflict, cannot be sealed off on islands of tranquillity.

WHY THEY SHOOT AMERICANS

NORMAN DIAMOND

Mr. Diamond has taught for two years at Harvard University, where he is now working for his Ph.D. He was in Guatemala last summer, and his present area of study is the counter-insurgency movement in that country.

The killing of two American officers in Guatemala last month was neither a retaliation for right-wing attacks nor an act of arbitrary terrorism. It may have been an act of desperation, but one that had been planned well ahead and the consequences of which had been carefully calculated. What needs to be explained is its significance for the guerrilla movement and why the guerrillas waited until now.

Last summer, I took part in a discussion with members of the Revolutionary Armed Forces (FAR) in the back country of northeast Guatemala. The topic was the political advisability of a campaign against U.S. citizens, either United Fruit Company executives or members of the military mission. At that meeting, FAR opinion was that the time for such a campaign had passed, that the guerrillas had been too much weakened to benefit from it.

The intention of such attacks would have been to force an escalation of U.S. military strength in Guatemala, both arousing the population against the United States and diverting soldiers, advisers and equipment from liberation struggles elsewhere in the world. But now, the FAR argued, with the November 13th guerrilla movement nearly destroyed, and with the fighting strength of the FAR itself greatly reduced, attacks on United Fruit Company's executive compound at Bananera or on the military mission would be interpreted as last-ditch efforts and would do no more than increase U.S. support for Guatemalan counterinsurgency programs.

When in a position of greater strength, the FAR had chosen not to emphasize the internationalism of their struggle. Confident of eventual victory, they had come to a tacit understanding with United Fruit that permitted the guerrillas to operate in and around the company's plantation. Their confidence extended even to issuing statements signed by guerrilla leaders. They thus identified themselves, a bold step that is now proving costly. Underestimating the potential effects of U.S. military and "software" counterinsurgency aid, and perhaps underestimating our determination to prevent a successful popular movement, the guerrillas tried not to attract U.S. military attention and emphasized primarily their nationalist goals. The question for them was whether to attempt to tie down U.S. troops in Guatemala or to try for a relatively quick seizure of power. In control of large areas of the northeast, they chose the latter course.

Actually they were never strong enough to stand a chance in battle against U.S. counterinsurgency forces. The more realistic question is whether they could have used an increased direct U.S. military presence as a means of organizing the peasantry. By last summer, this question seemed no longer relevant to their strategy. The January 16th killings indicate a reassessment by the guerrillas derived from changing conditions of struggle. Their implications for the possibility of a more successful movement in Guatemala could be great.

The Avenue of the Americas, with its park of statues down the middle, is one of Guatemala City's most pleasant boulevards. It runs through the exclusive residential areas where the majority of U.S. diplomatic and military officials live. On it is located the U.S. Consulate, and it is also the most convenient route between the city and the airport and Guatemalan Air Force headquarters. With the intensification of air attacks against villages sympathetic to the guerrillas and of air surveillance on guerrilla positions, traffic between the military mission at the embassy and the Guatemalan Air Force headquarters has become heavier. On January 16, while returning for lunch, Col. John Webber, Jr., head of the U.S. military team in Guatemala, and Lieut. Comdr. Ernest Munro, his naval adviser, were killed by machine-gun bullets from a green Chevrolet sedan.

Colonel Webber may not have been the most relevant target for the guerrillas. As head of the mission, his functions have probably been administration and public relations. Actual responsibility for our anti-guerrilla programs in Guatemala has rested with his second in command, Lieutenant Colonel Thying. At parties, after a few drinks, Webber was apt to introduce Thying to guests from home as "our counterinsurgency expert," a designation which Thying does not like to have publicized. Webber would argue with liberal students in volunteer community and medical programs that "our goals for reform are really the same as yours; just the methods differ." Thying, however, sees himself as a technician, unconcerned with questions of policy, following orders. According to him, his programs for killing guerrillas and undercutting their popular support are "apolitical."

Both men arrived in Guatemala in 1966 when the guerrillas were at the peak of their strength. Thying was transferred from Colombia where, although he later depreciated the anti-guerrilla skills attributed to him by Webber, he acknowledges having supervised "mopping-up" and having "straightened out the situation." They introduced to Guatemala the advanced techniques in counterinsurgency being developed in Vietnam. They also undertook to rationalize the Guatemalan armed forces, tying them even closer to the U.S. military.

Under their direction the major counterinsurgency emphasis has been on killing guerrillas. Large areas of the country have been declared off limits and then subjected to heavy bombing. Reconnaissance planes using advanced photographic techniques fly over suspected guerrilla country and jet planes, assigned to specific areas, can be called in within minutes to kill anything that moves on the ground. Infantry troops have been trained in anti-guerrilla fighting and use laboratory techniques, as well as more traditional torture, to determine whether guerrillas have visited a village.

To complement the killing, our military has introduced rural pacification programs like those developed by American professors for use in Vietnam. Designed to deprive the guerrillas of indigenous support by demonstrations of what can be attained through existing political channels, these programs emphasize health and literacy. Programs of inoculations, well digging and milk for children fall under these military auspices, as do literacy programs, taught by soldiers with readings of a highly structured political content. Various U.S. volunteer agencies, like Amigos de las Americas, are incorporated into the military plan. (Innocent summer volunteers have been surprised to find themselves suddenly on Air Force planes being flown into Guatemala from Honduras without visas and then stuck in army jeeps to be driven to their destination. Their role—somewhat akin to Green Beret first aid—is to inoculate “safe” peasants.)

These direct and indirect attacks on the guerrillas and their popular bases of support are not the only reasons why U.S. military men are obvious targets in Guatemala. For the FAR, the military mission represents also a more subtle form of imperialism. The bulk of U.S. aid to Guatemala must be returned to the United States in payment for goods and services (a form of subsidy by U.S. taxpayers to the companies providing the goods and services), and the guerrillas recognize that the exchange is a means of controlling the Guatemalan economy. Efforts by the United States to rationalize the Guatemalan armed forces both benefit the U.S. companies selling the weapons and serve to maintain U.S. control over the Guatemalan military. Formerly, as Colonel Thying explained in an interview, Guatemala bought arms on the world market, procuring large supplies which, without replacements and spare parts, were useless within two or three years. Our administration of procurements now simultaneously saves money for the Guatemalans and makes them dependent on U.S. policy.

The U.S. Embassy has issued a statement expressing surprise and incomprehension at the slaying of Colonel Webber and Lieutenant Commander Munro, since Guatemalans are described as being in general “very friendly” toward the United States. But as should be clear from the above background, our military personnel are, and will continue to be, potential targets for guerrilla attacks.

I went to Guatemala in 1967 sympathetic to the social programs of the guerrillas but expecting to face a difficult moral dilemma with respect to their frequent use of violence. As in the case of black urban uprisings, I thought, many innocent persons would probably die in the violence directed toward progressive ends. The situation that I found in Guatemala was somewhat different. At every level of the society I found a respect for the integrity and judiciousness of the guerrillas: their targets are always evident political and military opponents of importance.

If political considerations have hitherto restrained the FAR from attacking the U.S. military, changing conditions have changed the balance of those considerations. The counterinsurgency programs have isolated the guerrilla groups from their bases of support in the countryside. With their peasant fighting cadres either killed or no longer responsive, with the identity of their leadership known to the government (FAR leadership consists of professional men and former military officers—individuals who can't simply disappear into the hills without being missed), the impetus of the guerrilla movement has been lost. Its major task at this point is to prepare the way for a future movement, starting from fresh bases, probably with new leadership. It is by this goal that I would explain the change in guerrilla policy toward U.S. military personnel.

Some of the same considerations which existed when the guerrillas were stronger, also hold true now. While there is no chance at present that the United States will intervene on a large scale with troops, the guerrillas may hope that increased repression by the Guatemalan Government will help radicalize the population, especially the students and urban slum dwellers. Until now, the Guatemalan armed forces have avoided the appearance of excessive repression. Their attack planes fly from hidden and even inaccessible airports; the number and kinds of aircraft are a secret from most of the population and even from the civilian government. The army has gone so far as to reroute rivers to cover the traces of bombings and massacres, as well as razing forests and bulldozing villages. For the civic action programs to have any chance of success, it has been necessary to keep from the population the extent of repressive violence simultaneously employed by the government.

This repression has been exercised almost entirely in the countryside. There have been gun battles in Guatemala City, but few parts of the urban population have been affected. The government has responded to right-wing terror with sighs of regret, but the killing of Webber and Munro has forced it to institute a “state of alarm,” which imposes censorship, bans meetings of more than four people, and permits arrest on sight without questioning. These measures will bring the struggle to the city. Guatemala's students, traditionally volatile in matters concerning their own rights, are likely to become much more involved than they have been to date. The notorious Fifth Zone slums, into which uniformed police are afraid to go except in force, may also react violently to infringement of its autonomy. Today's students may yet furnish some of the leadership in a liberation struggle at least partly based on the urban population.

Further, by finally attacking the U.S. military, the FAR may be indicating a new conception of what the future struggle should be. Having at first misunderstood our role in their country, they may now see the United States as the primary enemy of the social changes which they desire. Political organizing within the country will still have to be directed at the immediate conditions and against the local oligarchy, but there may be a more realistic awareness of the need to confront the United States. If the killings on the Avenue of the Americas are a guide, the next guerrilla movement in Guatemala will be directed in more international terms.

Dirksen: The Presidents' Chameleon

EDWARD S. GILBRETH

Mr. Gilbreth is a staff writer for the Chicago Daily News, specializing in state and local government.

Chicago

Everett McKinley Dirksen, senior Senator from the state he likes to refer to as the Land of Lincoln, enters this election year at the peak of a career that spans thirty years on Capitol Hill. Senator Dirksen envisions 1968 as the year of his greatest fulfillment. It may be that, or it may be the year when his power is eclipsed by the Democrats or by restless young blood within his own Republican ranks.

The Senator will be seeking a fourth term from Illinois. He also aspires to, and probably will get, the chairmanship of the platform committee at the Republican National Convention this summer. As leader of the Senate minority and as key adviser to the two Democratic Presidents of the 1960s, Dirksen accepts credit for many of the legislative milestones of this decade. Now, in the opening of the second session of the 90th Congress, he stands once again at stage center, ready to step forward whenever cries of "author! author!" herald some triumph.

And step forward he will. For whatever his pretense at humility, shyness is not in the make-up of this Illinois son of German immigrants, a man who has painstakingly cultivated the role of leadership and who, at the age of 72, shows no willingness to relinquish it.

Dirksen's success (if the acquisition of power, whatever the wisdom of its use, can be called success) is remarkable, considering that his flamboyance and theatricality make him a conspicuous figure of fun. In chronic poor health, he rumbles around the Senate like a skeleton in oversized clothes. His throaty baritone and arm-flinging oratorical style are a burlesque of the 19th-century superpatriot. His appeals to the Eternal Verities embarrass intelligent audiences.

As Dirksen once acknowledged, "Home, motherhood—some of my colleagues smile when I speak on such subjects. . . . But these are basic. You can appeal to people only through things which motivate them strongly."

Dirksen dominates the U.S. Senate. He is indulgent toward Democratic Party leaders who complain that he has more influence with the White House than do the President's own partisans. Dirksen has been able, so far at least, to muffle fellow Republicans who resent his tandem ride with the President.

Dirksen has attained leadership by playing the political chameleon, flip-flopping between conservative and liberal positions too often to be frozen in any stance. (The Chicago Sun-Times once catalogued his voting record and accused him of changing his views seventy times on farm policy, sixty-two times on foreign affairs and thirty-one times on military matters.) This so-called flexibility permits Dirksen to leap onto either side of an issue. It endears him to Democratic Presidents, who on several occasions have found him a willing partner in steering Administration measures through the Senate. His contributions to the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are perhaps overrated; it was he, nonetheless, who emerged as hero of the hour after the passage of each.

Dirksen cherishes the role of adviser to Presidents; he learned its value when he sought a third term in 1962. One morning, Dirksen had just gotten out of bed and was rummaging around his suite in Chicago's LaSalle Hotel when he was summoned to the telephone by a Presidential secretary, who said: "The President wants you to come to Washington on a highly urgent matter."

It was October 22, the day President John F. Kennedy announced to the world that the United States would risk nuclear war with Russia to force withdrawal of Soviet missiles from Cuba. Dirksen flew to Washington, along with Congressional leaders of both parties. A few days later, he was able to chortle to a home-state audience: "I feel like a commuter between Chicago and Washington these days, but I do not mind, for these are command performances."

The "command performance" was a dramatic climax to his re-election campaign. On election eve, Dirksen's aides predicted a 500,000-vote plurality for their candidate ("There is a fragrant odor of victory in the air," Dirksen crowed), but in fact his margin was 200,000-plus, the smallest of his three races for the Senate. By Illinois standards, it was no landslide, and there is reason to believe that he would have lost except for the Cuban crisis. Louis Harris, who in 1962 was President Kennedy's personal pollster, said that his staff's polls before Dirksen's summons to the White House indicated that he would lose.

Instances of harmony between Dirksen and Lyndon B. Johnson are legion. The Republican leader has been the President's main source of strength in Senate support for Administration policy in Vietnam. But Dirksen has been as willing to aid the Democratic President in other dilemmas. It was to Dirksen that Mr. Johnson turned for rescue from a recent political embarrassment, and perhaps no episode better dramatizes their rapport. The episode began last summer. Mr. Johnson named Simon F. McHugh, Jr., husband of a former favorite secretary, to a $26,000-a-year vacancy on the Subversive Activities Control Board. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate without debate. News media then exposed the do-nothing behavior of the SACB. Two years previously, the Supreme Court had knocked out the board's major power to force Communist organizations to register with the government. This power, the Court held, violated a citizen's right not to testify against himself. The board, its power thus emasculated, had held no hearings for twenty months, and none was pending before it when the President handed the fat-salaried sinecure to a 29-year-old man on the fringe of his official family.

The revelation led a number of Democrats to call for abolishing the board, which had been created by the Internal Security Act of 1950. (The Act, it will be recalled, was passed over President Truman's veto.)

There were two lines of attack on the agency. One was led by Sen. Wayne Morse, the Oregon Democrat, who saw circumstances ripe for ridding the government of a witch-hunting apparatus set up in the heyday of McCarthyism. The other was led by Sen. William Proxmire, Wisconsin Democrat, who argued from economy. What justification was there, he asked, for perpetuating an agency that had no work to do, although its five members and thirteen employees required an annual budget of some $300,000?

The debate that followed featured Senator Dirksen in his familiar role of going to bat for his friend in the White House. Dirksen, raising the specter of an internal Communist menace, proposed to reactivate the SACB by empowering it to investigate suspected Communists on its own initiative, and then list them with the Attorney General's office. Presumably, this would circumvent the Supreme Court ruling against self-incrimination, since so-called Communist-front groups or individuals would not themselves be required to register.

The Dirksen proposal effectively thwarted the strategy to abolish the SACB on the ground of economy. By arguing that the board should be given work to do, Dirksen left open only that argument that there was no need for the agency. But anyone who followed that line was by implication "soft on communism."

Senator Proxmire filibustered against the Dirksen proposal, and it was finally defeated. However, Dirksen lost the battle but won the war. What emerged was a so-called compromise, agreed to by both Dirksen and Proxmire, under which the SACB would be kept alive (that is, its appropriation untouched) and the board would have until the end of 1968 to show that it had effective work to do. Proxmire saved face by asserting his confidence that the compromise assured "the death of the board."

From the start, of course, Senator Dirksen was assured of some type of victory. It had been his from the time Mr. Johnson asked Dirksen to extricate him from the quandary. The real victory, masked by oratory about how best to cope with the "internal menace," was in changing the thrust of debate from that of questioning a Presidential appointment to that of evaluating the SACB. The forgotten man in the weeks-long controversy, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.) confessed that he had not heard from the President.

In late November, nearly one month after the SACB debate, the President had an opportunity to pay Dirksen one of those public tributes that cause increasing resentment among the partisan followers of each. Mr. Johnson appeared unannounced at a dinner at which veterans of the old Office of Strategic Services (forerunner to the Central Intelligence Agency) were honoring Dirksen. Speaking informally, Mr. Johnson praised Dirksen for avoiding "the temptations of irresponsibility" as an opposition leader. "No one—no one—has excelled his strategic service to the cause of freedom in the world. . . . He is a great American. He is a great human being. He is one of my dearest friends."

This endorsement can be expected to hold despite Dirksen's occasional harangues against the Administration, the most recent of which came in a year-end report to the Senate. Dirksen declared then that "there is no prospect of peace, no promise of stability, no hope for the better" in Mr. Johnson's policy in Vietnam. He went on to attack the Administration in this and harsher language, and the attack won national attention. Newspapers devoted columns to analysis. Did the Senator's remarks point to a permanent estrangement between the President and his No. 1 ally on Vietnam?

Hardly. For one thing, Dirksen's remarks were contained in the year's final issue of the Congressional Record, which is traditionally used for "extension of remarks" written after adjournment. These year-end summations traditionally blacken the opponent, whether of the majority or minority party. Dirksen knew he could have gained considerably more mileage from the attack with a speech in the Senate, rather than through the back door of the Record.

Then, too, Dirksen needed to soothe the wounds he inflicted on fellow party members by his repeated defense of Mr. Johnson's escalation of the war. As recently as last October, he had humiliated his party's former national chairman, Sen. Thruston B. Morton of Kentucky, when Morton dared suggest that the President had been "brain-washed" on the war issue by the nation's military-industrial complex. Dirksen chose to answer Morton in a speech on the floor of the Senate, not in the fine print in any "extension of remarks." "Have you heard the British demean their king and queen?" Dirksen asked. "No, you do not demean the ruler. The President is not our ruler, but you do not demean him in the eyes of the people abroad; for when you do, you demean the prestige of this Republic." By no coincidence, Morton, a moderate, has been the choice of a number of progressive Republicans to replace Dirksen as their Senate leader.

Dirksen maintains that his alliance with Mr. Johnson does not differ from the foreign policy support he gave President Kennedy. In 1963, Dirksen worked hard with Mr. Kennedy to win support for the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty. Dirksen reported to the White House the arguments of critics of the test ban, then worked out with Mr. Kennedy a letter of assurances, which the President forwarded to the Senate.

However, the Dirksen-Johnson bond goes deeper than any tie between Dirksen and Mr. Kennedy. One example: the Senator last year won for Illinois the government's choicest prize, the selection of one of Chicago's west suburbs as site of the Atomic Energy Commission's $400 million super atom-smasher. This was accomplished despite the fact that Illinois failed to enact an open-occupancy law to guarantee freedom of residence for Negroes who would be employed at the new federal facility, located in the heart of lily-white suburbia.

Laboring for both Presidents, Dirksen has revealed an obsession with history's judgment of him. During the debate on the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, he cried out: "I should not like to have written on my tombstone, 'He knew what happened at Hiroshima, but he did not take a first step.'" Arguing in behalf of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, he intoned: "I don't want it said that Everett Dirksen had told young men [Negroes] they could risk being killed in defending the country, but could have no voice in running it."

It was during the same Civil Rights debate that Dirksen flung out one arm in the direction of Barry Goldwater and warned that "no extreme statement you can utter" will alter "the upward thrust of civilization." Dirksen then demonstrated his virtuosity by listing as examples of "upward thrusts" various social welfare measures, including Social Security, which Dirksen ardently opposed during the fourteen years he served as an anti-New Deal Congressman from Illinois' Pekin area.

A few weeks after pointing his finger at Goldwater, Dirksen further demonstrated his flexibility by nominating Goldwater for President at the Republican National Convention. He said it was time to offer voters an alternative "to the Socialist philosophy that has already debilitated three-fourths of the world."

Dirksen has never made it clear at what point he thinks government regulation leaves the realm of "social welfare" and enters the category of "socialism." He could have been defending his own voting record, in his Goldwater nominating speech, when he ridiculed as "sadistic sport" the finding of inconsistencies in a man's record. After all, Dirksen said, "the man never lived, and the hero was never born who, by singling out some vote, some utterance, some opinion, cannot be crucified upon the cross erected by the cynics."

Macpherson, Toronto Star
The Emperor's Clothes

Dirksen, who did nothing to prevent, who even abetted, the Goldwater candidacy, emerged unscathed from the Republicans' crushing defeat in 1964. For once, he stationed himself in the wings, wringing his hands in dismay at the catastrophic performance onstage, a performance that one was supposed to assume he had had no hand in directing.

If he succeeds in chairing the platform committee at the party's 1968 convention, Dirksen will be able to mold the GOP's election strategy to his liking. And this prospect frightens many fellow Republicans almost as much as would another Goldwater candidacy. If he is in one of his conservative moods, Dirksen could easily fashion a platform unacceptable to a progressive nominee, such as Nelson Rockefeller. More important, many Republicans fear that Dirksen could saddle the party with a Vietnam plank parroting the Democratic support of the President. This would be unthinkable for Presidential nominees such as George Romney, who now opposes Vietnamese policy, or for the increasingly dovish Sen. Charles H. Percy, Dirksen's junior colleague from Illinois.

For this reason, a majority of the twenty-six Republican Governors want one of their own to share the platform committee chairmanship with Dirksen. The Governors, a more liberal lot than the GOP Congressional wing led by Dirksen, asked that Gov. Raymond Shafer of Pennsylvania be named. This Dirksen refused to allow, although he pretends that the matter is the prerogative of the Republican National Committee and its chairman, Ray C. Bliss.

The question of Percy poses yet another problem for Dirksen. Percy wants to be Illinois' favorite son Presidential nominee at the Miami Beach convention. Many conservative supporters of Dirksen in Illinois recoil from that idea, regarding Percy as something of a traitor to "true Republicanism." Only one year into his freshman term, Percy is rated almost five times as liberal as Dirksen by Americans for Democratic Action. The ADA gave him a rating of 38, compared to 8 for Dirksen, on all 1967 roll calls where conservative and liberal lines could be discerned. Dirksen has said he will "not oppose" Percy's favorite son status, but he has not said he would support it. This lack of support was sufficient encouragement for Illinois die-hard conservatives, who this spring plan to contest election of pro-Percy delegates to the national convention.

Illinois Democrats, reconciled to a national ticket headed by LBJ, must come up with a candidate to oppose Dirksen. Their field is limited. The Democrats' private polls indicate that their best candidate would be State Treasurer Adlai E. Stevenson III, who twice has proven to be the party's top vote getter in state-wide elections. But young Stevenson in early January withdrew himself from consideration. (The polls, incidentally, showed him a less than even bet against Dirksen.)

Senator Paul Simon, a youngish reform legislator from southern Illinois, has been mentioned as an aspirant for Dirksen's seat, although there is increasing evidence that Mayor Daley has come up with a "magic" name, Sargent Shriver, which would bring the Kennedy name and fortune into the campaign.

Neither political party in Illinois will endorse candidates for the state's June primary election until spring. During that time, Dirksen will continue to enjoy a national rostrum in the Senate. His daily performances will be fed to his constituents from the front pages of their newspapers, and by the time the formal campaign begins the white-thatched old veteran will appear unbeatable.

That, of course, is the image Dirksen wants to project in his campaign for a fourth term.

And if the polls should suddenly reverse, if President Johnson appears likely to carry Illinois, if Senator Dirksen's own campaign falters because of his age or the issues, he can take out and wave the highest endorsement for his return to the Senate:

"No one—no one—has excelled his strategic service to the cause of freedom in the world. . . . He is a great American. He is a great human being. He is one of my dearest friends."

ACTIVISM VS. REAGANISM

THE MEDDLERS AT BERKELEY

DAVID SWANSTON

Mr. Swanston is a reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle on the Berkeley campus of the University of California.

Berkeley

For the fourth time in as many years, the University of California at Berkeley is in turmoil. The current crisis is not as intense as the Free Speech Movement of 1964, nor as volatile as the 1965 Vietnam Day Committee controversy, nor as disruptive as last year's student strike. But at the roots of the crisis is a threat to the university far more serious than any student uprising—a concentrated and successful interference in campus activities by off-campus forces.

Like the earlier outbreaks in Berkeley's cycle of confrontation politics, this year's controversy involves student violations of campus rules and punishment for the violations leading to major campus demonstrations. But this year, as activist and administrator squared off across Sproul Plaza, a new factor appeared on the scene and forced the battle neither side wanted. Catalysts for the current showdown: the Alameda County Board of Supervisors.

The board, normally busy with problems of water, taxes and zoning in the large East Bay county, joined a growing platoon of politicians and state officials who have become persistent meddlers in the affairs of the Berkeley campus since Ronald Reagan took office a year ago. But where others had been content to pass resolutions, inflame public opinion, threaten tuition and reduced budgets, and discharge a president, the board jumped straight into campus events.

The controversy began in October, as student activists made final plans for Stop the Draft Week demonstrations at the Army Examining Station in Oakland. Demonstration leaders used the "free forum" of Sproul Hall steps to urge UC students to join the protest, and announced that the campus Student Union be a sleeping-staging area for the demonstration.

Campus officials were unruffled by the demonstration planning, but the sleep-in announcement brought quick denials that permission to use the building had been given, and a series of negotiations began between administrators, student government officers and activists. What emerged was a compromise agreement allowing the university's Associated Students to sponsor an all-night teach-in that would include discussion—on both sides—of the draft, the war and direct action.

"The decision to grant the use of our facilities for the teach-in is an affirmation of faith in our students and in the value of putting into a serious format an event that might otherwise be destructive," Berkeley Chancellor Roger W. Heyns told a meeting of the faculty senate. The senate agreed, voting to support the teach-in and commending the chancellor for "his forthright decision, taken in keeping with the university's tradition of free expression." The Alameda Board of Supervisors, on the other hand, voted unanimously to demand that the university deny the use of its facilities for activity connected with the Stop the Draft Week demonstrations.

Responding to the board's action, Heyns wrote: "We believe that the course that ought to be followed is that of the familiar traditional American practice of punishing or disciplining the doing of harmful actions while leaving citizens free to speak their minds and advocate ideas and platforms, even to advocate future possible unlawful activities." But the supervisors weren't to be denied. When Heyns refused to obey their demand, the board sent its counsel into Superior Court to seek a restraining order to force the university to cancel the teach-in.

In general, campus leaders did not seriously consider that a restraining order would be issued, and on the afternoon of the teach-in plans were unchanged as university officials appeared at an informal session in Alameda County Superior Court. But Superior Court Judge Lewis E. Lacara not only considered the order; he issued it and enjoined the university from permitting use of campus facilities for the teach-in or at any other time "for the purposes of on-campus violations of the Universal Military Training and Service Act and on-campus advocacy of off-campus violations of said act." (The supervisor's counsel argued that attempting to close down the Examining Station violated the Act.) A formal hearing on the restraining order, when its constitutionality could be argued, was scheduled for October 25—five days after the end of Stop the Draft Week.

Heyns issued a terse statement that the order would be obeyed and the Student Union was locked. When several thousand activists showed up on campus and began a rally outside Sproul Hall with their own sound equipment, UC officials responded with warnings of rule violations and punishments. Representatives from the Dean of Students office said the activists were violating university rules prohibiting the use of non-university sound equipment and night rallies, and warned that students participating in the unauthorized meeting would be disciplined later. The students listened to the dean's announcement and then voted to continue the rally. It lasted all night and ended as demonstrators boarded chartered buses on the edge of campus and left for the Examining Station.

Club-swinging Oakland police waded through the demonstrators that morning and the Examining Station protest ended with twenty arrests and dozens of injuries. By noon, 4,000 angry young activists had gathered in Sproul Plaza. A rally had been planned, but the university had withdrawn permission after the sponsoring group, The Resistance, had refused to sign a special pledge that the meeting would not "include nor lead to violations of the law."

After several attempts to conduct the meeting without sound equipment had failed, the activists brought their own amplifiers on campus and began their rally—again in violation of university rules. The meeting lasted three hours, included heated debate on the draft, the demonstration, the rally itself, and the Oakland police department, and featured an "open microphone"—free speech in the broadest sense of the term. Another "illegal" rally was held that night and the students voted to return to the Examining Station.

In all, five unauthorized rallies were held, and the university cited seventy-one students for taking part. Two of the seventy-one were suspended for a year, five others were given "suspended sentences" of one year's suspension, fifteen were cleared of charges and the rest were warned, censured or placed on disciplinary probation.

University officials contend that the students violated existing campus rules concerning the time, place and manner of speeches that would have been in effect without the supervisors' restraining order, but it is obvious that the order forced both the students and the administration into a position that made rule violations nearly inevitable. Except for the order, the teach-in would not have been canceled and there would have been no unauthorized outdoor rally. The university would not have required a pledge that rallies would not include or lead to law violations and the afternoon rallies could have gone as planned. Except for the order, Stop the Draft Week would have passed; some students would have had run-ins with civil authorities but the hassle on campus would not have erupted.

However, it should be noted that both the activists and the administration escalated the conflict as soon as the Board of Supervisors and the Superior Court had wiped out the initial cooperation:

Instead of immediately fighting the restraining order in appellate court, university officers created the special pledge and when student groups refused to sign it and held their rallies anyway hustled around taking names of people "violating university rules." As a result, the constitutionality of the restraining order was never tested, since the supervisors dropped the action on the morning of the formal court hearing.

Instead of attempting to gather public and faculty support around the issue of outside attack upon the university, Heyns whined that his "problems are not helped when the community fails to acknowledge our responsibility and competence to make decisions and execute policies about the subject of student affairs" and turned his attention—and public statements—to student discipline.

Instead of sticking by the lofty concept—presented to the supervisors less than a week earlier—that students should be "free to speak their minds and advocate ideas and platforms, even to advocate possible unlawful activities," UC officials abandoned the principle, created rules that violated it and then announced plans to punish students who broke the rules.

(The principle Heyns touted before the supervisors had been the major accomplishment of the Free Speech Movement. In the wake of the 1964 Sproul Hall sit-in, the Berkeley academic senate resolved that "the content of speech or advocacy should not be restricted by the university," with the provision that "time, place and manner of conducting political activity on campus be subject to reasonable regulations to prevent interference with the normal functions of the university.")

Instead of fighting the supervisors over the autonomy of the university, the administration engaged in a rules fight with students.

But, if the administration was inclined to chey the students, the activists seemed ready to be drawn into the fray. The students could have moved their teach-in off campus—they had reserved a city park in Berkeley—instead of defying the university. They could have conducted meetings without sound equipment, which would have been perfectly legal. In short, they could have avoided confronting the university and still have launched a successful Stop the Draft Week.

Instead, they held the unauthorized rallies, and when students who spoke at the rallies were called before the Dean of Students, they refused to appear. When the dean recommended that eleven be suspended, they threatened

Conrad, Los Angeles Times

"And at Half-Time . . . San Jose State 7—Dow 3 . . .
UCLA 14—CIA 6"

"disruptive demonstrations." And when Heyns finally suspended two of them, they launched three days of mill-ins, disrupting administration buildings with demonstrations.

Thirty-five students were cited for the mill-ins and forty-three more for taking part in a protest against Dow Chemical Company and CIA recruiters on campus. The Dow-CIA protest pointed up the polarized atmosphere on campus created by the restraining order: A year ago Dow and the CIA visited the campus and sparked student demonstrations. But administrators and activists were able to work out guidelines for the protest that were acceptable to both sides. This year, the administrators, the students and the cause of protest were all about the same, but no guidelines could be developed and university rules were once again broken.

Student opinion, including the not especially militant student paper, The Daily Californian, generally opposed Heyns and supported the activists. The faculty, as usual, divided on the question, but defeated a resolution that would have censured Heyns. And the Board of Regents, charged with administering the nine campuses, 95,000 students and 6,000 faculty members in the statewide university system, endorsed the chancellor's handling of the situation.

The endorsement brought a good measure of relief to Berkeley administrators, who feared that the regents would condemn Heyns for not himself forbidding the pre-demonstration rallies. Coupled with this concern was the fear that the regents would take more direct action, perhaps shutting down the campus "open forum." The worries were not entirely without basis. A Berkeley faculty-student Study Commission on University Governance, in a report based on a year's study of UC, had noted that "in the space of less than two years we have witnessed actions by the regents which have raised serious threats to the academic freedom of this campus, the effective governance of its affairs, and the personal freedom of its students."

For example, a year ago the regents ruled that university personnel who participated in campus strikes would be subject to firing. A few months later, they declared that students could be dismissed from the university for off-campus violations of narcotic laws. And recently they issued the seemingly paradoxical statements that the campus could not be used to organize illegal activities, and that the rights of free speech and assembly would be upheld. But the act that most shocked the university—and a good part of the state—was the politically motivated firing of university President Clark Kerr in January, 1967.

Kerr's discharge prompted the Berkeley faculty to sponsor a public convocation on "The Role of the University in a Democratic Society," in an effort to garner public support for the notion of campus autonomy. Speakers at the April 28 ceremonies included Chief Justice Earl Warren and historian Richard Hofstadter, but the star of the afternoon was economist John Kenneth Galbraith.

Galbraith criticized the general concept of a university governing board—such as the Board of Regents—as "a barrier to progress," and added:

Here the governing board that does not govern has come to serve as a conduit for political interference into the university. So, far from being a buffer, it is where those with a political axe now go to grind. It is where those with a whimsical objection to beards, free speech, or the DuBois Clubs can be assured of a sympathetic and responsive ear. So, far from being a buffer that protects against heresy, it has become a means for its exposure. And also for exercising political leverage or action.

The Berkeley Study Commission on University Governance echoed Galbraith's thesis and noted that incidents of the last months "are but the most recent examples of a long series of abuses which make a mockery of the official theory that the regents serve as a 'buffer' between the university and the political pressures emanating from a hostile environment."

Among the most dangerous members of the "hostile environment" is the conservative state legislature which has found the university campus a productive pasture for making political hay. In recent years, every stir at Berkeley has produced a raft of letters and press statements from Sacramento that keep public opinion churning, and threaten budget cuts and restrictions on the rights of university students and faculty members.

A recent letter to the regents from Oakland Assemblyman Don Mulford is a fair example. Mulford, whose letter was released to the press, was upset because the university had done nothing about twenty-two Berkeley professors who had claimed participation in the unauthorized Stop the Draft Week rallies. He noted that five of the professors "are mentioned in the 13th Report Supplement of the Senate Factfinding Subcommittee on Un-American Activities in California," and then added a couple of not too subtle threats concerning his support of the university budget: "This comes at a time when the legislature is being asked to consider a substantial increase in faculty salaries including these very same professors."

But not all the conservative energy in Sacramento is channeled through letters and press releases. In the wake of the demonstrations at Berkeley and other university campuses and the serious disruption at San Francisco State College, the Reagan administration worked up plans for a state-wide campus police force. The proposal, now being seriously considered in Sacramento, would provide one giant force with branches on every campus, directed from Sacramento.

As winter quarter classes began at Berkeley a few weeks ago, the off-campus threats remained unchecked and the on-campus controversy remained unresolved. Three students have been suspended for the Dow-CIA protest and many more still face discipline. The teaching assistants local of the American Federation of Teachers has threatened to strike over suspension of its members. And Heyns has stripped the campus student government of its power, thus raising another major controversy.

However, the chances are good that Heyns can keep the lid on campus—if he's left alone. For one thing, there seems to be little student support for more demonstrations to protest the suspensions, and it's doubtful that the teaching assistants will strike except as part of a major confrontation. The 95-page Study Commission report and its recommendations for radical reform have prompted a good deal of campus discussion. The dispute over the future of student government has cooled to serious talks between students and administrators. And both the activists and UC's officials would like time to do their own things and not jostle each other for awhile. But nothing has been done so far to prevent a repeat of last fall's campus tragedy when Stop the Draft Week comes again in April.

EDITING ON THE LEFT

MEMORIES AND CONVICTIONS

JAMES ARONSON

Mr. Aronson, a founder and for many years editor of the National Guardian, also was on the staff of three major New York dailies. He is at present working on a book on the U.S. press and the cold war.

Time magazine, I would suggest, perfected the mini-sneer. When the National Guardian published its first issue on October 18, 1948, Time described it as a "pink shoe-string." Pink it was to some, and to others a guilty red. But whatever its tint, the shoestring never came untied.

In the early years, during which its editors and managers made half a dozen appearances as witnesses before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee (Eastland) and the Senate Subcommittee on Government Operations (McCarthy), the Guardian was variously described as "a virtual propaganda arm of the Soviet Union" (HUAC) and "the most flamboyant pro-Chinese publication in America" (columnists Evans and Novak). In fact, the Guardian was founded as, and remained, an independent and independently owned newsweekly which took strong issue with basic U.S. policy, both foreign and domestic. That is what produced the inquisitorial subpoenas—not the idiotic allegations of adherence to the "international Communist conspiracy." But it is axiomatic for most politicians and many pundits that any critic of basic U.S. policy must owe his allegiance to a foreign power or gaggle of such powers.

Actually, the genesis of the National Guardian was in Germany, in 1945, when Cedric Belfrage, co-founder and first editor of the Guardian, and I were engaged in a combined Allied operation (U.S., British, French) to help set up what was optimistically termed "the new free democratic German press" on the ruins of the Nazi press. We were so successful in giving the Germans a chance (which did not last long) to practice their profession honestly that we were most reluctant to go back to jobs on newspapers where freedom of expression was a lofty slogan in a masthead, but not a fact. As radicals, we felt the need for a new publication dedicated not, as were the existing publications on the radical Left, to sectarian polemics and opinion but to supplying factual news and interpretation in areas where the truth was suppressed or distorted.

But occupied Germany was not America and even newspaper men have families, so I went back to the New York Post and then to the Sunday Times, and Belfrage to free-lance writing. Not for long, however: the seed had been planted, the cold war was on, Henry A. Wallace, as Secretary of Commerce, made his courageous break with the Truman administration, and the Progressive Party was in formation, I resigned from the Times in April, 1948, to join Belfrage full time in planning a new news-weekly.

With the help of an able and venturesome group of newspaper men and neophytes who rallied around in a borrowed upper Madison Avenue apartment, and with a most generous offer of technical help from J. W. Gitt, publisher of the Gazette & Daily of York, Pa., we published in York a preview issue (it was called National Gazette) in August, 1948. It had articles by an illustrious roster of stringers, some of whom became regulars: Max Werner, Frederick L. Schuman, the late Labor M.P. Konni Zilliacus, Louis Adamic, Anna Louise Strong, Arthur Calder-Marshall, James Higgins, John Lardner and James Dugan. We mailed it widely and got back 4,000 paid subscriptions at $4 each. The next step was to bang (successfully) on the doors of progressives of means, and we began publishing in New York on a regular basis, as the National Guardian, two weeks before the election. We had been joined by then in a managerial triumvirate by the late John T. McManus, film critic of the just expired newspaper PM and a long-time president of the Newspaper Guild of New York.

From the beginning, we knew that we could not compete with the news-gathering resources of the commercial press. We concentrated rather on being a watchdog of the press, following, unscrambling and analyzing the news and comment that appeared in the daily papers and the newsweeklies, and offering an antidote in the form of independently gathered news and comment that the general press would not print. In this latter area, we were far more successful abroad than at home. Many newspaper men and women in foreign countries, including American exiles, were eager to contribute for very little compensation to an American radical paper; except in the early days, the American working press shied away from the Guardian, refusing to write even under pseudonyms.

As the cold war intensified, our newspaper became a champion of its domestic victims, actual and potential. The great American witch hunt of the mid-20th century of course had its origins in the cold war. The conjunction of events—the Truman Doctrine and the reactivated Smith Act, the Korean War and McCarthy—were not accidental. In addition, on the civil rights front, the militant young black freedom movement was still in the offing, and there was a desperate need for journalistic campaigns on behalf of Willie McGee and Rosa Ingram, the Martinsville Seven and the Trenton Six, names barely recalled by a newer generation. In its second issue, the Guardian took up the Trenton case as a “new Scottsboro case” and, in a campaign which eventually reverberated from Europe because of Guardian stories, helped win a new trial and freedom for the victims of a gross injustice.

The cold war intensified in other areas, too. The Soviet Union decreed President Tito to be a renegade and revisionist and its friends all over the world almost unanimously echoed and accepted the decree. The Guardian did not. It carried sympathetic articles from Yugoslavia by Konni Zilliacus.

In the winter of 1949, Anna Louise Strong, the Guard- ian's correspondent in Moscow, was arrested as a “well-known American espionage agent.” The Guardian rejected the charge proffered without evidence and stood by its correspondent, despite harsh attacks from U.S. supporters of the Soviet Union. Belfrage and I undertook a quiet but insistent personal campaign of intervention with Eastern European diplomats to force Moscow to acknowledge the absurdity of the accusation. It did—after six years. Despite the physical and psychological agony of her experience, Miss Strong never denounced her faith in socialism. At 75, she is writing from Peking.

I dwell on these early years because they set the paper's standard and tone, and by a process of trial and error moved us to adopt a twofold approach:

(1) To make the Guardian as nearly as possible indispensable reading for any intelligent American who wanted to know what the Left in America was thinking and doing and to get a balanced view of the opposing forces in the world.

I say balanced rather than objective because journalistic objectivity is impossible of achievement. In this balance the Guardian was a counterweight to the general press which accepted and propagated basic U.S. policy and the virtue of the capitalist system. The Guardian, on the contrary, regarded U.S. policy and the capitalist system as the major sources of the world's problems. It did not as policy advocate socialism as an American alternative but insisted that it be discussed as a possible alternative and not as a horrid word. It offered a sympathetic presentation of news of the Socialist world, while reserving the right to be critical. It held that the peace of the world depended on an acceptance by the people of the West that socialism was here to stay. The first step toward that acceptance was the presentation of an accurate picture of the life and aspirations of the people living under socialism.

(2) To balance in its coverage news of general interest and news of service to a predominantly radical readership which looked to the Guardian as a communications center, almost as a political lifeline, in default of a cohesive and coherent radical movement. Frequently these two purposes were joined by the impact of major events.

Within this framework the fundamental policy of the paper was to maintain a flexibility of approach that enabled it to become a forum of the Left, and to count among its regular if not uncritical readership independent Socialists, Communists, Trotskyists, members of groups that had broken away from the Left parties, liberals and even conservatives who insisted on the right of a dissenting voice to be published in America. This flexibility countenanced neither a “no-position” stance nor an opportunistic approach which sought to cloak radicalism in another guise. The Guardian took many forthright and often unpopular positions and rejected from the outset any proposals to dilute its radical view to achieve respectability. Rather, it insisted that radicalism was respectable, in the clearest American tradition, and ought to take its proper place in the American political debate.

It was this policy of principled flexibility, I believe, that enabled the Guardian to persevere through two difficult decades—when many Left organizations and publications perished—and to achieve the grudging respect of its opponents. This flexibility, also, brought it respect abroad, in Moscow, Peking and Havana, where its articles and editorials were frequently reprinted, and in Western Europe and many neutralist Asian countries. If the Guardian was regarded by some as a prophet without honor in its own country, it served to demonstrate to the rest of the world that there was a core of sanity and clarity among the American people.

In my view, this approach to radical journalism remains sound. There are, of course, radical publications in the United States which champion one position or another in the debate taking place in a divided international Socialist movement. It follows also that an American radical movement must become a part of the international struggle against U.S. imperialism. But there is a great need for an independent radical newspaper that provides a forum for all points of view in the international debate; and there is an equally great need of such a forum for a public that has been drowned in words but has had little access to the actual arguments and background of the acknowledged division. An independent radical newspaper, in this sense, serves as a unifying force rather than as a divisive one. Its motivation is against the kind of splintering debate that distracts American radicals from the urgent fight at home against the American policy makers of war and racism.

When I spoke above of the joining of news of general interest with campaigns to mobilize support for a particular situation or point of view, I had in mind three specific episodes in the Guardian's history: (1) The Rosenberg case, which the Guardian brought to world attention in a series of articles beginning in August, 1951, that launched a world-wide campaign to save the young couple; (2) the Korean War, which the Guardian opposed from its inception and whose impact, along with the McCarthy terror, caused the circulation to drop from 55,000 to 22,000 in one year; (3) the Mark Lane brief for Lee Harvey Oswald, after the assassination of President Kennedy, which was probably the most widely reprinted article in the Guardian's history.

The first two instances had serious and near-serious consequences for the Guardian; the third had an impact in this country and abroad whose extent cannot be measured until the truth of the assassination is revealed—if it ever is.

In May, 1953, one month before the execution of the Rosenbergs, Belfrage and I were subpoenaed to appear before the McCarthy committee. (Belfrage was then editor and I was executive editor.) The ostensible purpose of the call was an investigation of U.S. participation in the German press operation in 1945; actually, the committee concentrated on the Guardian in particular and its interest in the Rosenberg case. As a result of his appearance, Belfrage, a British citizen, was arrested and held for deportation. He spent four months in prison without being charged in the course of a two-year struggle to reverse the deportation order. The effort was unavailing and he left the United States in August, 1955. He thus became the Guardian's editor in exile. I succeeded him as the editor in residence.

The aftermath of Korea brought new summonses—for general manager McManus and myself—to the Eastland committee in 1956, again ostensibly for another interest than the Guardian. Eastland was furious with The New York Times for its editorials denouncing his stand on civil rights. He sought to embarrass the Times by subpoenaing present and past members of its editorial staff who might be suspected of left-wing associations. McManus and I were alumni. Before Eastland, the questioning got away from the Times and on to the Guardian and its publication, a few years earlier, of the names of U.S. prisoners of war in North Korea. The names had been obtained from North Korean broadcasts, printed in the China Monthly Review, an English language publication edited by John W. Powell, Jr., and published in Shanghai. The U.S. Government, we knew, had also monitored the broadcasts but had refused to make the names public. We did—and within days were getting hundreds upon hundreds of letters, asking for information, from wives and parents of men listed as missing in action. We supplied it where we could. It was one of the most moving experiences of my career. But the Eastland committee was not so moved and we narrowly escaped a sedition charge.

The area that caused perhaps the greatest conflict between the Guardian and some groups on the Left, and surely produced the greatest turbulence in the letters column, was domestic politics. A founding principle of the Guardian was to advocate a political alternative to the two major political parties, which we regarded as essentially one. We supported the candidacy of Wallace in 1948 and of Vincent Hallinan in 1952 on the Progressive ticket. We rejected the "lesser evil" position and refused to endorse Stevenson, Kennedy or Johnson in the succeeding elections. We did, on several occasions, and particularly in state or local elections, endorse a Socialist candidate if one were on the ballot.

This independent view brought us into conflict with the Communist Party which put forth the "mainstream" theory—that the bulk of the working people were in the Democratic Party and it was therefore the function of radicals to work within that party to push it toward a more progressive position. We felt that radicals would be swallowed up by the Democratic Party apparatus and would have at best only the most limited effectiveness. But the lesser-evil theory had a tenacious quadrennial grip on the American electorate and the debate among Guardian readers became harsh indeed at election season.

After the elections, when the status quo emerged unruined from the hustings, and the canceled subscriptions were reinstated, there came the inevitable flood of letters urging the Guardian to take the lead in forming a third party. The reasoning ran thus: the Guardian had readers in all the states and they could form the nucleus of political clubs; there was no one else to do the job.

The hopes and frustrations of the urgers were clear; the practical politics less so. No newspaper or publication can be a political party, nor can it be the organizer of one. It can guide, instruct, inform and encourage, but it cannot organize. A newsweekly with a small staff, however able, based in New York, with three-fourths of its readership spread throughout the country, and with obviously limited funds, can be a focal point and clearing house for information for political organizers in the field. But the job of organizing is precisely there, in the communities, with an apparatus either regional or national, functioning with a program or a set of ideas, building a movement which a radical newspaper can publicize and support. The newspaper may even become the organ of a party or movement, but first there must be a movement or party in existence or being built. The great dilemma of the American opposition today, and particularly on the questions of the war in Vietnam and the struggle against racism, is that there is no such movement or party. It is an illusion that activity on the Left constitutes a movement.

Within this reality, the Guardian warmly welcomed and publicized every activity that could burgeon into movement: the rise of the young militants in the South that gave birth to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and the activities on the campuses which led to the Students for a Democratic Society and the DuBois Clubs. In the last few years the resistance by young people to the Guardian as a representative of the "old Left" has gradually disappeared. The increase in readership among young people might have been greater had it not been for the emergence of a number of small independent local publications, the so-called "underground press," in university communities. This is a natural development in a time of disillusion and in many respects a welcome one, however discouraging it may be to the circulation of a radical paper.

The tidy printed page of a radical paper hides a fairly untidy scramble to insure survival. After the early euphoria of the Progressive Party days and the expenditure of considerable sums of money in futile attempts to achieve mass circulation, we settled down to stabilizing what we accepted as a respectably sizable readership and a permanent financial crisis. This was accomplished by involving almost the entire readership in financing the paper. Two annual appeal letters were sent out and a "Buck of the Month Club" formed through which readers gave, for example, at least $5 above their $7 subscription price. Appeals in the paper itself—except at one critical time in 1949—were banished as a public death rattle. That very special 1949 appeal did in fact bring a savior, a most gracious Chicagoan named Anita McCormick Blaine, cousin of the Tribune's Colonel McCormick.

The problems of staffing a radical newspaper increased with time. The original staff—there was almost no turnover in the first twelve years—was made up largely of experienced newspaper men with some political background. When some of them left, mainly for economic reasons, the aim was to bring on younger people who could be trained for a future with the Guardian or elsewhere in radical journalism. In the 1950s, in the wake of McCarthy, almost no young candidates applied, but in the early 1960s the situation changed dramatically. Job applications poured in and several young people were hired. This caused a sharp drop in the average age of the staff, and an increase in conflicts between older hands with political experience, and younger hands with almost no political experience, but with strong opinions about past and future politics. Interestingly enough, the debate soon crossed generation lines and the divisions in the editorial conferences often could not be defined.

Set forth in capsule form, some of the conclusions of my nineteen years with the Guardian are as follows:

- An independent radical newspaper engenders hostility on the Right and unfortunately in some measure on the Left.

- It is a luxurious myth that an editor of a radical newspaper can confine his work to being an editor: he must also be a writer, copy reader, fund raiser, public speaker and traveler, a teacher of journalism and sometimes a psychologist willing if not always qualified to cope with the problems of an often undisciplined and financially undernourished staff and an articulate and often belligerent readership. It is not an ideal estate.

- Without the regular participation of agents who adhere to a political party or apparatus (and today perhaps even with them) there is little hope in the climate that has persisted through the cold-war years that a radical newspaper can achieve a mass circulation or even survive without subsidy by its readership or by large-scale contributions.

- The press of the nation, with rare exceptions, demonstrates a persistent hostility to its radical brothers, to the extent of refusing to publish even startling new material if the source is a radical newspaper. A case in point was the brilliant reportage by Wilfred G. Burchett from inside the National Liberation Front areas of South Vietnam and from North Vietnam. He "scooped" Harrison Salisbury by almost two years, but the press ignored the Guardian's stories and releases.

I left the Guardian at the end of April, 1967. My departure was voluntary but was motivated by a profound disagreement with members of the staff on the role and function of a radical newsweekly. It was a prevailing staff view that the Guardian had failed because its circulation remained at 28,000 and that it was not responsive to the hopes and aspirations of a "young and growing radical movement." My position was that while the potential of young radicals was self-evident and their searching independence ought by all means to be encouraged, they had not in fact manifested themselves as a movement or even a cohesive force. I felt further that when young radicals had advanced to the stage of accepting a set of principles for the practice of politics, they would seek unity with radicals of all ages. In such a situation and toward this end a newspaper such as the Guardian ought to be, as it had always been, the voice of an entire radical movement and not a segment of it. Finally, I was convinced that young people expect of a radical newsweekly what radicals of all ages expect of it: the most informed and expert news and commentary and service information available to advance their ideas and influence their fellows.

Success for a radical newspaper cannot be measured in terms of circulation. The respect and prestige which the Guardian achieved may, I believe, be credited to two factors: (1) that it was first a newspaper and second a political entity; (2) that it maintained a policy of flexibility without yielding on principle.

More than ever, in the present absence of a viable political movement, a radical newspaper has an unusual responsibility. The general press has failed dismally in its duty to provide factual information and criticize government. This failure has never been more clearly demonstrated than in this cold-war generation. Despite a random flicker of dissent that is permitted in its pages, as though to keep the franchise of the First Amendment whose protection it has so roundly abused, the press has in fact become a voluntary arm of government and abandoned its role of public service. In this situation the radical newspaper is essential as the conscience of the nation and its source of honest information.

INDIA'S POLITICAL SCRAMBLE

VED P. NANDA

Mr. Nanda is an assistant professor of law at the University of Denver Law School, having himself been a Sterling Fellow at the Yale Law School. He is an Indian by birth and citizenship, and has recently returned from an extended visit to that country.

The ruling Congress Party suffered serious reverses and lost control of six states in the fourth general election held in India in February, 1967. In subsequent months, major defections from Congress ranks have strengthened the opposition and helped topple Congress governments in four more of the seventeen Indian states. The opposition now rules a major part of India. Even in the Lok Sabha (Lower House of Parliament) the Congress majority is now only 279 out of 515 (it was 358 out of 491 in the previous Parliament), a none too comfortable margin for a party which had virtually no opposition from 1947 to 1962. If defections continue, a non-Congress or coalition government could perhaps take power in New Delhi.

The composition of the non-Congress State governments fairly reflects the transitional nature of Indian politics. They are mostly coalitions run by united fronts. Heterogeneous political elements with conflicting ideologies that initially shared nothing but an intense anti-Congress feeling, they now agree on minimal programs for their ministries. Notable exceptions to this form are Delhi state, which has a clear Jana Sangh (Peoples' Party) majority, and Madras, with an absolute majority of a regional party, Dravida Munetra Kadgam (DMK).

United fronts range from a coalition of the rightist Swatantra (Freedom Party) and Socialists in Orissa, to the formation of a United Leftist front in West Bengal, and a coalition of the Left (Peking) and the Right (Moscow) Communists with Socialists and Muslim League (a militant communal Muslim party) in Kerala. The states of Bihar and Uttar Pradesh feature an incredible combination of traditional enemies—Communists, Socialists, Swatantra, Jana Sangh and dissident Congress representatives. These united front governments have serious organizational problems, clashing interests, and conflicting and contending policies to espouse, but for the time being they are an integral part of the Indian political scene.

Congress has been losing elections mainly because it has lost its pre-independence character of a national movement. Ideological differences within Congress, which were submerged during the struggle against the British, came into the open after independence in 1947. Although Congress proclaimed its shift to the Left under Nehru's leadership, the change featured was a matter more of slogans than of practice. As a result, dissatisfied elements in Congress, with strong Left or Right leanings, started Socialist or Swatantra parties. Nevertheless, pre-independence attachments to the party and the symbolic power of Gandhi and Nehru maintained a semblance of party unity.

The 1962 Indo-Chinese border war, however, greatly damaged the prestige of both Congress and Nehru, and deepened the ideological rifts within the party. On the domestic scene, Congress failed to ameliorate the Indian economic conditions. Rising prices, low agricultural yield, semi-famine conditions in some parts, increasing disparity between rich and poor, and the growing stench of corruption and nepotism shook popular faith in Congress leadership.

An already shaky situation became worse in 1964 when Nehru died. This deprived Congress of its focus, and resulted in a shift of power from New Delhi to the state leaders, further encouraging factional and opportunistic tendencies within the party.

Lal Bahadur Shastri's emergence as a national hero, especially during the 1965 conflict with Pakistan, made it seem for a time that Congress was regaining its lost prestige. But Shastri died too soon to leave a lasting imprint on the party. His successor, Mrs. Indira Gandhi, a compromise candidate, weak, inept and indecisive, with a limited understanding of Indian problems, further damaged the Congress position.

Congress entered the 1967 elections lacking unity, a strong leader, firm and consistent policies and popular appeal. It polled less than 40 per cent of the total votes, losing a big chunk of middle-class and lower-middle-class support to Jana Sangh and non-Communist Left groups, and the support of industrialists, big business and feudal elements to Swatantra. The party also failed to attract the younger voters, who were neither grateful for the pre-independence heroism of Congress, nor awed by the conduct of present Congress leaders in office, nor convinced by its accomplishments since independence. Peasant and labor votes and bloc votes of communities such as Harijans (the so-called untouchables) and Muslims defected to the Communists and non-Communists alike. Congress had kept these blocs in line by making them believe that it alone could safeguard their interests. Foreign policy did not play any significant role in the Congress loss at the polls. Domestic problems completely preoccupied the electorate.

Prime Minister Indira Gandhi

The opposition also played an important role in the Congress defeat. Learning from the previous three elections, when the non-Congress vote was split among several candidates, opposition parties united in a concerted effort against Congress. In many constituencies they were able to agree upon a single candidate to run against the Congress nominee.

The woes of Congress are probably not over; it is likely to lose much more ground in future elections. The blatant failure of its planning policies, especially in agriculture, has caused widespread resentment and indignation. The party organization itself will continue to disintegrate from the serious internal rivalries which have plagued it since 1947.

The recent dismissal by New Delhi of the united front governments in West Bengal and Haryana is not likely to help. In an almost identical situation, the Communist ministry in Kerala was dismissed after the 1957 elections. At that time, Congress constituted a formidable opposition in Kerala; but in the 1967 elections it managed to win only nine of 133 seats in the Kerala state assembly.

The electorate in West Bengal is so disillusioned by Congress that, notwithstanding New Delhi accusations that pro-Peking Communists are inciting violence and disorder there as a prelude to armed revolution, leftist groups will perhaps still retain power if the midterm elections are held. Any seats lost by pro-Peking Communists are more likely to go to other leftists than to Congress. Similar elections in Haryana could perhaps result in further consolidation and strengthening of the dissident Congress-Jana Sangh coalition.

In the next elections, for the first time, Congress will go to the polls not as the dominant force in Indian politics but as an equal, in some states even junior, partner with other opposition parties. Formation of non-Congress governments on the state level has already raised new and younger leaders to compete with the dwindling, aging and tired Congress leadership. Coalition governments have also drawn the opposition parties into closer units, which might polarize forces on the Right and Left, with a moderate party in the middle. Under the impact of the polarization process, Congress may either break up in the process or be faced with division in its ranks. Splinter Congress groups could develop and collaborate with opposition parties, both Left and Right. Armed conflicts on the Himalayan border with China, or in Kashmir with Pakistan might speed the polarization, but would not help Congress to regain its lost political ground. In any outcome, political defeat seems inevitable.

Any doubts about the impending end of the Congress era were resolved for me in a recent visit to several capitals of the non-Congress governments, including Delhi and Bhopal. Bhopal is the capital of Madhya Pradesh (Central India), the latest state to form a non-Congress government. The Chief Minister of Madhya Pradesh, a veteran politician and a dissident Congress member, the deputy Chief Minister, a young Jana Sangh man, and their hard-working, enthusiastic and imaginative colleagues in the cabinet impressed me greatly with their desire to develop a new quality of leadership. Vijay Malhotra, 34, Chief Executive of Delhi State and a former professor of literature, said to me: "Now that Congress is definitely on the way out, the opposition is determined to deliver the goods." On the future of Congress, the deputy Chief Minister of Bihar, K. Thakur, observed: "Congress had already lost its 'head' with the formation of non-Congress governments in all the states of North India. It lost its 'legs' when non-Congress ministries came into power in Madras and Kerala in the south. And now, with the toppling of the Madhya Pradesh government, it has also lost its heart."

Even if Congress does not split or indeed collapse in the near future, three possibilities remain after it loses power in New Delhi: (1) a breakdown of democracy and a military take-over; (2) polarization of political forces on the Left and the Right, with the emergence of an effective political party in the middle uniting Jana Sangh, moderate Socialist and moderate Congress elements, and (3) a Congress comeback.

Given the exclusive recruitment policies of the Indian army, which draws its personnel from selected caste

(Continued on page 188)

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Climbing Norman's Ladder

MAKING IT. By Norman Podhoretz. Random House. 360 pp. $6.95.

MORDECAI RICHLER

Mr. Richler is a Canadian novelist now living in England. He is the author of The Apprenticeship of Dudie Kravitz (Little, Brown) and Stick Your Neck Out (Simon & Schuster). His novel, Cocksure, will be published in March by Simon & Schuster.

The literary progeny of a brilliant, influential, but astonishingly smug body of New York writers, what Norman Podhoretz calls "the family," has taken to flagellating itself, squabbling over who is fit to inherit the coat of many colors, in a manner that strikes me as deplorably inbred. And coarse. To carve one another up, in earlier, less highly publicized days, the patriarchs at least created magazines (Commentary, Partisan Review), went to the artistic trouble of disguising one another in novels, and did in fact produce relevant and outward-looking social criticism, as well as memoirs of some beauty. Today the noisiest of the children, parochial school kids, speak only each to each, castigating one another in Esquire (Baldwin on Mailer), or in acutely embarrassing collections of essays (Chicago cousin once removed Nelson Algren, in his Notes From A Sea Diary), or in bitchy estimates of the other talent in the nursery (Mailer's Advertisements For Myself and subsequent grab bags).

Something has gone wrong, profoundly wrong, when a group of talented writers disdain their natural material, which I still take to be nonliterary society, in order to flay one another in print.

If, in the decent past, the emphasis was on literary performance, now the spotlight is on the performer. It's the personality, not the writing, that is offered for our admiration. The prime and most compulsively readable exponent of this so-called confessional stuff is, of course, Norman Mailer, who is increasingly known for nothing but being Mailer—not so much a writer as the embattled, problem-ridden personality we cheer on. Our Judy Garland.

Something of a country cousin myself, only an occasional visitor to New York, I have, over the years, absorbed a juicy bit or two simply by following the proliferating family squabbles in print. And so I'm well aware (as who isn't?) that the children don't play together nicely.

Take James Baldwin, for instance. He has the chutzpah to call Norman Mailer a middle-class Jew. "I hope I do not need to say no sneer is implied in the above description of Norman." But, Mailer reveals, not middle class enough for uppity Jackie Kennedy, who doesn't answer his letters and wouldn't have him to the White House like that nice Saul Bellow. Nelson Algren, on the other hand, caricatures Baldwin as the lisping, effeminate Giovanni Johnson, and describes Mailer as Norman Manlifellow, a man wearing a sandwich board advertising himself, and lacking in courage. Not so, protests Mailer, revealing in a hitherto unpublished letter to Robert Silvers, well known for being a "post-middle-brow," that after seven other chickens were too scared to review Mary McCarthy's The Group in The New York Review of Books, cocksure Norman obliged. After Hemingway, such are our cojones.

And now Norman Podhoretz, baring his own flick-knife, has—ill-advisedly, I think—joined the rumble. In Making It, he stands up for Mailer, a writer whom he admires but, on the evidence of this essay in autobiography, still an undigested influence. Podhoretz admits that Susan Sontag, the youngest member of the third generation, had an even more rapid rise to attention than he did, but then she had the same rich black hair as the young Mary McCarthy. What clinched family attention for Podhoretz, he writes, was a long and unfavorable review of Bellow's The Adventures of Augie March. Bellow didn't approve, and wrote a lengthy letter of recrimination to Commentary, sending copies to a dozen or more people. Furthermore, Podhoretz writes, Baldwin's famous piece The Fire Next Time, was originally commissioned by Commentary and sold to The New Yorker in an unethical deal made behind Podhoretz's back. And so, if Baldwin thinks Mailer is a middle-class Jew, well, he turns out to be a grasping Negro himself. Podhoretz told Baldwin that "he had dared to commit such a dastardly act because he was a Negro, and had been counting on white-liberal guilt. . . ." This, alas, will not be the end. Even now I imagine Baldwin is writing a piece that will explain how Podhoretz attempted to jew him out of The Fire Next Time, trying to fob him off with six hundred bucks when The New Yorker was offering twelve thousand.

On and on it goes, the titillating trivia, the snitching, without dignity or relevance.

Making It, Mailer's outpourings, the broadsides by Algren and Baldwin, all belong to a genre with intolerable show-biz characteristics. To begin with, there is the arrogant assumption that a big name on a book jacket, like a star's mere appearance in a film, is a sufficient enticement, and that intelligent readers outside New York, like filmgoers in the sticks, can be gratified, even dazzled, simply to be allowed to bask in the reflected glitter. As Dean Martin, Sinatra and their obnoxious camp followers tease us with puerile inside jokes about the Rat Pack, or Richard Burton and Elizabeth Taylor retail the details of their private lives, so Podhoretz, Mailer and the rest would seem to believe us thrilled by a behind-the-scenes peek at New York literary society, its scandals, its fevers. Well, then, let me get this much straight. I have a continuing interest in the works of Trilling, Rahv, Dwight Macdonald, Mailer, Fiedler, Baldwin, Podhoretz and other family figures, but I've had more than enough of the grubby details of their careerist adventures and feuds. Put another way my reverence for Ulysses does not extend to an interest in the prescription for James Joyce's spectacles or his laundry list. I, too, suffer small insults, ailments and tradesmen's bills. But I am unable to create anything as splendid as Ulysses. Ultimately, the family will be judged not by its self-advertised intrigues, quarrels and jealousies, which is after all what it has in common with any other closely knit professional group, whether they be dentists or lawyers, but for its signal failure, for all the racketing so far, to produce one individual work of enduring art. As things stand, though Malamud, Mailer and Saul Bellow, especially, have all done some first-rate work, the family is most celebrated for having produced a succession of inspired Rashis (editors, critics and pedagogues) with a weakness for boring symposium (PR, Commentary, Encounter) and without, as yet, a Talmud to call their own. No Joyce. No Yeats.

Among the younger literary commentators, Norman Podhoretz has shown himself to be an undoubtedly astute editor and critic, but Making It, aside from the engaging early chapters, strikes me as a coarse, badly conceived book.

It is Norman Podhoretz's contention that he suffered a dichotomy in his American education. Encouraged, on the one hand, to pursue success and worldly pleasures, he was taught, on the other hand, that success was the worst form of corruption. Ambition, he argues, "seems to be replacing erotic lust as the prime dirty little secret of the well-educated American soul," and then he goes on to say that at the age of 35 he recognized that he'd rather be rich than poor; he enormously enjoys money, power and fame, which is only shocking in that it shocks Podhoretz. Nevertheless, out of this contradiction, Podhoretz might have fashioned an essay or memoir as fresh and startling as "My Negro Problem—And Ours," which he rightly takes to be his most original piece. Instead he has force-fed a fat and gossipy book onto a structure unable to sustain it.

I do not object to Making It, because, as Podhoretz argues in his introduction, it's a confessional work and "to the extent that it deliberately expresses an order of feeling in myself, and by implication in others, it obviously constitutes the betrayal of a dirty little secret and thereby a violation of certain standards of tastefulness." No, no. I object because the book, touching, deeply felt, when it deals with the author's formative years, rapidly declines into gossip and trade talk once he begins to mix with "important" people. Making It is choked with the sort of anecdotes about Podhoretz himself, other writers and editors, that I, as another writer, would find immensely entertaining if told over a shared bottle of whisky, but committed to print embarrasses by dint of its triviality. If, as we were once told, opinion isn't literature, neither is gossip criticism.

Let me take just two brief examples. The revelation that Bellow wrote a lengthy letter protesting Podhoretz's review of Augie March is amusing, juicy stuff, but it neither heightens nor diminishes my feelings about the novel, and I look to Podhoretz, a critic I respect, for illuminations and to Leonard Lyons, if you like, for keyhole tidbits. Similarly, the dispute with Baldwin. Baldwin's celebrated essay and Podhoretz's reply are both important pieces, the kind of writing I value, but the behind-the-scenes quarrel between them doesn't interest me.

Again and again, I feel Podhoretz fails to recognize his proper material. He will go on and on, for instance, about the hazards of the trade: his ups and downs with The New Yorker, writer's blocks, and what Show magazine paid. But he can actually dismiss in a paragraph the fact that for ten weeks it was his army job to interview incoming recruits and decide what sort of work they should be doing, if they survived basic training—which seems a deplorable waste of fresh material.

Making It can also be read as the story of a raw young provincial, in this case from Brooklyn, coming to the capital resolved to seek out the company of the famous, and acquire fame, fortune and social position. Like the incomparable James Boswell riding into London in 1762. But where Boswell differs from Podhoretz is not only in having a Dr. Johnson, and a redeeming sense of humor about his own machinations, but also in that he was consumed with curiosity about ordinary people as well, the passing scene, so that his making it is filled with lavish detail about the times, public hangings, coffeehouse dialogues, the theatres, public houses, bordellos and streets.

A Land of Lost Identities

THE THIRD POLICEMAN. By Flann O'Brien. Walker & Co. 200 pp. $4.95.

KEVIN SULLIVAN

Mr. Sullivan is associate dean of the Graduate Faculties at Columbia University, and the author of Joyce Among the Jesuits (Columbia University Press).

The appearance of a contemporary classic is a sufficiently rare event that one would expect it to be hailed with appropriate public jubilation. But for almost thirty years now Flann O'Brien's extraordinary novel At Swim Two Birds has had hardly any public at all—and this despite its enthusiastic reception by people like James Joyce, Graham Greene, William Saroyan, whose discernment in this may be the one quality they had in common. The novel was first published in 1939, and its early neglect has been explained as one of the first literary casualties of World War II. Only in Ireland and in certain parts of academic America has it received anything like the recognition it deserved. But even in Ireland and America Flann O'Brien was an in-group figure, and the reason for this may be that in reality he was frequently a couple of other people.

He was born, or at least christened, Brian O'Nolan—a name which, though as euphonious as Lionel Trilling or Edna St. Vincent Millay, he reserved for private life and that part of his public career which was spent as a senior officer in the Irish civil service. In more public appearances as columnist for the Irish Times he was Myles na Gopaleen, a pseudonym borrowed from a minor character in Gerald Griffin's The Collegians, or perhaps from the major character in Dion Boucicault's foamy dramatization of Griffin's novel. Under the same alias he has written An Beal Bocht (The Poor Mouth) a satire on the Irish language revival in which, as Benedict Kiely noted, he demonstrated the success of that revival insofar as such a book could be written in Irish. As Flann O'Brien, the third of his personalities, he has written plays for the Abbey Theatre—Faustus Kelly was produced there in 1943—and three other novels: The Hard Life, The Dalkey Archives and the present work, The Third Policeman.

A closer analogy to Making It, perhaps, Alfred Kazin's A Walker in the City and Starting Out in the Thirties, which can be seen as one book, is also loaded with tender detail about ordinary people. Alas Podhoretz, typical of latter-day family figures, seems to have an eye only for his own ego, an eye turned inward to reveal that his motives for writing are mixed, his ambitions are sometimes crippling, and that some days he behaves opportunistically and other days he hates going into the office at all, which is to say that he is no better, no worse, than the rest of us writers, shoemakers, junior executives, social service workers, plumbers, and so forth. This isn't scandalous, as publisher and author both daringly suggest, and which I, for one, would not have minded. But neither is it news, and that's bad.

This last novel is posthumous and may perhaps be said to be so in more ways than one. It was written in 1940 but not published until 1967, a year after the author's death. It is also a book about a man who is already dead, though the reader is not aware of this till the end, the dead man being the author of his own history—a sort of autothanatography. "When you are writing about the world of the dead," Flann O'Brien has said elsewhere, "none of the rules and laws (not even the law of gravity) holds good." This opens up all kinds of possibilities for grim fun which O'Brien exploits with dead-pan comic grace.

The form of the book is a circular decensus Averni and the idea behind it is set down briefly in a note of the author's which the publisher has sensibly included here as an appendix: "The beginning of the unfinished, the rediscovery of the familiar, the reexperience of the already suffered, the fresh forgetting of the unremembered. Hell goes round and round. In shape it is circular

GOING HOME

The train speeds south past dumped chemical wastes, heaps of yellow slag thrust up in the marsh grass—
The oil waste torches of the refineries billow up flame and black smoke, the stench seeping in through the windows of the coach, clinging to clothes,
the face

The thin, gray waters move sluggish in the reeds move amongst the pilings of the billboards

Boys play basketball in an empty lot their thin bodies lifting and falling slowly in the early winter dusk and slowly the flat Jersey earth fans out to the horizon;

sea-earth, corrugated,
draining swamps and streams to the sea brute, ugly cities dynamic stumps bunched up against the light alkaline sky

Winter grass brilliant green in the dying light

The smooth pull of the train south taking me, the child, deeper into it and lights of the towns coming on, the neon sign of a lone bar out on a highway, speed by and are gone
The sky suspended now between darkness and light—the towns
as though grieving there stunned in the marshland heavy as death
a heavy bloodedness over the landscape a throbbing pain in the air Death animates this place—the rushing land more vivid now as though by death life stirs more poignantly

The child asks:
If he's in the box
how will he eat?
If he's in the box
will he know what his name is?
What will his name be now?

Out the window night drops like a lid

MICHAEL HUMPHREY

THE UGLY MAN

The ugly is my adornment, more palpable than all lathe-turned beauty—young queens and their courts, spit-shined officers held together with lanyard and braid, puppets and knife edge and glitter.

My ugliness blooms
as afternoon comes.
By four

I am a hunchback and leper with a foot
like a tree stump.

I thud along halls, shattering mirrors with glances.

For music
I cough and spit, bleat and bray—
I must kill the beauty

in my voice,
the last blemish,
and learn impediments,

lispering and stammering until my whole hunched bulk becomes a club that beats the world blind.

VERN RUTSALA

HAMPTON BAYS

In this tiny station near the supermarket
I feel as far away from you as if I were winter in Minnesota pushed back by the friendless color and the constant murmur of well-piled lumber.

We are like a funeral procession delayed
our hands are clammy and beneath my tie
the wind enters.

Tonight the cars do not move they wait like a gang of rustlers felled by the mute regularity.

SERGE GAVRONSKY

STEPPING OUT

If I could collect the jewels from broken strings rolling on the floor of feeling to sort them in bowls labelled by cut, clearness and color
I'd step out nightly
clapping like a gypsy, with foreign tongues spangling
my wrists, a hail of crystal eyes at my neck—loop upon loop, and in my hinged ring
the garnet of your heart.

CAROLYN STOLOFF

and by nature it is interminable, repetitive and very nearly unbearable."

The idea is not new; what is new is Flann O'Brien's ingenious embodiment of the idea in a series of weird and comical illustrations and in the singleness of their accumulative effect. Though summary is a thankless task, it will best serve to indicate both the simplicity and complexity of the comic genius here at work.

The anonymous narrator, a strange sort of Irish countryman, has conspired with a man named Divney to murder a rich old farmer and steal his cash box. After the murder, a savage and bloody affair, he goes to the farmer's house to fetch the box and as his fingers touch the lid the whole of his world is suddenly and utterly transmogrified. The dead farmer is alive again, the narrator's soul—"called Joe for convenience"—is present to him as a disembodied voice, and the cash box has been mysteriously transplanted to a police barracks located some distance away.

At the barracks the narrator is met by Sergeant Pluck, a man obsessed by bicycles, and Policeman MacCruiskeen, whose obsession it is to construct exquisite little boxes, one fitted within another Chinese-fashion, and the last so tiny and exquisitely made as to be entirely invisible. These two gentlemen, acting as guides and guardians to the narrator, introduce him to a place underground that looks like eternity, take readings and measurements on unknown instruments, and patiently explain to him the all-sufficient properties of a substance called omnium and the Law of the Interchange of Atomic Particles.

"Michael Gilhaney" says Sergeant Pluck, "is an example of a man that is nearly banjaxed from the principles of the Atomic Theory. Would it astonish you to hear that he is nearly half a bicycle?" But nothing really astonishes where all is astonishment, and the narrator, at one point condemned to be hanged, can still carry on with the policemen an amiable discussion of the technical difficulties to be encountered in gallows building and the unconscionable price of wood. All this fine talk—and there is no end to it—is conducted in what Anthony Burgess has called "Irish solecistic sesquipedalian raised to the ultimate power."

In the end the narrator returns to visit his accomplice, Divney, after what he thinks is an absence of only a few days. Actually it is twenty years later and Divney is quite literally scared to death at the sight of him. The justice of this is apparent in the knowledge now that it was Divney who had planted a bomb in the cash box that had blown the narrator to hell. Thereupon the two men set out across the same pleasant but breathless and static landscape through which the quest for that unholy grail had been begun. They encounter Sergeant Pluck. "Is it about a bicycle?" he asks. The wheel has come full circle. Behind Pluck is MacCruiskeen, and behind him the third policeman of the title. "Hell goes round and round."

Learned papers may yet be written about the identity of that third policeman, but nothing more will be said here. O'Brien adumbrates one kind of academic commentary by interesting his narrator in the work of a weird philosopher named De Selby whose queer theories (on the nature of darkness, for example, as "black air") are expounded in footnotes accompanying the narrative and comprising a pedantic comment upon it.

De Selby also supplies one of the two epigraphs for the novel: "Human existence being an hallucination containing in itself the secondary hallucinations of day and night (the latter an insanitary condition of the atmosphere due to accretions of black air) it ill becomes any man of sense to be concerned at the illusory approach of the supreme hallucination known as death." The second epigraph is from Shakespeare:

Since the affairs of men rest still uncertain,

Let's reason with the worst that may befall.

This epigraphic conjunction of De Selby and Shakespeare is not mere whimsy.

It has been said that the uncertain nature of Irish society has militated against the form of the novel as an imitation of men and manners within a READY NOW!

The only desk-size encyclopedia of such authority and scope

The newly revised, expanded third edition

Essential companion to any dictionary. The Columbia-Viking Desk Encyclopedia has been used in more than 3,000,000 homes, schools, and offices since 1953. With more than half the contents entirely new or revised, the third edition of the CVDE is the most important single-volume reference work of 1968!

Compiled and edited at Columbia University. Based on the famous Columbia Encyclopedia, this new volume contains not only the 1963 revisions of the parent volume, but much material gathered since then. While considerably longer than before, this new edition of the CVDE retains all the features of clarity, economy of wording, and convenience of handling that have made previous editions so popular.

Well-balanced coverage—contemporary emphasis. The CVDE includes what most people want to know about any subject—geography, history, science and technology, medicine, law, education, the social sciences, sports and entertainment, folklore, the arts, religion, language, etc. The thousands of biographies include those of 1109 living people.

When the first edition was published, The New York Times said: "Belongs in every library, no matter how modest or how vast." Today, with its improved coverage and updated information, the CVDE is even greater—to give, to own, to refer to constantly.

1216 pages; 33,111 entries; 57 pages of specially prepared maps, tables, and detailed drawings.

Regular edition $9.95. Thumb-indexed $10.95

THE VIKING PRESS

625 Madison Avenue, New York 10022

POETRY EDITOR

In keeping with The Nation's tradition of a rotating poetry editorship, Michael Goldman is resigning after two years of distinguished and vigorous service and will be replaced by John Logan.

Mr. Logan has taught at Notre Dame, San Francisco State, the University of Washington, and is currently professor of English at the State University of New York in Buffalo. He also conducts a Poetry Workshop at the YMHA Poetry Center in New York and is the editor of Choice, a magazine of poetry and photography published in Chicago. He is the author of three books of poetry, Cycle for Mother Cabrini, Ghosts of the Heart and Spring of the Thief, and has completed the manuscript for a fourth. He was awarded the Miles Modern Poetry Award for 1967.

THE NATIONAL GUARDIAN IS NOW THE

Guardian independent radical newsweekly

We are changing with the times.

In its 20th year of publication, the Guardian has adopted the slogan, "the duty of a radical newspaper is to build the radical movement"—and it is taking practical steps to fulfill this intention.

On Feb. 10, America's largest-circulation independent left-wing paper is expanding from 12 to 16 tabloid pages to make room for more extensive reportage and analysis of the domestic movements for social change and of the world revolutionary struggle.

The new, staff owned and managed Guardian will publish several new columnists; broaden foreign news coverage to supplement correspondents in Phnom-Penh (Wilfred Burchett), Havana, Peking, New Delhi, London and Rome; redesign its format and modernize type faces and headlines.

The new Guardian is a radical news-weekly with a difference. Find out for yourself—at no cost. The Feb. 10 issue will be sent free on request. A 10-week trial subscription is only $1. With one-year subscriptions you will be sent Wilfred Burchett's latest book, "Vietnam North," free of charge. The cost is $7.00 for one year, $3.50 for students.

Indicate your preference:

- ☐ Send me a sample copy
☐ Enclosed is $_____ for:
☐ 10 week trial sub ☐ 1 yr. sub
☐ 1 yr. student sub include school name _____
☐ Do ☐ Do not include Free Book.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

GUARDIAN / 197 E. 4th St. N.Y.C. 10009

coherent social context, and that it encourages the writing of short stories which concentrate on individual chunks or fragments of that society—"slices of life" as the critical commonplace has it. The point is debatable, but so far as it is true one can understand why the novel has abandoned its traditional form in the hands of writers like Joyce, Beckett and O'Brien.

Manners do not interest them because men do not exist for them within a definable social structure; men are metaphorical jokes whose identity, or lack of it, tantalize the writer into the act of writing. The completed act is profoundly moral in its implications and frequently comic in elaboration. It starts and ends with man, as Shakespeare does, and not afraid to "reason with the worst that may befall," it veers constantly toward a kind of nihilism—Joyce escaping out of or above history, Beckett disappearing into the silence on the other side of language, and O'Brien moving with straight-faced gaiety into nonexistence itself an anonymous land of lost identities.

It is no surprise then that on the first page of At Swim Two Birds O'Brien should announce that "One beginning and one ending for a book was a thing I did not agree with. A good book may have three openings entirely dissimilar and inter-related only in the prescience of the author, or for that matter one hundred times as many endings." Having said which, he proceeded to write exactly that kind of book—a novel of sorts but really sui generis.

A reader coming from At Swim Two Birds to The Third Policeman will be reminded again of Joyce, though it would be a mistake to exaggerate the influence. For there are other shades of influence lying over these pages, some vague, some wry, all right to the purpose and utterly transformed from the shape at their source, those of Swift and Berkeley, Sterne and Yeats, Kafka and Pirandello, and even of little Father Prout, alias Francis Sylvester Mahony, jogging along under the enveloping white shade of Dante Alighieri. But these are only shadows, the substance is all O'Brien. The Third Policeman secures his place, already indicated by At Swim Two Birds, as the most original comic artist, after Joyce, to come out of Ireland in this century.

Subsidy Contamination

THE AMERICAN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Edited by Henry Swoboda. Basic Books. 208 pp. $5.95.

THE GREAT CONDUCTORS. By Harold C. Schonberg. Simon & Schuster. 384 pp. $7.50.

RICHARD FREEDMAN

Mr. Freedman teaches at Simmons College and the Harvard Extension. He has written for The Kenyon Review, Book Week and Saturday Review.

The American Symphony Orchestra is a non-book consisting of seventeen taped lectures and interviews originally broadcast by the Voice of America for the edification of our friends abroad. Composers, conductors, critics and musical middlemen respond to a variety of questions about the state of symphonic music in the United States today, which on the whole they find to be comfortably healthy.

The issue here, of course, is government sponsorship of symphony orchestras. Given its auspices, one is hardly surprised to find a preponderance of opinion in the book opposed to government subsidy. The most forthright spokesman for free enterprise is Samuel R. Rosenbaum, a member of the USIA's Music Advisory Panel.

Mr. Rosenbaum admits that state subsidy "tends to assure the players against the uncertainties of musical existence"—a pleasant euphemism for starvation. But "while this is admirable from the human point of view," he continues, "it is axiomatic that one cannot be both great and comfortable." Federal subsidies run "the risk of mediocrity."

I challenge Mr. Rosenbaum to find one bar of mediocre playing in all fifteen hours of the recording of Wagner's Ring cycle by the state-supported Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Musicians are artists, and it is "axiomatic" that no artist is ever "comfortable" if he is a real artist. However comfortable the Vienna players may be financially, they nevertheless manage to function at least as well as any American orchestra constantly engaged in the degrading and debilitating scramble for private support.

Mr. Rosenbaum himself seems remarkably comfortable in the knowledge that, as Paul Hume points out, in 1964 the average contract salary was only slightly more than $5,000 for players in our leading orchestras. Since that time, affairs have improved somewhat, with the establishment of the National Council of the Arts and Humanities, of private philanthropic foundations, of tax exemptions on tickets and deductions for contributions.

However, the facts remain that all

American orchestras operate at a deficit, that the state-subsidized European orchestras are just as great and pure-minded as ours, and that one day's expenditure ($66 million) on napalming peasants in Vietnam into a proper appreciation of Free World values could support every orchestral musician in this country on a full fifty-two-week contract from now to doomsday.

Interestingly enough, the closer the contributors to this volume are to the actual making of music, the less panic they show that government subsidy would prostitute our orchestras. Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, hopes "that the day will come when the American Government will support orchestras." Maurice Abravanel, conductor of the Utah Symphony, believes subsidy might even be socially useful, as he has found that the exposure of youth to great music is a check on juvenile delinquency. And when Mr. Rosenbaum asks William Schuman, the composer, whether a composer who receives a commission turns in less satisfactory work than when he "feels the urge to write something he wants to say," Mr. Schuman must politely remind him that Bartók (who was nearly allowed to starve here) composed his great Concerto for Orchestra on a foundation commission.

Next to a wage reasonably commensurate with its contribution to society, what an orchestra needs most is a great conductor. It is his artistic pressure, not financial pressure, which makes orchestras play well. The most famous attempt at a conductorless orchestra was the 1922 Persimfans experiment in Moscow. Founded during the heyday of Soviet liberalism, the orchestra was supposed to show that dictatorial conductors were an anomaly in a truly democratic society. It was a terrible flop, and the overwhelming impression one gets from Harold C. Schonberg's The Great Conductors is that the nastier and more despotic the baton-wielder, the greater the performance.

"Orchestras only need to be sworn at," Bernard Shaw once observed, "and a German is consequently at an advantage with them, as English profanity, except in America, has not gone beyond a limited technology of perdition."

While the prima donna conductor of a huge virtuoso orchestra is a late 19th-century phenomenon, the tradition of the terrible-tempered maestro did not originate with Bülow and Mahler but goes back as far as Bach and Mozart, both of whom were as royally hated and feared by incompetent players as Toscanini or Reiner in our day.

Mr. Schonberg, music critic of The New York Times, tells all the classic tales of conductors' temper tantrums, beginning with Lully ramming his baton into his foot in 1687 and subsequently dying of the gangrene thus induced. Each of the great ones had his own special technique for eliciting the finest possible performance from his orchestra.

Mahler's bitter sarcasm, Toscanini's gutter language, Furtwängler's murky metaphysical disquisitions, and Beecham's aristocratic Edwardian wit all performed essentially the same function of galvanizing a disparate group of 100-odd musicians into giving the conductor at least a simulacrum of the ideal sound in his head.

The book is heavier on amusing anecdote than on serious analysis of what in fact a conductor does. We are given fair warning of its popular nature in the Preface, where the author complains that "the standard source, Georg Schunemann's Geschichte des Dirigierens . . . never has been translated." To be thus daunted by having to read a work in German is hardly the mark of a serious musicologist.

Nevertheless a serious theme runs through the book. Schonberg distinguishes between two basic types of conductors: those who meddle with scores to produce a highly idiosyncratic, personal interpretation, and those "classicalists" who adhere faithfully to the printed notes. Mahler and Mengelberg were of the first school; Toscanini, Szell and Karajan of the second.

The importance of memorizing scores, of such absorbing interest to non-musicians, has long been disputed by conductors. Hans von Bülow once told the young Richard Strauss: "You must have the score in your head and not your head in the score." But Hans Knappertsbusch—like Bülow a distinguished Wagnerite—when asked why he always used a score replied: "Why not? I can read music."

Perhaps the greatest conductor of all was Mahler, and one wishes that he had been invited to contribute to the Voice of America Festschrift. He called the New York Philharmonic "the true American orchestra—without talent and phlegmatic," and had to resign its directorship because the all-powerful ladies of the board of directors objected to his deficit and his programing. "In Vienna," his wife commented, "even the Emperor did not dictate to him, but in New York he had ten ladies ordering him around like a puppet." Although he died, exhausted, a few months later, he must have died happy in the knowledge that he had never been contaminated by federal subsidy.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS!
ALL change of address notices, orders for subscriptions and other correspondence, should be sent to:
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue,
New York, N.Y. 10014

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

Mrs. Blackburn, a former book editor for a New York publishing house, is now a free-lance writer.

OF LOVE AND DUST. By Ernest J. Gaines. The Dial Press. 281 pp. $4.95.

This is a rare bird indeed in the publishing world: a serious, powerful novel by a talented writer that is accessible to a very wide audience. Mr. Gaines's book is about the lives of some people on a Louisiana plantation—today. His narrator is a black man, Jim Kelly, a shrewd but leave-dreadful-enough-alone tractor driver. Reluctantly, he becomes responsible for a young convict who is sent to work off his time at the plantation. The convict, because he's paid his dues and refuses to abide by the rules of the white man's game, stands in an excellent position to endanger the lives of the "good" Negroes on the plantation. But he wants a life for himself, and he doesn't care. Kelly's transition from cynical don't-rock-the-boatism to something else takes place over a series of

Why Do You Read So Slowly?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to double your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure and ability in their personal and professional life by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, many people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading skill to a remarkable degree. Whether reading literature, business material, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-512, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

exciting and beautifully realized scenes, some of them funny, during which the convict first seduces and then tries to run off with the white wife of the plantation's overseer. Does it sound predictable? It isn't, because Mr. Gaines—who was born on a Louisiana plantation and spent his childhood working in the fields—is a writer of terrific energy; his characters have a dimension and authenticity that makes us know and care about them. It takes a lot of nerve to write a novel like this today, and a lot of skill to bring it off. Mr. Gaines has plenty of both.

I WANT A BLACK DOLL. By Frank Hercules. Simon & Schuster. 320 pp. $5.95.

I Want a Black Doll is a soap opera with serious intentions about a Negro doctor from the Deep South (with a white father whose identity has been concealed from him) who marries a white girl from an old Southern family. They move to New York and make it among the black bourgeoisie. One assumes that Mr. Hercules is familiar with this element but he has failed embarrassingly at satirizing them here. The book has a Faulknerian prologue and epilogue, the characters are distinguishable from one another only by name, and there is a great deal of violence, all of it Very Symbolic. As with all soap operas, the novel is quite absorbing.

THE W.A.S.P. By Julius Horwitz. Atheneum Publishers. 243 pp. $4.95.

It seems unfair to judge Julius Horwitz as a novelist on the basis of The W.A.S.P. Reading it, one feels that he chose the novel as a vehicle for ideas he thought so explosive that they would be impossible to present in another form. The book emerges as a grotesquely fictionalized extension of The Moynihan Report; Mr. Horwitz's premise is that white America has destroyed not only the family structure but everything else of value to the black man in this country, and has turned him into a cultureless murderer with no way to express himself except through violence. The situation—and the novel—lock black and white into an endless dance of death, with the roles of murderer and victim wearily interchangeable. All of the characters in The W.A.S.P.—black and white—speak in long sermons about violence and its inevitability. What is gripping about the novel is the sense it conveys of Mr. Horwitz's own terror and despair at the monstrous world he has invented here.

THE FREE-LANCE PALLBEARERS. By Ishmael Reed. Doubleday & Co. 155 pp. $3.95.

Although Ishmael Reed's first novel is set in a country where the people are obsessed by excrement, its leader is a cannibalistic pederast, and the police and judicial functions are carried out by idiotic brutes against a general citizenry so repulsively indifferent that it seems to deserve them, the book will make you laugh out loud. The plot is thin to invisible, but Reed's hero, Bukka Doopeyduk (once on his way to being "the first bacteriological warfare expert of the colored race," and whose name should be scatted rather than conventionally pronounced) serves as a weird telescope for a society that is terrifying for its violence and passive hypocrisy, yet somehow hilarious as well. The Free-Lance Pallbearers succeeds in doing, in 155 pages, what Norman Mailer's Why Are We In Vietnam? swiped valiantly at. If comparisons are to be made, they should be to Burroughs, but this novel is all Mr. Reed's own. Read it.

stamp her creed and personality permanently on the souls of her students.

Miss Brodie has courage and enormous will. She yields to her sexual drive but refrains from marriage with a timorous colleague. She encourages dalliance in her wards. She abhors Catholicism. She is a Fascist, though she rarely speaks of politics except in epic terms. Being an unconscionable romantic, she does not realize the gap between her convictions and her behavior. She arouses either unbounded admiration or rebellion, but never fails to impress. She is destructive and absurd, drawn here as a comic figure with pathetic overtones. As a fierce egotist, she must finally fail, for the truth is not in her.

One might suspect that Muriel Spark (if not Jay Allen) had in mind a Catholic travesty of Protestant self-deception. But we should not press this interpretation. Her design has broader psychological implications and the play at least does not probe very much beneath its ironically humorous surface. It is sufficient for the occasion.

The production suffers from overemphasis. Michael Langham has directed it with sledge-hammer insistence on what the script itself makes abundantly evident and readily enjoyable. Zoe Caldwell, endowed with unusual faculties for vivid projection which include a voice of refined power, great inner force, a natural gift for theatrical delineation, and a healthy sense of fun, is a brilliant actress. But her portrayal of Jean Brodie is much too stressed and studded with obtrusive detail. Even the personage's plainness is overdone by an unbecoming wig and unneeded exaggeration in makeup. Miss Brodie thus becomes freakish. The actress could have gotten twice the effect with half the effort. Proof of this is offered by her best moments in the final scenes, when Miss Brodie, bereft of illusions and her job, becomes simple and touching.

Her earlier overexertion may have been due in part to first-night nerves. Still, other performances—particularly those of some of the girls—showed similar strain. And why, I wondered, did so many of the cast during a large part of the evening stare out front into space? Why also was Jo Mielziner permitted or required to design an abstract set with no trace of atmosphere, a set which doesn't even please the eye?

Lennox Milne is authoritative as the head mistress; several of the children are individually appealing. None of the actors is responsible for the production's limitations. The direction is miscalculated. But for all that, it is certainly superior to most of the season's offerings.

The Happy Time (at the Broadway Theatre) is a triumph of direction. One might go so far as to say that Gower

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

With The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie (Helen Hayes Theatre) we are clearly in an area of intelligence and good writing. The script which Jay Allen has derived from Muriel Spark's novel is adult entertainment.

I say "entertainment" because I am not at all certain what the real point of the play is and, not having read the novel, I cannot say what its larger intention may have been, if it had one beyond that of depicting a curiously interesting character. Then too there are faults in the production which diminished my pleasure.

Miss Jean Brodie is a Scottish schoolteacher in a conservative secondary school for girls in Edinburgh. At 35 or so and of rather prim appearance, she is bursting with a womanly energy which gives her considerable amorous capacity and attractiveness. She cares little for the strictly academic curriculum; her ambition is to influence her pupils in the appreciation of the sensuous charms of Boucher's paintings, the romance of La Traviata, the excitement of Italy, the grandeur of such leaders as Mussolini, Franco and Hitler, and the enthrallment of the sensual life. She wants to

To our University readers:

How to fight "negative nostalgia" in the classroom—for 65c a week

"In a world that is trying to survive on negative nostalgia," wrote one department chairman in ordering block subscriptions to THE NATION for his classes, "THE NATION is one of a few publications that are trying to move us forward."

If you teach classes that relate to the future of the United States, to the uncertain present, or to the story of our past national progress, you may find it wise to take out block subscriptions to THE NATION for classroom use.

As seen from New York . . .

Your students can follow the front-line battle for the cities in THE NATION. Mayor John V. Lindsay has said of THE NATION: "It is a publication which has advanced the public interest and which understands that truthful speaking by an enlightened public is essential to a nation's well-being. I may disagree from time to time with editorial policy or with content, but I am always in hearty agreement with THE NATION's willingness to speak out."

and from Cambodia . . .

Prince Sihanouk found time to cable THE NATION: "I must express to you my most sincere gratitude for the understanding and objectivity which your magazine has shown toward my country and myself. . . . The future is very gloomy for our country's peaceful and neutral nationalism. But thanks to some Americans of ability and heart, and to certain independent publications that dare to come to the defense of Cambodia, libeled and soon perhaps to be invaded, we shall not completely despair of the American nation."

How about your classroom?

We can deliver THE NATION for your classroom use for 65c per month per student, in lots of ten or more. Ten such subscriptions, for the next three months, cost just $19.50, or $1.95 per student. A pretty small investment, perhaps, when you consider what is at stake in our classrooms today.

To bring your students the mature and challenging presentation of current issues presented in THE NATION, fill out and return the form at right.

What others say:

"Student boredom is one of the great barriers to learning. Where a course can be enlivened by social controversy and by knowledge passionately felt and applied to the critical problems of our time, the interests of the students come alive. That is why in over 15 years of teaching in mid-Western and Eastern colleges I have often turned to THE NATION for classroom subscriptions to supplement the factual, but passionless, American government textbook."

Associate Professor
Kingsborough Community College
Brooklyn, N.Y.

"I have used THE NATION for 20 years in my courses in American government and American foreign policy. Its consistently high level of performance has made it the most useful aid of any periodical attempting to interpret the American scene to the college student. It challenges them to think, to dispel the fog of intellectualism in which they have moved, to put to examination the easy assumptions of their community."

Head, Social Science Department
Middle Tennessee State College
Murfreesboro, Tennessee

"Once again, may I thank you for a truly great magazine. . . . 'The invisible shield of daring is a weapon from the sky, against being dead.'—Lao Tze, 6th century B.C."

Student, Antioch College
Yellow Springs, Ohio

"I subscribe to THE NATION, and I regard it as an excellent source of political commentary for teachers and students both. You have maintained your bite and vitality over the years, and I have dropped subscriptions to other magazines while always renewing my NATION subscription."

Professor, Politics Department
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, Massachusetts

"As a class tool, THE NATION has the virtue of stimulating the students, of awakening them to a whole new world of unhappy people, of conflicts and injustices and frank discussion of problems which the polite world of our local journalism ignores."

Dean of Arts and Sciences
San Diego State College
San Diego, California

What say you?

NA 2-5

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

I wish to use THE NATION in my classroom for the next 3 months. Enclosed is $1.95 per student, or _____ for _____ students.

Name _____

School _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Champion is the "author" of the show. The slight but agreeably sentimental plot, in a "Book" by Richard Nash, suggested by characters from Robert Fontaine's stories and a 1950 hit play, the so-so songs by John Kander, the serviceable lyrics by Fred Ebb have all been woven into a delicately colorful, humorous and warming event.

The whole is greater than the sum of its parts, but the parts themselves are significant as the "vocabulary" of the whole. Peter Wexler's setting is not only mechanically suitable to the light texture of the directorial style but seems to partake of the gentle dreaminess and modest frolic of the evening.

The cast is extraordinary well chosen. Robert Goulet really sings, looks good and acts acceptably. Julie Gregg has a nice singing voice and plays the role of a high school teacher without foolish frills; she is most appropriately dressed by Freddy Wittop whose costumes are admirably right. The thoroughly winning kids (particularly Jeffrey Golkin) who do several wonderfully effective choreographic numbers, a small-scale but genuine characterization by Charles Durning as a bibulous, lachrymose, good-hearted non-entity all make invaluable contributions to the total pattern.

Best of all is David Wayne. He is genial, witty, endlessly engaging by being so thoroughly at home on the stage whether he is speaking, singing or dancing. His practiced effortlessness is in the best vein of an "old" and ever contemporary tradition of American acting.

Wayne plays Grandpere Bonnard, an elderly small-town French Canadian with so dear a zest for life that he pretends to be a lecher, a grumbler, a mordant eccentric, though he is actually a man of great good sense and inner stability. The "story" concerns his sons and grandchildren—above all Bibi, an adolescent boy well embodied by Mike Rupert—whom he treats with loving gruffness. They are Huguenot in their somewhat strait-laced propriety (if not in their denomination), and display provincial Gallic "vices" while remaining basically artistic by nature.

This "family portrait" is meant to celebrate the good life in its humbler phases, an acceptance of the aches, pains, pleasures and adventure of ordinary experience. Their home and mode of living constitute the affectionately remembered existence, despite domestic ruckus, of a quiet place in a remote corner of a turbulent world. It is a Canadian Our Town with a French accent.

Gower Champion strikes the exactly just tone in every aspect of the production. His work in this instance possesses a unity rarely attained in our presentation of drama. He has a tactful eye in respect to color, never overlush, never flagrant, and yet always in accord with musical comedy auspices. His choreography is not so much a display of sophisticated dance movements as an expressive comedic statement of character and circumstances: the positions and postures he dictates all tell a tale without ostentation. He reveals an easy command through restraint. The Happy Time is a bouquet for Broadway.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

Innumerable justifications are available to highlight "Word and Image," the Museum of Modern Art's new exhibition of more than 350 posters from its own collection. Thematically and conceptually, nothing could be more relevant to current enthusiastic notions about mixed media, the mélange of "fine" and commercial art, and the ever more liberal and heady definitions of communications potentialities. We are in the heyday of the expendable visual image, which mirrors our celebration of our technological selves. It is a joy which the silk screen or lithography of posters, coming into their own with a vengeance, materializes more jazzily, if not more rapidly, than television, and more accessibly than abstract paintings, which come more and more to look like outsized posters themselves (without copy). Moreover, who can ignore the thriving trade in the camp, underground, or hippie items of the genre? From another angle, concrete poetry fits very nicely within the area, while political activism has, and will again, thrive in it. The show is almost literally an ecumenical council of the graphic arts.

At first sight, it appears also to be an immense hodgepodge of 20th-century civilization, much as if we had, continuously running, random snippets from hundreds of movies of every conceivable vintage and origin, thrown hugger-mugger and simultaneously upon screens at various depths and of various sizes. The babble of voices, messages, styles and activities vortexes through the great opening hall, and often enough papers over tiered, sequenced, or cantilevered boxes, a whole series of cubic projections that would make one think of loud-speakers were they not also, at their staggered levels, a remarkable architectural solution to the problem of multiple display. The sense of the exhibit, directed by Mildred Constantine and installed by Arthur Drexler, is at once historical and comparative, giving counter-clockwise introduction to the big moments of the posterous, starting with the frenetic Art Nouveau of Jan Toorop, and winding up with the equally nervous psychedelic art nouveau of Peter Max. Adjacent galleries assist as more detailed subsections of period styles, a compendium of approaches translated out of, or at cousinly remove from, the well-known isms of modern art.

The profusion of subjects ranges from Jane Avril to Levy's Jewish rye, from Loie Fuller to Bob Dylan. One finds, to begin arbitrarily, political images; electioneering, recruiting, jingoistic, agit-prop (although a good selection of Russian and German variants are sadly missing), protest (very few) and public services. Next, and naturally most dominant, are commercial posters: products, galas, movies, theatre, personalities, travel, industry. And two smaller areas are looked into: exhibitions whose posters were created by the artists themselves, and ephemera of various kinds—books, illustrations, broadsides, magazine covers, typographic designs, and the like. To grasp an idea of the actual variety of the exhibit, however, one must imagine that any, or all, of these functions enlist the vocabulary of Art Nouveau, Cubism, Expressionism, de Stijl, Bauhaus, Purism, Dada, Surrealism and Pop art, to say nothing of photography, the lingua franca of the medium. The permutations are endless, for poster artists are the most unashamed predators imaginable. They are in search of ideas rather than a vision, and their ideas theoretically have to serve only one real purpose—selling. Nothing can inspire more eclectic groups and geographical regions, its isolation from the civilian population, and the still prevailing British tradition of civil authority over the military, a coup by the army is unlikely.

INDIA (Continued from page 179)

The possibility that Congress will regain power is equally remote. Recent election trends indicate that Congress has been decisively rejected by an overwhelming majority of voters, who have given the opposition parties their chance and are now eagerly awaiting their performance.

Thus the middle-ground possibility seems most likely. India badly needs an honest, efficient and businesslike government that tolerates no nonsense and gathers and expands its resources wisely. Instead of ideologies, leadership and organization will primarily determine the future of the political parties. In this regard, Center parties do seem to have an edge and are likely to capture power in 1972.

ticism than the cash nexus, or more opportunism than advertising.

It is the press of such conditions, however, that eventually provides a style of its own. The poster, generally, is up front, without substantial pictorial background; it is an art of the close-up. It must ordinarily provide flair and dash as concisely as possible. It should be instantly intelligible and message-oriented. These prerequisites give posters an inevitable aura of shorthand and stylization. Walter Crane, an early modern practitioner, spoke of them as a form of heraldry. If so, they are constrained to herald good or uplifting news, finger pointing or reflex jabbing with limitless enthusiasm. But despite its unalloyed optical cheer or urgency, the poster is an affair of considerable and often complex compromise. Condensing insights, or rather techniques, from modern art, it must reach a lay audience to whom aesthetic perception is completely incidental. Realism, as so many of the poster handbooks indicate, is too prolix for its aims, even though it constitutes what is best understood. There arose, therefore, a form of stereotyping, composed of impulses from animated drawing, editorial cartoons, graphic design, cinema, layout, typography; a flexible crossbreeding of sign into symbol that became the special poster code. By means of posters, abstraction may largely have been domesticated; naturalism, on the other hand, they certainly helped to flatten out. The publicity context and the audience leveling which resulted gave birth to a new kind of visual slanginess, a visual argot that paradoxically was supported at its best by a certain discretion.

This urban, high-speed graphic art, so hybrid in its sources, so pervasive in its presence, rarely attracts serious critical attention. Though many posters will survive it gracefully, few were intended to undergo such scrutiny. By aesthetic standards, posters are not sufficiently self-conscious to maintain substantial results—so that, for instance, anticipation of color-field painting, far avant la lettre, cannot be considered radical but mere fruit of a local exigency. But it is interesting to note that the museum has its own criteria in the matter.

There will not be found in it galleries, testimonials, snob appeals, subway placards, billboards, store displays, anything, that is, so unredeemably within the realm of the hard sell, so complacent in its triviality, that it has forgotten good manners, let alone the elements of good design. Many items in those categories would have offered the noisome social revelation and documentary punch that the exhibition as a whole means to avoid in the interest of a characteristic tastefulness. In the earlier sections of the show, therefore, the bulk of the material is made up of acknowledged masters in the field, artists in their own right, like El Lissitzky or Herbert Bayer. For the more recent sections, the director has concentrated on corporate-sponsored, big-agency, or collector-initiated projects like the List Art Poster Foundation, always well-bred in its innocuous messages, or unemphatic in its cajolery, whenever that exists. So omniscient and prestigious has been the museum's view of graphic (and product) design, that a good deal of the material it has collected over twenty years may be said to have been influenced, directly or subliminally, by the hope of "making it" at the Modern. Under these circumstances, the mere oomph or zing of the yeoman poster is subtly made to look lower class, an in-groupish aristocracy and obliqueness being apparent compensation for the poster's applied-arts status (e.g., Wheeler's New Haven R.R. Life placards.) In any event, I do not want to lament the level of handsomeness, which has been raised, but rather to remark that sophistication can be a form of self-flattery, while still directly motivated by the mercantile system.

As for the evolution of the modern poster, the show does a very illuminating if—necessarily, in some cases—a spotty job. With the introduction of the steam-driven lithographic press in the mid-19th century, a machine that could turn out more than 10,000 sheets an hour, with, a little later, good, cheap color registration, the stage had been set for the mass production of posters designed by artists. It was significant that the pioneer here, Jules Chéret, drew directly on the stone, carrying over a pictorial spontaneity into a reproductive process that was also to typify Lautrec. The emerging need to advertise reviews, musicals and variety shows blended with the impact of Japanese prints and the decorative aspects of Symbolist art to spur the whole poster phenomenon. With its kinesthetic melding of lettering and motif, its clever associationism (selling not the oil but the lamplight, not the powder but the beauty it creates; Ervine Metzl), this period produced a sensational string of masterpieces; Bonnard's "La Revue Blanche," Mackintosh's "The Scottish Musical Review," Lautrec's "Le Divan Japonais" and works by Beardsley, Mucha and Steinlin. The poster's easy, continuous sense of enjoyment, the playful bourgeois relaxation with which it trade-marked the belle époque, spread to America (Maxfield Parrish, Will Bradley), and to Germany, where Ludwig Hohlwein fused it with the more exotic style of the Murnau period Kandinsky.

In the confusing aesthetics of the First World War, Expressionism contributed one of the great posters. Kokoschka's "Drama-Komoedie," and Futurism, cribbed by E. McKnight Kauffer, furnished a stunning design, "The Early Birds." (A sorry omission from the show are the English Vorticists.) By the twenties, an irreparable change, as Arthur Drexler pointed out to me, came over poster art. Gone forever were the innocent, slightly passive images of people in unpretentious pursuit of comfort. Politics assumed the thrust of menacing mass movements, as in Lissitzky's terrifying vision of the proletariat in his "Russische Ausstellung" poster of 1929, while utopian views of a typographic order pervaded the Bauhaus, and even leisure took on monumental, high-power overtones. The great genius was A. M. Cassandre, famed for his Dubonnet image, coming out of Corbusier and Ozenfant, but best represented here by his dazzling Metro poster for the Nicolas liquor distributors, and his Spidoleine ad, which owes so much to Miró. Of Cassandre, Blaise Cendrars wrote that he had discovered in publicity "the flower of contemporary life." While it may have been specifically typical of the French during the twenties and thirties to give a poetic endorsement to a whole economic system, the accent has stayed with us, innocent even in its disingenuousness.

A curious remembrance of this moment springs up in Lichtenstein's Aspen Jazz Festival poster, whose thirties revival style jadedly apes the enthusiasm of Cassandre's Corbusier-Léger program. It is a bowdlerization of a parody, in part sheer ironic fashion mongering, in part reflecting posters' continuing function as cheap portraits of works of art. Recently, the print renaissance among artists in America has assured, for what might be called art posters, a remarkable degree of self-sufficiency, in that they

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

2-5-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

PERSONALS

LAWYERS WANTED

Excellent opportunity available as Research Assistant of Legal Services Program on Navajo Indian Reservation. Position entails performing intensive back-up research for the Director and other staff members; formulating and maintaining current a handbook of substantive of federal, state and tribal laws for use of all attorneys, assisting in formulation and conduct of community legal education program; drafting all appellate briefs, drafting proposed federal, state or tribal legislation and participating in development of staff training material.

High competence and commitment to dauntless advocacy of indigents indispensable. Arizona or New Mexico license preferred. Two or more years of experience as appellate court clerk or private research and drafting preferred.

Salary: $8,000 to $10,000 per annum. Housing allotment. Position at Central Office, Window Rock, Arizona.

Send resume and sample of writing to:

Theodore R. Mitchell, Director
DINEBEHNA NAHILNA BE AGADITANE, INC.
P.O. Box 368,
Window Rock, Arizona 86515

Telephone: 602/871-4151

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE

Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 28 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

DISCUSSION GROUP meets weekly, members' homes, Manhattan. Vital, controversial issues of Human Relations, Politics, Psychology, Religion. All viewpoints represented. High I.Q., articulateness, requisites. CA 8-9663

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

PEACE IS A HUMAN RIGHT.

Metal License size & Make Love—Not War $1.25, 2/$2; Get Out of Vietnam (Dayglow) 25c, 12 kinds/$2; Peace Pencils, 7 kinds, 25/$1.00 Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151.

McCarthy in '68, Reagan & Lassie in '68, Johnson for Ex-President, RFK in '68, Dump Johnson in '68, Kill for Peace king-size bumper strips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802, Chicago, Illinois 60690

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)

"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

30 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D. Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

I WILL APPRECIATE hearing from anyone who knows Agnes Smedley, Tillie Olsen, 1435 Laguna, San Francisco, Calif. 94115

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

are a direct outcrop of studio work (Stella, Tony Smith.) What had been an art of adjectives and verbs subsides now into a vision of nouns. Noteworthy about the psychedelic work, on the other hand, is its wish to be aesthetic in this way, and yet, underground—faintly, or by implication, a social protest. Despite some eye rockingly lyrical designs, its dilemma is that it has found its version of enthusiasm in an expensive-looking, picky art nouveau, that is only too accessible to a kind of vulgar em-bourgeoisement against which it is nominally in opposition.

Only one poster in the exhibition can be construed as dissent from the current American status quo—and it is so refined, and compromisingly lovely as almost to escape notice. Two gentlemen by the names of Gianakos and Ancona have designed a small American flag with black star field, above the almost invisible legend "Send Our Boys Home." It is a whimper that makes one crave for that lost spontaneity, that liaison between political passion and powerful art, to which some posters allude.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

It is irrelevant to complain that Norman Mailer's Wild 90 is rambling, repetitious, incoherent and inept—that is how it is supposed to be. It is not a performance but a put-on, an elaborate joke—Norman the party stopper—whose point is that it has none. And it succeeds: the new film critic of The New Yorker, who declares Wild 90 the worst movie she has ever sat through to the end, nevertheless writes seven full columns on it. True, she devotes a good deal of that space to informing us of the virtues and limitations of cinéma vérité, but still Mailer has scored with a major entry in America's leading gossip paper. He's the man in the news, and never mind how he got there.

I want to devote a little space myself to the put-on, a phenomenon with which I am growing very weary. In rough parallel to the credibility gap that now vexes civil life, the put-on exploits the credulity gap in the public's comprehension of the arts. Since the dominant impulses in all the arts today are iconoclasm, improvisation and ambiguity, and since the most embarrassing social blunder is to be thought square, practitioners whose hunger for attention exceeds their invention or projective energy are tempted to work variations on the emperor's clothes or the missing step in the flight of stairs. They take care to introduce some shock to the mores, construct their prank in some momentarily fashionable argot or fabric, and depend on a timid lack of conviction in press and public to bring them fame. The practice is utterly destructive of any talent these jokers may possess, but since usually they possess almost none (Mailer is a sad exception), that is not the main objection. Put-ons are baleful because they proliferate much more rapidly than expressions honestly intended, and their detection and weeding out divert attention from genuine essays in communication. The giggles are drowning out conversation.

Thus I am obliged to report that in Wild 90, Mailer has not written a script and is not acting a part; he is exhibiting his fantasies and showing off in public. The conflict between Mailer the artist and Norman the brawler has been evident for a long time; it has made him the best-known character in contemporary American letters and may well be seen by historians of his generation as the tragedy that boxed him in. Now he appears before us under the name of Prince, an aging, punch-drunk club fighter turned petty gangster. He is holed up in a loft with a couple of sleazy companions, slurping whiskey, combing his hair compulsively before a mirror, strutting like a fat midget, bullying his buddies with a stream of stultifying scatology to which they respond in snarling imitation. The scene is set with packing cases and camp chairs, the props are automatic weapons of Little Caesar vintage, the photography by D. A. Pennebaker is slovenly, coarse, a thumb in your eye.

Nothing that happens is acting; it is all acting out. Mailer never for a moment takes on the skin of an old pug or a prohibition gangster (it is a marvel how dated his reveries are); it is merely Norman doing his thing, like a drunk dancing Petruchka at a cocktail party. More than once, the camera catches him enjoying the spectacle of himself. And of course there is no plot, shape or drive to the thing. Mailer has worked up a few grimaces, some cleft-palate vocal tricks, a provocative stance, a way of lapping his booze, and a habit of hitting the furniture with his fists, and he runs through this paltry act again and again and again. You get the impression that a gallery of fools off camera is egging him on: "Man, that Norman is tough; no wonder the small-town cops keep locking him up!" There is one reference to the size of his genitals—machismo. It's boring, it's pathetic, it looks like the hardest sort of work for a middle-aged man, and it is probably going to get worse as Mailer grows older. But he did get that seven-column roasting in The New Yorker.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1235

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Rules out a clue to this, as a composition of the painter. (8-7)
- 9 Part of the temper or quality of the finback. (7)
- 10 I leave America, as they say, to become a saint. (7)
- 11 The answer to this across is this. (6)
- 12 Bird colonel, or likely to be of lesser rank? (8)
- 14 Beseeches one to be disturbed by Socrates at first (but only slightly!) (10)
- 15 Listen to the sound of this place! (4)
- 17 Everyone has a ring around this for 22! (4)
- 19 Through speaking? No, just "in conclusion." (10)
- 22 Getting close to the answer? See 17! (8)
- 23 Did he maintain that all you have to do to make ready for dinner is ring? (6)
- 25 They might show some stress, even though not acute. (7)
- 26 Does it keep the spirit moving for a while? (7)
- 27 One color rock and another shade, deep in the park. (11,4)

DOWN:

- 1 Given a miser with a couple of theater tickets, this calls for several coffees at the carry-out. (5,2,3,5)
- 2 Plays with a line, perhaps. (7)
- 3 Richness. (8)

- 4 See 7 down.

- 5 At least one lad came out of old Sparta, obviously. (10)
- 6 Mutual adjustment for better understanding of some foreigners? (6)
- 7 and 4 down Where one might expect odds and ends to prove that spiritous liquor ripens malt beverage. (7,4)
- 8 Book markings are probably in Roman and Arabic. (7,3,5)
- 13 Should they be lined with horse-feathers? (5-5)
- 16 Enough of this for the wilderness? (8)
- 18 A fortuitous number for the clergy and other officials. (7)
- 20 Is it not well to light up the old country? (7)
- 21 Bone to form integral parts of the religion. (6)
- 24 So brought up to look down on capital. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1234

ACROSS: 1 Chicken livers; 9 Purse; 10 Saccharin; 11 Tigress; 12 Backs up; 13 Lulls; 14 Cattle car; 16 Zoroaster; 18 Hoffa; 19 Triumph; 21 Stretch; 22 Oligocene; 23 Shrub; 24 Great Salt Lake. DOWN: 1 Capitalization; 2 Irregular; 3 Keepers; 4 Nests; 5 Incubator; 6 Ethical; 7 Surds; 8 Unapproachable; 14 Catchment; 15 Cafeteria; 17 Armhole; 18 Hard-set; 20 Icing; 21 Sheba.

MUSIC

HERMAN SCHWARTZMAN
Pianist - Teacher - Lecturer

Announces Master Classes —
Piano and Two-Piano Literature.
Former students invited.

Call Mornings or Evenings
914 YO 3-4582

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

TRAVEL

CULTURAL SUMMER TOURS in depth to socialist countries. For professionals, students, artists, writers. Write American Dialogue Magazine, 32 Union Sq., N.Y.C. 10003

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

EL GRITO—JOURNAL OF CONTEMPORARY MEXICAN-AMERICAN THOUGHT. Quarterly. Articles, short stories, satire, poetry, art, history. Limited supply of first issue remains. $4.00 year. $1.00 sample copy. Quinto Sol Publications, P.O. Box 9275, Berkeley, California

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor pleads with Israel and Egypt to call for a permanent World Congress of the heads of all nations to prevent or arbitrate all future wars.

STUDENTS for a DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY announces its new radical arts magazine CAW!

$5 for 12 issues (send ad)

CAW! (SDS)
Box 332 Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003

AUSTRALIA. A new Life Beckoning Americans. Government Shares Fare. Information $1. Pacifico, Box 43485-NA, Los Angeles, Calif. 90043

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS
IN THE NATION

The First All-Label, No-Obligation Discount Record Service to Offer All These Advantages

BIG DISCOUNTS!

Always at least 33 1/3% off... in some cases up to 75%!

PAY AFTER YOU PLAY!

Charge all your purchases on an exclusive Records Unlimited feature!

UNLIMITED SELECTION!

Any record on any label available in the U.S.!

NO MINIMUM PURCHASE REQUIRED!

Order only the records you want... when you want them!

Plus a unique extra bonus...

SELECT ANY RECORD OF YOUR CHOICE - FREE

if you join now, and agree to pay the modest lifetime enrollment fee

Now... a record-buying service that has all the advantages you've been looking for - Records Unlimited! It gives you big discounts on all records, all labels - with no minimum purchase required. And you can buy on credit with at-home shopping convenience! What's more, you get your first record free for joining right now!

No other service, club or method of buying records offers all this without obligation of any kind!

No obligations - No limitations

If you buy records regularly - 5, 7 or 12 a year - you probably like to make your selections from a variety of labels. And you don't want the commitment to buy a specified number of records. What you do want are the most generous discounts that can be offered... and the convenience of charging your purchases.

You get all these advantages only with Records Unlimited!

Discounts up to 75%

As a member, you have no obligation to buy any records. But every record you do buy will have a discount of at least 33 1/3% off the manufacturers' suggested list price (see the chart).

You can choose any 12" long-playing record of any label available in the United States. In some cases we are able to offer discounts up to 75%! And remember, Records Unlimited is the only all-label service that lets you charge your records!

Free Buying Guides

You will learn about these special savings regularly through your free copies of the Records Unlimited buying guide, which will carry listings of new releases and best-selling hit records. You can take advantage of the super discounts, or order any record you want at our regular low discount prices (plus a small mailing and handling charge). All records, of course, are brand-new and guaranteed to be in perfect playing condition.

First Record Free

Your first record is free, if you join and agree to pay the modest $2.50 lifetime enrollment fee. And you can select your free record now - stereo or mono - from the best-selling records shown on this page, or you can pick any other record currently available in the U.S.

Send No Money

Just fill out and mail the coupon. We'll send the free record of your choice promptly. You'll also receive a copy of the current Records Unlimited buying guide, listing hundreds of records available to members at special discount prices, along with a $2.50 invoice for your lifetime enrollment. Mail the coupon today!

records unlimited
Harmony, Indiana

BIG DISCOUNTS ON ALL LABELS

See for Yourself!

Manufacturers' Suggested List Prices*	RECORDS UNLIMITED
$1.79 through $1.98	$1.19
2.49 through 2.78	1.60
3.49 through 3.78	2.33
3.79 through 3.98	2.43
4.79 through 4.98	2.98
5.79 through 5.98	3.68
6.79 through 6.98	4.37

Special-Price Records Each Month!

Leading Labels... $.95 • $1.19 • $1.60
(Originally sold for up to $4.79*)

*In some areas, records may be purchased at below manufacturers' suggested list prices.

CHOOSE A RECORD FREE-NOW!

Take any one of these hit albums - or any other record you want!

4066

5840

5787

5896

95002

5481

5486

95092

Records Unlimited
Box 500, Harmony, Indiana 47853
Please enroll me as a member of Records Unlimited and send me this record - free:

Catalog No.

Title.

Label.
Send this record in:

☐ Stereo ☐ Monaural

Also send me a copy of the current Records Unlimited buying guide and bill me just $2.50 for lifetime enrollment. I understand that enrollment includes no obligation to purchase any records at any time, but I can make the purchases I wish at Records Unlimited discount prices and charge them to my account.

☐ Check here if you're enclosing $2.50 check or money order for lifetime enrollment. As an extra bonus, we'll also send you, free, a handsome, brass-finished browser record rack in addition to your buying guide and free record.

Name.

Address.

City.

State. Zip Code.

721-4/S3

Records Unlimited

RU-53/566

CREDIT CARDS EDWARD K. SHANAHAN

THE NATION

BURLINGAME
FEB 13 1968
LIBRARY

FEBRUARY 12, 1968 35 cents

More Is Less

The Riddle of Progress

RAYMOND F. DASMANN

Russia on the Nile

ALEXANDER WERTH

From the Isle of Pines

The New Men of Cuba

JAMES HIGGINS

Some Versions of the Proletariat

MICHAEL B. FOLSOM

More Than Stone Can Bear

PATRICK MacFADDEN

Brooklyn's Linear City

ERVIN GALANTAY

5-21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
-LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

trumpet

Brooklyn, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: "Protest, Power and the Future of Politics" by Carey McWilliams [The Nation, Jan. 15] is a trumpet blast for a resurgence of ebbing interest in the viability of our political process. Moreover, it provides a stern antidote for those handcuffed to despair. He covers the major diseases of people and programs with precision and underscores the tragic implications of indifference . . .

R. J. Novogrod
Department of Political Science
Long Island University is Texas listening?

Mesquite, Tex.

DEAR SIR: As a native Texan, it pains me to commend you on your editorial, "That LBJ Trip" [Jan. 8], in which you say, "Texans, as everyone knows, are Ten Feet Tall and growing." This is, of course, a generalization of the sort to which The Nation does not often stoop, and it is also a "hate them all" message, which I think beneath your usual editorial quality. LBJ is certainly more typical than C. Wright Mills, but both came from Texas. Even so, you are on fairly firm ground regarding Texans.

But, we were not born more ignorant and arrogant than New Yorkers. These traits have been carefully cultivated by the power elite—of which Mills spoke so well. Our educational system ranks about forty-second in the nation and not because we are a poor state but because ignorance and arrogance are advantageous to the oil magnates and others.

Texans are more to be pitied than censured. You cannot censure a lack of education, ignorance and cultivated arrogance. You must come out of your intellectual towers and confront ignorance at the grass roots, if you hope to overcome it. If New York is intellectual and sophisticated, why speak there, when Texas needs you so much?

Mrs. Lee Dresh

panic button

New York City

DEAR SIR: W. H. Ferry chastens you [letter, Jan. 1] for indulging in "liberal tunnel visions" on the race question in America. And what do The Nation's editors do? Like spiteful children, they persist in precisely what they have just been admonished on.

In support of the notion that America is committed to integration you cite "the Fourteenth Amendment," "a long series of Supreme Court decisions" and "recent legislation." Come off it. That's the worst kind of liberal nonsense. You know perfectly well that the lack of integration in America has virtually nothing to do with a lack of amendments, decisions and legislation. Not the bare forms but the historical substance for integration is lacking. . . .

You quote Gunnar Myrdal to the effect that "Ideals are important social facts when they are firmly anchored in the hearts of people. . . ." Of course. But Mr. Ferry's point was that the American Dream is precisely not "anchored in the hearts of [the American] people." If such is indeed the case—and you have cited nothing to the contrary—then the mere fact that the ideals are (in Myrdal's words) "fortified in institutions like the Constitution" is simply trivial. If you doubt that please consult the ideals that are "fortified" in the Constitution of the USSR. . . .

Aivars I. Trusis

EDITORIALS

The Shock of Reality

If the consequences were not so serious, patriotic Americans might almost be grateful to the North Koreans and the Vietcong guerrillas for forcing at least a partial perception of reality on the American psyche, bedeviled by twenty years of cold-war fantasy.

The media, which have raised few questions during the whole course of the Vietnamese War, are now doing as much of a turn-around as their past commitments will permit. Heading one of its articles "The Impotence of Power," Time (February 2) lamented in another article that the "piracy of Pueblo" rehearsed for the nation—and its adversaries—"a dismaying litany of military procedures and political assumptions that proved in the crunch to be inadequate, unimaginative and unbelievably over-confident." Newsweek's caption is "Prometheus Bound," and it wonders if the Pueblo incident "wasn't really a salutary object lesson in the vulnerability of the mighty"—an object lesson which could have been learned from history, starting with the Greeks and coming up to date with the decline of the British Empire. In The New York Times, which has much less need for sackcloth and ashes, Peter Grose writes on "Limitations of Power," while James Reston observes that "never in history have the great nations been so powerful or so impotent as they are today." The Wall Street Journal marvels at "how much power the Communists can still mount after all the punishment they have taken from the U.S.," and points out the dangers to both sides of "the momentum of belligerence." And, with an unintentional touch of grim humor, the New York Daily News streamlines its January 31 issue, "Yanks Retake Saigon Embassy"—that embassy which was designed as a fortress impregnable to ordinary attack.

Painful as they are, these afterthoughts are all to the good. Perhaps we can now begin to see the folly of the world-policeman policy, and the unlikelihood of putting down "brush-fire" wars with military power. There may be some wars of this type that can be so managed, but when they involve intervention in a civil war, with our weight thrown on the side of a corrupt, reactionary government, and all the forces of nationalism arrayed against us, the venture borders on political and military insanity.

How did we get into such a seemingly impossible situation, falling from an ethical position admired by most of the world at the end of World War II to our present abjection? A clue may be found in Patrick Anderson's article, "The New Defense Secretary Thinks Like the President," in the January 28 New York Times Magazine. Noting that in the forties Clark Clifford was widely regarded as a liberal, Anderson quotes from a memorandum Clifford wrote to President Truman on September 24, 1946. It began:

"The gravest problem facing the U.S. today is that of American relations with the Soviet Union." Clifford's prescription was: "The language of military power is the only language which disciples of power politics understand."

The United States must use that language in order that Soviet leaders will realize that our Government is determined to uphold the interests of its citizens and the rights of small nations. Compromise and concessions are considered by the Soviets to be evidence of weakness."

Not a word here about the UN, or world organization in any form, or the possibility of a peace-keeping force, or indeed of peace keeping in any form except by the threat of military power. Anderson, who is thoroughly conversant with the Washington scene, maintains that this paragraph is an excellent summary of Clifford's views on the challenge in Vietnam (and presumably in Korea if challenge is renewed there) and the manner in which we must deal with it. And now Mr. Clifford is our Secretary of Defense.

It should be noted, also, that in the recriminations over the course of the war in Vietnam and the Pueblo incident, there are suggestions that we may have to use nuclear bombs in one theatre of war or the other, or in both. Thus we can avoid fighting an infantry war in Asia, and although it is a course leading straight to World War III, its advocates are willing to take the chance.

The alternative is to listen to such sound advice as that offered by Charles Yost, former ambassador at the UN and a veteran of thirty-four years in the foreign service—and by no means a "dove." In his new book, The Insecurity of Nations, Mr. Yost argues that real security in the modern world is not "national security" but "collective security" through a strengthened United Nations. National armaments make nations less, not more, secure. As Mr. Yost said recently in a discussion of his book:

"The revival and reinforcement of the United Nations no doubt seems and, at the moment may be, Utopian. . . . The point to be made again and again, to be hammered unmercifully into our proud, hard, silly heads, is that the attempt to achieve the security of nations by national means, under modern circumstances, is still more Utopian."

Do our "proud, hard, silly" heads have ears, and will they listen?

Fact and Fantasy

Diplomatic and political realities are not the only bitter truths being borne in upon us: certain harsh military facts should by now begin to penetrate our "proud, hard, silly heads." For example:

When President Johnson's "Westy" was in the States in late November to help launch the President's re-election campaign, he was full of reassurance. Although he could not set a time limit, he assured us that the war was nearing its final phase. Westmoreland, and Ambassador Bunker, pointed to the foe's appalling losses, stressed every day in the body counts of the printed and electronic press. Secretary McNamara, somewhat earlier, had warned that a harder, tougher bombing policy would not do much to slow the infiltration of supplies from the North. Now McNamara is out; Westmoreland and Bunker are still in. This despite the fact that the truth of McNamara's August, 1967, testimony is being sadly verified, according to Tom Wicker of The New York Times, "in the fog-shrouded

IN THIS ISSUE

February 12, 1968

EDITORIALS

194

ARTICLES

198 Russia on the Nile

Alexander Werth

202 More Is Less:
The Riddle of Progress

Raymond F. Dasmann

205 From the Isle of Pines:
The New Men of Cuba

James Higgins

209 Credit Cards:
The Thief in the Mailbox

Edward K. Shanahan

210 Race and Self:
Tolerance in Militancy

Gary T. Marx

BOOKS & THE ARTS

213 Some Versions of the Proletariat

Michael B. Folsom

214 More Than Stone Can Bear

Patrick MacFadden

216 Downhill for Socialism

William C. Pratt

217 Architecture

Ervin Galantay

220 Theatre

Harold Clurman

222 Television

John Horn

223 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206
No. 7

mountains around Khesanh," where a major battle impends.

Our men will fight courageously, as before. But their work is cut out for them. Gene Roberts, also writing in the Times, reports that "a steadily increasing supply of arms and ammunition transported along the Ho Chi Minh trail has significantly increased enemy fire power over the last year, according to several high American sources." The enemy, they said, is now "far better equipped than the South Vietnamese army." So McNamara understated the case.

A question that arises is: how many times can a general, no matter how many stars he wears, be wrong before he is transferred from his command? But the President does not set a good example in accuracy of forecasts. In his budget he proceeds on the assumption that there will be a leveling off of defense spending, when he knows perfectly well that he will be asking for more money long before the fiscal year is out—unless by some sleight of hand he is able to start negotiations with both North Vietnam and the Vietcong, and not on terms of their surrender.

On the civilian front in Vietnam—although no one can say where the military front ends and the civilian begins—the story is the same. Sen. Edward Kennedy's hard-working twelve-day visit turns up some ugly facts. Edward—who is emerging as the more skillful of the Kennedys—says the United States should threaten to withdraw if Saigon fails to make a serious attack on government corruption. That the South Vietnamese government has not the slightest intention of doing anything of the sort is made obvious by the resignation of Maj. Gen. Nguyen Duc Thang, the South Vietnamese Tom Dewey. Corruption and nepotism will go on as before. Edward Kennedy lays it on the line: "The pattern of destruction we are creating can only make a workable political future more difficult; and the government we are supporting has given us no indication that it can win the lasting confidence of its own people."

But how much longer will it take for this intelligence to penetrate those "proud, hard, silly heads" at the White House and in the Pentagon?

Johnson's Texas Troubles

Although Lyndon Johnson, through the stupidity of the Republicans, may retain control of the White House in 1968, this may be the year, ironically, when he begins to lose control of his home base in Texas. Throughout his Presidency, he has been secure in the knowledge that things back home were under the brutally tight, conservative control of his political alter ego, John Connally, who was elected governor in 1962. But Connally has announced that he will not run for re-election this year, and there appears to be no heir apparent who can be sure of election. In fact, the strength of the conservative Democrats is divided among half a dozen candidates in the primary (with more coming in every week). They are so splintered that it is doubtful that they could reunite in time to be effective in the run-off. As for the Republicans, their best bet would be George Bush, but he likes Washington and will probably remain in the House of Representatives until he can run for the U.S. Senate against Ralph Yarborough in 1970.

All of which means that the liberals will probably seize the governor's mansion this year. Non-Texans may not realize it, but that is like saying that Charles Lindbergh intends to spruce up The Spirit of St. Louis for a trip to the moon this year—and will probably make it. Smothered by the oil-gas-insurance-bank money blanket, the liberals have not made a successful fight for the governorship of Texas since the 1930s.

But luck and circumstances are with them now. Heretofore they could anticipate treachery on the part of George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO. Pressured by Johnson, Meany has in other elections kept some important Texas unions from backing the liberal Democrat, influencing them to put their money instead on the LBJ-machine candidate. But Meany had better not do that this year. Lister Hill, chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, is retiring. The man who will replace him, Wayne Morse of Oregon, is up for re-election. If he is knocked off, the chairmanship of the Labor Committee will fall to Senator Ralph Yarborough, head of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party in Texas. Meany needs his friendship, and Yarborough has already told him that the best way to be sure of that is to refrain this year from his usual trickery in Texas.

The other club with which the liberals may beat their way to victory is the threat of a rebellious delegation to the national convention—the kind of Texas schizophrenia that made headlines in the 1952 convention. Senator Yarborough has let it be known that he might lead such a band of liberal rebels to Chicago unless President Johnson refrains from helping the conservative Democrats of Texas. Johnson, who can hardly relish the thought of this embarrassment at the convention, will probably heed the warning.

Thus the way is as open as it can possibly be for the liberals' gubernatorial choice, Don Yarborough, a young Houston attorney who is no kin of the Senator. In 1962, Don Yarborough, then an unknown, came within 25,000 votes of winning the governorship in a race with Connally. The opposition of Meany and Johnson killed his chances by cutting off his money sources, and some of his labor and Mexican support. But now Don Yarborough is a well-known, mature politician, and he can go all the way if he has half a chance. Only peace in Vietnam could be more devastating to LBJ's position than a liberal in the Texas governor's mansion.

Kurtz in Storyville

Recent evidence suggests that we have translated our war mentality to our cities. The Detroit Police Commissioner, explaining why he would not permit full reportage of departmental maneuvers designed to test new tactics, weaponry and equipment, said: "In a war, you do not show the enemy what you are doing." One wonders how many of the 400 police officers attending conferences early this year in six cities (conferences called by the Attorney General and closed to the public) also define the citizens of their cities as "the enemy." Detroit has already employed armored vehicles originally designed for Vietnam and has ordered more for this summer.

As all military men know, a manual must accompany every new version of warfare. Col. Robert Rigg (U.S.A. Ret.) has volunteered for the war-in-the-cities assignment. "In the next decade," he says, in an article in the January Army Magazine, "at least one major metropolitan area in the United States could be faced with guerrilla warfare of such intensity as to require sizable U.S. Army elements in action, and National Guard units on active duty for years." We can be thankful, therefore, that while we fight our war for national survival in Vietnam, we have been farsighted enough to hold back the National Guard to pacify our own cities.

"Night fighting," says Rigg, "will call for a very delicate decision as to which darkened window to shoot at and which rooftop to blast by mortar fire or assault by helicopter. A whole new manual of military operations, tactics and techniques needs to be written in respect to urban warfare of this nature. There are none on the subject today." Rigg compares the potential warfare of our cities to our present war in Southeast Asia: "As in Vietnam today, the fighters by night could be workers by day. Rooftops, windows, rooms high up, streets low down, and back alleys nearby, could become a virtual jungle for patrolling police or military forces at night when hidden snipers could abound, as they often do against U.S. and allied forces in Vietnam in daylight. Could local police or National Guard units carry out search-and-destroy campaigns in the cement-block jungles of high-rise buildings?" Obviously not. The Army "must be oriented and trained to know the cement-and-asphalt jungle of every American city. It means that maneuvers and exercises, heretofore carried out about the countryside, in the future can be conducted in large cities." Abetting the effort will be a fifth column, "an inside intelligence system . . . informants who can help guide troops and police through the maze of buildings, stairwells, streets, alleys, tunnels and sewers." We can assume that Colonel Rigg is now composing his manual, Fundamentals of Counterviolence Techniques As Applied To High-Rise Insurgency Situations.

A long time ago we were promised that this Administration planned "to wage war only on poverty"; it now seems to be preparing for a war on the poor. We may be reminded, perhaps, of Joseph Conrad's Mr. Kurtz, who wrote a soaring treatise on the elimination of "Savage Customs," a treatise so high-minded and idealistic that Marlowe derived "the notion of an exotic Immensity ruled by an august Benevolence." Later, however, Kurtz scribbled a postscript: "Exterminate all the brutes!"

Two Hundred and Six Million

November 20, 1967, was a red-letter day for the Department of Commerce. At 11 A.M. the census clock in the lobby had reached the figure of 200 million Americans. A prevalent myth among businessmen is that the more people there are the better business is bound to be, since the babies will have to be clothed and fed and when they grow up provided with automobiles and split-level houses.

Pessimists have disputed this view, pointing out that babies have no purchasing power and a lot of parents have sadly little. Nevertheless, there was rejoicing on that November morn, and in fact the jubilation should have been even greater, for the population experts estimated that the clock was as much as 6 million lives behind the actual figure. And now, nearly three months later, we are presumably kinderreich (rich in children), to use Hitler's term, by another half-million or so.

But is all this fecundity really ground for national self-congratulation? On the great day when we achieved our 200 (or 206) million, a faculty-student group at Stanford University which calls itself COPE (Council on Population and Environment) published sardonic advertisements in campus newspapers at Stanford, Berkeley and San Francisco State. The ads ran: "Our children will be proud of us for . . . massive and expanding highways . . . a landscape covered with structures and power lines . . . a booming supersonic transport business . . . removing forests and grasslands, halting rivers and flooding bays." Also "for having lots of kids so that there will be plenty of heads to solve the world's problems of overcrowding, famine, war, and so that they will never be lonely!"

Dr. Sidney Liebes, Jr., of the Stanford Medical School's Genetics Department, and Professor of Biology Paul R. Ehrlich are co-chairmen of COPE. They maintain that Americans are feeling more crowded every day, that we are depleting the world's resources and living in a deteriorating environment. In this view, what we need is not an endlessly increasing population but a stabilized one which will live in harmony with nature. And the time for stabilization is now. At least de-escalation should be started, and the sooner the better.

Of course in some other countries the need for population restraint is even more urgent. Dr. Ehrlich foresees that an estimated 3.5 million people, mostly children, will starve to death this year. For years we have been warned of the impending famines of the seventies—in four or five years an estimated 500 million will be starving. We live on the same planet with these people, and such catastrophes will inevitably have drastic effects on us. Even the militarists, who have always been in favor of large families, should now be in favor of birth control. Modern war is mainly a matter of technology, not of sheer manpower. Ehrlich points out that we fought World War II with a population of less than 150 million, and Nazi Germany conquered most of Europe with less than half that number.

Ehrlich and his colleagues feel that population control should be a campaign issue. Politicians may find it still pays to kiss babies when canvassing, but they should advocate policies that will leave fewer babies for them to kiss in the next campaign. Increasing population will only add to our economic and social woes and lead to further erosion of our freedom.

Another Stanford Medical School faculty member, Dr. Sumner M. Kalman, a pharmacologist, makes the point that the large families which were so necessary in pioneering days because of the high infant mortality and the requirements of an agricultural economy are no longer needed—are in fact harmful to individual families in many cases and to the nation as a whole. Dr. Kalman points out that in a relatively enlightened country like Japan abortion is legal, while the United States is disgraced with about 1 million illegal abortions annually. Since youth will inherit the problems caused by rampant population growth, such as high-pressure urbanization leading to "crime in the streets" and political instability, they should be taught all that we know about population trends, reproductive physiology and related subjects.

Whatever new problems this may raise are not likely to be as intractable as the ones we already face. COPE, and enlightened candidates for office, will find plenty of ammunition in the article in this issue by the distinguished ecologist Raymond F. Dasman; after reading it, they can go on to his The Destruction of California, a book that is relevant to every state in the Union.

Happening at Happening House

The San Francisco police have notoriously bad relations with the literary world of Baghdad-By-The-Bay. Last year there was the Ken Kesey affair and also the celebrated "Love Book" trial, in which a poetess was prosecuted for using "four-letter words" and other indelicacies related to the love act.

There has also been constant friction between the police and the hippies, many of whom are, or claim to be, poets, artists and other creative types. And now a trial that is taking place has important implications on the matter of "contributing to the delinquency of minors." Leonard Wolf, a distinguished member of the English Department at San Francisco State College, is currently on trial because of the performance, in the nude, of a group of dancers at a conference he organized.

Wolf and a group of friends founded "Happening House" to serve as a liaison between the hippies and the academic community. This is a risky business, placing one between the police, who are apt to resent "meddling professors," and the hippies, whose actions are hard to foresee or control.

When a group of dancers—without warning—took off their clothes at the conclusion of the conference that Wolf held on runaways, he was arrested, though he was absent from the auditorium when the dance occurred and had no knowledge of the dancers' intentions. In a city that permits topless and bottomless dancers, whose streets "swarm" with prostitutes, it seems remarkable to bring an English professor to trial for an event he could not anticipate or control. It is due, in part, to a gulf that has historically separated the academic community from the police, a gulf that is leading to increasing conflict (one recalls the Leslie Fiedler affair in Buffalo or the recent events at the State University of New York, Stonybrook).

RUSSIA ON THE NILE

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

A World War II experience of mine illustrates, I think, an important psychological aspect of Russia's success in the Arab world. In December, 1943, soon after the Teheran Conference, and while nothing very important was happening on the Russo-German front, I had the opportunity to get a free ride in an American Embassy plane from Moscow to Teheran, and then to Cairo. (For correspondents in wartime such lifts were a regular thing; I also got one from the British on my way back from Cairo to Moscow.) Cairo was then under British occupation; and King Farouk, who had been somewhat obstreperous during the previous year, when it seemed uncertain that the British could hold Cairo against the advancing Germans and Italians, had now been browbeaten into obedient, if sulky, silence by a strong British military demonstration—tanks and all—outside his palace. The atmosphere in Egypt was unpleasant; British soldiers and officers invariably referred to the Egyptians as "Wogs."

The contempt shown by the British on every occasion and at every level deeply offended the Egyptians, and the Russians were fully aware of it. The newly appointed Soviet Minister in Cairo, Mr. Nikolai Novikov (he was later the Ambassador in Washington), invited me to lunch; several Egyptians were also guests, and I was struck by the extreme friendliness and courtesy with which the Soviet Minister treated them. During the same week, Mr. Novikov was received in audience by King Farouk. It is extremely doubtful that the Russians had any particular liking for the King, then little more than a lascivious fat boy of 23: but, on coming out of the palace after his meeting, Mr. Novikov declared to the crowd of Egyptian reporters who had gathered outside the gate that he had had a most satisfactory meeting with His Majesty and that, in his view, King Farouk was "a very great king." The Cairo evening papers, including those printed in French, came out with enormous banner headlines:

"LE ROI FAROUK EST UN TRES GRAND ROI" déclare M. Novikov, Ministre de l'USSR en Egypte

Among Egyptians this made a tremendous impression. Whether they liked him or not, King Farouk was at that time a symbol of national Egyptian resistance to the British occupation authorities. Novikov had taken a clear "anti-colonialist" stand; the Egyptians fully understood this, and their feelings toward Stalin's Russia warmed accordingly. The British Embassy was, of course, furious with the Soviet Minister.

For a variety of reasons, this budding wartime friendship between Russia and Egypt did not burst into flower after the war. The Russians had an endless number of other problems on their hands; first, the gigantic task of restoring the war-paralyzed economy of the country; then the setting up of "friendly" governments in all the neighboring countries of Eastern and Central Europe; and then all the immensely complex problems that had arisen from President Truman's policy of hostility. Stalin did not entirely lose sight of the Moslem world but, obsessed as he was with Russian security, he was more interested in territories much closer than Egypt to the Soviet border, primarily (apart from Eastern Europe) Iran and Turkey. But both Stalin's move to secure a "sphere of influence" (complete with oil concessions) in northern Iran and his attempt to force Turkey to share control of the Black Sea Straits, with the help of a Russian air and naval base on the Bosphorus, came to nothing. Truman was bellicose on these points, and the Russians, having no atom bomb at the time, did not persist.

But despite Truman's sharp intervention in favor of Iran and Turkey, to the Russians the main villains in the Middle East were then still the British, rather than the Americans. Although the wartime flirtation between Russia and Egypt had helped to produce some strong progressive and even Socialist and near-Communist movements in the Arab countries, and particularly in Egypt, Stalin decided to concentrate on weakening the British hold on the Middle East in the manner least likely to please the Arabs—by making Russia the first power to extend de jure recognition to Israel. In June, 1947, at the United Nations, the Russians had proposed the creation of a Jewish-Arab state in Palestine as being the only fair solution to both peoples; but in November, 1947, Gromyko suddenly accepted the partition plan and the creation of a Jewish state. When, in May, 1948, Ben-Gurion proclaimed the state of Israel, Russia hastened to give it de jure recognition, while even the United States was still at the de facto stage.

The Russian Communists, starting with Lenin himself, had always been hostile to Zionism; if Stalin now overcame these "prejudices," it was because he saw in the Jews of Palestine the most determined enemies of British imperialism. The new state of Israel, with its wealth of talent, technical skill and dynamism, was also more likely than any other country in the Middle East to develop something in the nature of a "progressive" and "Socialist" state. The Arabs, on the other hand, seemed to the Russians still under the powerful influence of the British war lords, and of the American oil corporations. Stalin saw to it that the Haganah was well provided with arms, principally from Czechoslovakia. This Soviet patronage of Israel had, of course, a disastrous effect on the Egyptian "progressives" and Communists, who were subjected to the most violent persecution between 1948 and 1950. Since many of the Egyptian Communists were of Jewish origin, they were described as a "Jewish Fifth Column," and massacred. Paradoxically, this wholehearted Russian support of the new state coincided, in Russia, with the beginnings of the ferocious anti-Semitic drive that marked the last years of Stalin. But the two policies were kept more or less distinct: help to Israel was intended to create great difficulties for "British imperialism"; the anti-Jewish, and particularly anti-Yiddish and anti-Zionist, campaign in Russia was one aspect of Stalin's struggle for monolithic conformism, not only inside the Soviet Union but, especially after the defection of Yugoslavia, inside the entire "Socialist bloc."

Then, in the early fifties, the calculations began to change. Israel became more and more identified in

Aleksei N. Kosygin

Russian eyes with no longer British but American imperialism, and all dreams of Israel as an "outpost of socialism" in the Middle East were gradually abandoned. At the trial of Rudolf Slansky in 1952, American and British imperialism and Zionism were all three denounced in the same breath, and the most damaging conclusions were drawn from Slansky's "contacts" (no doubt authorized by Stalin at the time of the arms shipments to Palestine in 1948-49) with the Israeli Zionists.

What brought about a sudden new rapprochement between Russia and Egypt was the Anglo-Franco-American declaration of 1950 for the preservation of the status quo in the Middle East. The Arabs saw in this an attempt to consolidate Israel within its new, 1949 frontiers, while the Russians resented being left out of this agreement among Washington, London and Paris. Egypt was then fighting the British on the Suez Canal, and in December, 1951, began negotiations for Russian arms. The overthrow of Farouk and the seizure of power by the officers under Naguib and Nasser interrupted these talks, the Russians strongly suspecting at first that the new Egyptian rulers were American stooges.

The Russians embraced Nasser when, following the Baghdad pact, from which Egypt was excluded, and which made Iraq—dangerously close to Russia—the real center of Anglo-American strategy in the Arab world, the new Egyptian leader attended the Bandung Conference. By doing so, Nasser openly declared himself an “anti-colonialist,” which also greatly raised his stock in Egypt itself. In July, 1955, Nasser received a visit from Dimitri Shepilov, the future Russian foreign minister; and, that same month, Mr. Solod, the Soviet Ambassador, casually informed him that Czechoslovakia would sell him arms. A few months later, Nasser made a dramatic announcement to that effect.

Needless to say, the mad Anglo-French Suez adventure a year later played into the hands of the Russians. Even if Nasser himself credited the calling off of the expedition largely to Eisenhower, the view among the Arab masses, according to Jean Lacouture, the leading French authority on Egypt, was that a Khrushchev-Bulganin threat to obliterate London and Paris had been decisive.

But, in 1958, new complications arose between Egypt and Russia over the “Anschluss” of Syria, one of its purposes having been to stop the rapid progress of the Syrian Communists. This “union” of the two countries was followed by fierce persecutions of the Communists in both Egypt and Syria; the Syrian Communist leader, Khaled Bagdash, fled to Russia, where he undertook a violent campaign against Nasser whom he pictured as a militarist and chauvinist. Relations were for a time extremely strained between Cairo and Moscow; and yet, in 1960, and despite continued persecution of the Communists in both Syria and Egypt, the Russians availed themselves of the undreamed of opportunity, given them by the American refusal to cooperate, of subsidizing in a grand manner the Aswan High Dam. Khrushchev paid a triumphal visit to Egypt in 1964, when he conferred on Nasser and Amer the title of Hero of the Soviet Union—much to the dissatisfaction of his colleagues at home. There was much speculation at the time as to just why Khrushchev was making all these desperate attempts to please the Egyptians. To create a Cuba in the Middle East? To eliminate the danger of Anglo-American bases being set up in the Arab world? To “control” the Middle East oil supplies in emergencies? Or simply to “make friends and influence people?” All of these motives played their parts, but most important perhaps was the value of the Aswan Dam as propaganda for Soviet technology among the “developing” countries, and the creation of a whole new class of Egyptian engineers, technicians and skilled workers in connection with the dam.

The Castro-Nasser parallel scarcely holds water, since Castro is a real revolutionary and Nasser is not; nevertheless, Khrushchev, departing from Stalin’s stay-at-home caution, still liked to think he was pursuing a “Leninist” policy; at least, he did until he burned his fingers on Cuba. Significantly, Khrushchev’s successors are today more interested in Nasser than in Cuba. Cuba is “dangerous,” and Castro now reproaches the Russians for not being “revolutionary” enough, and for signing trade agreements with reactionary regimes in Latin America. The Arab world attracts them for the reasons mentioned above, and also for the very specific mission of “protecting” the hungry Arab masses from Chinese influence.

A special place in this strange tangle is held by Syria; both Moscow and Cairo were somewhat alarmed by the “Left adventurism” of its leaders; nevertheless, both capitals felt that it was impossible to abandon Syria to Israeli aggression. When, on April 7, 1967, the Israelis attacked Syria, destroying six “Migs” in the process, Moscow sharply warned Israel to forgo any further moves against that country. Since more attacks on Syria were nevertheless expected, Nasser closed the Gulf of Aqaba and demanded the withdrawal of UN troops from the Sinai desert, both steps being taken without consulting the Russians. If the Russians raised no serious objections to these moves, regarding them in Nasser’s terms as merely "a warning" to Israel, they grew extremely alarmed on June 2, and one of their diplomats rushed to see Nasser at 3 A.M. on June 3 to warn him against an Egyptian attack which, the Russians had learned, was to be launched against Israel that very day. A similar warning had been given to Israel by de Gaulle only a few hours earlier. After the Israeli blitzkrieg of June 5, the Russians screamed loudly about "Israeli aggression" at the UN, but still they did not oppose an unconditional cease-fire. Short of intervening in person—which might have brought on a direct clash with the United States—they had no alternative. They were, of course, furious with the Egyptians' lamentable military performance, which caused the destruction of a billion dollars' worth of Soviet equipment.

Gamal Abdel Nasser

What has been happening since then is curious. Marshal Zakharov, the Soviet chief of staff, recently told me that he "had had to go to Cairo to get Nasser to fire hundreds of Egyptian officers and generals." He thought most of these officers "belonged to the old feudal class" and some were hoping to overthrow Nasser—even at the price of a defeat by Israel. As for the soldiers, they were illiterate and quite untrained for modern warfare. There are now believed to be at least 3,000 Russian experts in Egypt, and 3,000 more in the other Arab countries—and the Egyptian officers take "advice" from them more readily than they did before June, 1967. Many new army and air force personnel are being trained in the Soviet Union (together with North Vietnamese); in particular, they are taught to operate the new "Mig 23." The equipment destroyed in June, 1967, has been almost completely replaced by new Russian planes, tanks, etc. Mr. Vinogradov, the ablest of all Soviet diplomats, has been ambassador in Cairo since September, and sees Nasser several times a week.

There are now some thirty Soviet warships in the Eastern Mediterranean and, according to French intelligence reports, some of these ships are equipped to carry substantial numbers of Russian marines. The Russians are also building aircraft carriers, expected soon to enter the Mediterranean. The Russians believe that the presence of their navy is calculated to reassure the Arabs. (There is nothing new about this: Czars maintained Russian naval forces in the Mediterranean and, until their breach with Albania, the Russians had a submarine base there.)

On the face of it, the situation looks dangerous, with the Russians rearming Egypt, and the United States, after the Eshkol visit to President Johnson, intensifying the rearmament of Israel. But there is good reason to suppose that the Russians feel, in a sense, that they, not Israel, are the real victors of the short war last June. They disappointed the Egyptians by not intervening militarily; but, since the Western powers broke off relations with Egypt and most other Arab countries, these countries feel that Russia is their only friend. Vinogradov, by all reliable accounts, is not grooming Egypt for a resounding revanche but is, on the contrary, trying to soften Egyptian susceptibilities to the point where the Arabs (or, at any rate, the Egyptians) will agree to a "realistic" peace settlement. Special importance is attached by qualified observers to the particularly warm reception given in Moscow to Hussein, the "little feudal king of Jordan," of all people. The explanation is quite simple: Hussein stands for a "realistic peace" and for a "realistic settlement" of the Palestine problem. This would mean that Arabs and Jews would sit down and talk. One thing to which the Russians will not agree is the annexation by Israel of the occupied territories—unless any transfer of territories is made part of a "political settlement." The Russians do not want to risk a nuclear war over Egypt, any more than they want one over Vietnam. The rearmament of Egypt, the Russian navy in the Mediterranean, etc., are no more than weapons in a diplomatic game, the final purpose of which—in the Russian view—is a "realistic settlement," after which Russia may expect to find that Egypt, and some of the other Arab countries, will still see Moscow as their best friend and benefactor. The Egyptian intelligentsia is well aware of this. When John Foster Dulles handed the Aswan Dam over to Russia, he did not know that he was taking the first step toward turning a large part of the Arab world into a Russian sphere of influence, with Egypt as Russia's great show window of benevolence toward the Third World. As one Egyptian intellectual said: "We prefer the Aswan Dam treatment to the napalm treatment that the Vietnamese people are getting."

Not that the Russians have any revolutionary ambitions. They do not much believe (despite Vietnam) in "revolutionary wars"; Latin America is too far away for them to do anything about it. As for Africa, as one Russian told me last summer: "Most of those African rulers are so goddamn corrupt, we really can't afford to compete with the CIA." There is a big difference between Kosygin and Khrushchev: if Khrushchev, departing from Stalin's caution, liked to use revolutionary verbiage and patronized Castro (Cuba was his fatal mistake: "What we shall never forgive him is that he nearly landed us in a nuclear war with the United States" was the most common remark I heard in Russia), Kosygin is not carried away by any "revolutionary" Leninism. He distrusts both Castro and the firebrands in Syria, but he likes to deal with a "reasonable guy" like Nasser. It is by working through such reasonable guys that Russia helps to maintain "progressive" (though not Communist) regimes in the "developing" countries. It can do this more easily every year, as bigger and bigger export surpluses accumulate from its spectacular industrial development. Nevertheless, Russia does not like to give away too much for nothing—or for little. That is why a limited objective like Egypt is preferable to, say, India, where—it is argued in Moscow—nothing much can be done to establish a reasonable standard of living until some far-reaching transformations are made in the whole fabric of Indian society. Charity-begins-at-home moods are still understandably strong in Russia; it is only in the last few years that living conditions have begun to approach the West European level. And that may well be the chief reason why, as Isaac Deutscher remarked, Russia broke with China. To pool resources with China would have meant raising the Chinese, and lowering the Soviet, standard of living. In Egypt much bigger results can be achieved at much smaller cost.

THE RIDDLE OF PROGRESS

RAYMOND F. DASMANN

Mr. Dasmann is Director of Environmental Studies at the Conservation Foundation, Washington, D.C. He is the author of several books on conservation of which the most recent, A Different Kind of Country, will be published by Macmillan next month.

Once it was difficult to travel, but the journey led to places strange and new. Today travel is for all, but increasingly all roads lead to the same place. Technology and population growth work their changes. The unique and different become uniform, mass-produced and interchangeable. Suburban homes and high-rise apartments, highways and airports, hotels and restaurants are stamped from the same patterns from Seattle to San Diego, Miami to Honolulu, and on to once-foreign lands.

But all places have not yet been processed through the technological mill. There are places where change has not yet come, places by-passed by what we choose to call progress, places where nature still follows its old pathways, little disturbed by man. You must work harder to find them, but they exist. Whether they will still be there tomorrow depends on us.

To some, the natural areas of the world are worth saving just so that we may see the marvelous diversity of the world in which mankind evolved. To others, the wild areas are an essential part of our environment; we destroy them at the risk of our own destruction. To some, the old man-made patterns that still exist in our land are worth saving as a record of where we have been. To others, they are essential to the maintenance of human variety; they represent ways out of a technological trap. To all who are concerned, however, the question of how to save samples of the old America has no easy answer. As a nation we have been committed to quantitative measures of losses and gains. Wild values and human history do not readily quantify.

There are those who say we should not bother with these things now; the human problems of today are far too pressing. We have slums and ghettos, poverty and war, pestilence and hunger. These must command our attention. But others would look beyond tomorrow, to the day when the races no longer glare in hostility at one another, when poverty is overcome, when the slums are no more. When that day is reached and the slum dwellers emerge to their new life of security and leisure, what will the world be like? Will there be any place worth going to; any possibility of finding new ways of life in unfamiliar kinds of country? The answers to these questions must be found today.

How do we preserve diversity? How do we save wild areas and wild animal life, historical areas or different patterns for living? In the past we leaned heavily on government purchase of national parks, refuges, recreation areas, historical monuments and other reserves. But we can't afford to buy them all. At least we won't afford it now, and tomorrow will be too late. We have not managed to buy even the lands that we think we have set aside in public parks. Much of the area inside Everglades National Park is still privately owned and subject to exploitation. Point Reyes National Seashore, Assateague and Fire Island still remain largely in private hands. And those areas we have purchased for preservation beyond tomorrow are not secure. The largest reserve is influenced by its surroundings. If we owned all of Everglades National Park, it would still be threatened by the water demands of agricultural and urban developments in the lands beyond the park.

Once I thought environmental planning was the answer; better planning for and control over land use. You can't preserve wilderness without attention to the cities; you can't save nature without provisions for people. Parks must be integrated into overall park and recreation plans, and these in turn into total environmental plans. With good regional land-use planning and a willingness to translate plans into action, we could save the wild places, the rare places, the historical patterns, and create a better world for people. Once that seemed to be the answer. Today I am not sure. Too often it appears that planning, whether regional, land use or city planning, seems to lead to conditions worse than those the plans were intended to correct.

The dangers of single-purpose planning have long been obvious. Our highway systems are planned, yet few engineering efforts have done more damage to the American environment, as freeways cut through parks and choice farm lands, block off urban water fronts, and destroy historical city centers. Our water developments have been planned, and yet have been the sites of the greatest environmental controversies, since every wild and scenic canyon appears to be threatened by one or another development plan.

But even the broadest kind of planning that is being carried out today can lead ultimately, if the plans are successful, to less satisfactory conditions for people. Examples could be chosen almost at random, but a recent illustration is provided by the year 2000 plan for Fairfax County, Va. Fairfax County, part of the Washington metropolitan area, contains Dulles International Airport and the new town of Reston, along with Alexandria, Falls Church, McLean and other communities that are already a part of urbanized Washington. Today, however, much of the county is pleasant, open land of interspersed forest and field, of farms and estates, where one can easily forget the presence of a big city. But today there are only 400,000 people in the county.

The planners assume that in the year 2000, 1.5 million people will live in Fairfax County. The plan is intended to accommodate them in the most rational manner, to provide sites for new urban communities, transportation networks, water, sewage systems and all the other adjuncts and necessities of urban development.

It is not my purpose to criticize the plan itself but to question the planners' basic assumption that growth will occur, that it is inevitable, that it is somehow desirable, and that it must therefore be accommodated. If the accommodation requires the sacrifice of field and forest, then these must be sacrificed. If it brings increasing pollution and congestion to the total metropolitan region, then these must be endured. If it leads to the disappearance of Washington into a massive megalopolis, this must be accepted. Growth is taken as the determinant; all else must bend to it. I do not know if Fairfax County will be a better place to live when 1.5 million people dwell where 400,000 now exist. It bothers me that nobody asks the question. One hears the demographer's predictions, and one obeys.

The unfortunate consequence of planning for growth is that it makes growth almost inevitable. If the houses are built and the roads are put in; if the industries and other employing agencies arrive; if water, schools, sewage systems and other essentials are provided, people will come to fill the spaces allotted for them. They will be encouraged to come; they will be advertised for; lured to the area that has been planned for them. The home builders, the road builders, the business leaders and the government officials all develop a stake in population growth. Once growth is planned for, its absence becomes disastrous. Growth must occur.

Is the answer, then, to abandon planning? Obviously not. Areas for which no overall plan exists, or in which none is adhered to, also grow. They grow in a more disruptive manner, blotting out natural environments, creating conflicts for water, creating hopeless transportation problems; spreading out into the "slurbs" of California, or the depressing developments of Florida. One sees too many examples in America of growth without plan.

Perhaps, however, the answer lies in a different kind of planning; one that takes growth as a variable that can be controlled. But planners alone cannot make such decisions. The resolve to control growth in any area is a policy decision that must be made by the government through the political process at every level, from national and state to county and city. The decision had best be made first at the top, at the federal level, since federal funds, subsidies and contracts have a major role in determining where people will go.

Pierotti, New York Post

I cannot state in any detail what kind of planning must be done to control growth. Obviously America is not yet saturated with people, although it could be argued that we have already exceeded our optimum population. Obviously, also, some areas have reached a point of overcrowding, considering our present level of social and physical organization of human communities. One kind of planning, therefore, that holds out hope is planning for new cities. By new cities I do not mean new towns of the Columbia or Reston variety, since these are simply well-organized additions to already urbanized areas; but completely new cities of a quarter million or more people. The "experimental city" being planned at the University of Minnesota, under the leadership of Walter Vivrett, and with the assistance of Athelstan Spilhaus, Buckminster Fuller, Harrison Brown, William Wheaton and others, is an example. This project would attempt to bring into being a city of 250,000 to be located at least 100 miles from any existing metropolitan center. Such a city, by its new design, its bold approaches to architecture and urban function, could persuade people to move from existing centers of congestion. But only a major effort and expenditure of funds by federal and state governments can bring such new cities into being. Private enterprise cannot lead the way, since it cannot afford the risk involved in such huge schemes unless it enjoys full governmental support.

Planning for open-space preservation is a tool for controlling and channeling growth, but only if the values of open space are fully recognized and if the plans are supported by every level of government. Open space, whatever its purpose, is space removed from growth, reserved for posterity. Most commonly, however, open-space plans are the ones that are first set aside or ignored to make way for highways, reservoirs, subdivisions, new municipal buildings or other growth-oriented developments.

Open-space zoning is a step beyond planning, but zoning like planning has a way of being overridden at the local level of city or county government. Hawaii has taken a strong new step with its state-wide, land-use zoning. If this can hold up against the court cases being directed toward it, an example may be set for other states. For today at least, Hawaii's system has been successful. At the worst it will have accomplished a worth-while delaying action against misplaced growth.

It is essential in open-space planning or zoning that attention be given first to the "irreplaceable" areas—the unique natural spots, the habitats of rare or endangered wild species of plants or animals, the unusual areas that would qualify as national or state parks, the important historic sites. Secondly, protection must be extended to the choice agricultural soils from which our food must continue to come, to the forest and pasture lands on which we will depend for wood, fiber or meat. These are limited in supply and we have as yet no adequate substitutes. It is also important that care be given to areas of importance chiefly for their beauty, to the scenes that give a landscape definition and quality, that provide the background against which aesthetically pleasing developments can take place.

But new cities, open-space planning and land-use zoning all represent delaying actions at best, not solutions to the problems of channeling and containing growth. The final answers must be sought in the development of population policies, national, state and local. In a series of seminars on population, held in 1966 at the University of North Carolina, it was pointed out that if it takes 100 hours to fill all the earth's available space with people, we are now in the ninety-ninth hour. There is not much time left to make decisions on where we shall continue to grow and how large.

Those who plan to accommodate more than 300 million Americans in the year 2000 seem to forget that there will also be a year 2001. If space is provided, at whatever cost, for the 300 million, growth will not thereby miraculously cease. Plans must then be instituted to provide space for 600 million in the year 2035 or 2040, and if this is accomplished for 1,200 million and 2,400 million. Planning for continued growth, to the extent that it is successful, reaches a point where it becomes madness, since there are limits and these will be reached. Must we wait until population growth is forced to halt because we have run out of resources or space? Is it not better to fight this battle now, while we still have something worth defending?

In the past five years our nation has come to realize that growth is not necessarily desirable, that the United States, as well as the underdeveloped world, has a population problem. The next step should be an inquiry to determine our policy on population, and the debate should now be under way in every community as well as in Washington. It is disturbing that no such debate is to be heard in Congress, in the state legislatures or in county councils.

In the absence of an attempt to define a population policy, what is the concerned citizen to do? One obvious answer is to educate and inform the public and the politician. But that is a slow process and meanwhile the battle to maintain a worth-while human environment is being lost. A second answer is to fight a delaying action at every level of government, using every legal, political and economic tool. If it is possible to prevent the growth of a new and unwanted subdivision by voting against the provision of city services, do so. One can vote against the new freeway and for the new park. One can campaign against the real estate candidate for the board of supervisors or the county council. A "do-nothing" policy at the government level is to be preferred to a policy that encourages "progress," where such progress is equated with growth and expansion. There are many ways to throw sand in the gears of "progress."

It is no small battle for no minor goal. At stake is the right to a rich and diversified American environment in which free people can choose their own ways of life. If the battle is lost to those who equate bigger with better, the America of tomorrow will be a technologically directed, totally regimented, completely homogenous land from which there can be no escape ever, since there will be no place left to go.

THE NEW MEN OF CUBA

JAMES HIGGINS

Mr. Higgins is assistant editor of the York (Pa.) Gazette and Daily.

Havana

I am told I am the first reporter from the United States to spend more than a day or two on the Isle of Youth, formerly the Isle of Pines, next to Cuba itself the largest of the almost 2,000 islands which form the Cuban archipelago. I returned to Havana on January 19 after six days on Isla de la Juventud, so renamed because it has been since June of 1966 the residence of an ever-increasing number of Cubans from the age of 12 on up to 27 or 28, if you include the supervising directors of the island project from the Communist Youth League.

In 1959 the total population of the island was about 8,000, I was told, consisting mostly of farmers and retainers who serviced the estates of the wealthy, many of them from the United States, some Cuban. It was much favored by U.S. nationals not only for its beauty—the area I toured in the north end of the island recalls Cape Cod and the San Joaquin Valley of California—but because it was a free trade zone, with no import or export duties.

Also, of course, it contained a prison population. The Isle of Pines, far back into the years of Spanish conquest and control, was the place of incarceration for both ordinary and political prisoners. The buildings still remain, but the great rotundas within whose walls were imbedded, honeycomb-style, ranks of small cells, are empty now, the doors of the cells removed, the bars gone from the windows. (Fidel Castro, who in the Batista era spent several years in the Isle of Pines prison, occupied, it interested me to see, a spacious two-room apartment with a bathroom equipped with shower. This was in a separate building and the idea, I was informed, was to keep Fidel completely remote from contact with other prisoners. But it is possible that, as an intellectual and upper-class Cuban, young Castro had connections of the sort that are not unknown to privileged prisoners in the United States.)

The administrative edifice of the former prison, an imposing stone structure, has been converted into a school, an institute of applied science, where several thousand young Cubans are studying modern agriculture and animal husbandry, as well as certain construction and industrial processes. The 27-year-old economist in charge of investigating and planning the economic development of the island told me that its first need is for skilled workers and technicians, "which are in short supply but we are doing our best to recruit and to train."

It was Hurricane Alma in the summer of 1966 which led to the abandonment of the prison and to the incursion of the youth. The ravages of the Huracan (the Tainan name for the God of Winds) were being repaired by about 2,000 prisoners, already well along the route to "readjustment to society," and thus permitted much freedom of movement outside the prison grounds. But to their assistance came, from Cuba, hundreds of youths, a number of whom expressed the wish to remain indefinitely on the Isle of Pines and reconstruct it as a model place of the revolution.

The decision-making process in Cuba seems always to involve these elements: (1) A need or sentiment expressed, or perhaps as yet unarticulated, by a group of people; (2) a crisis, such as a hurricane, or maybe only an incident, which brings together the people and Fidel, who is always on the move around Cuba; (3) an illumination resulting from the interplay between the people and Fidel, each concentrated upon the particular concrete problem exposed by the crisis or incident; (4) a plan of action formulated generally by Fidel, who is a very spontaneous thinker and talker.

At this point, I would guess, the general objective or plan of action enunciated by Fidel is taken up by the high-level boards of the Communist Party of Cuba which, it is my impression based upon many conversations with Cubans, foreign correspondents and foreign scholars of the Cuban Revolution, is a creation of the revolutionary movement led by Fidel rather than the other way around. That is to say, the party, as well as the political philosophy of Fidel and those who have been close to him in or out of the Sierra Maestra since the late 1950s, developed from the experience of the successful guerrilla struggle and the consequent experience of administering the revolution.

The high-level boards to which I refer are the eight-member Political Bureau, headed by Fidel, and the party Central Committee of about 100 members. I gather that in these units the details of operation for any general plan are discussed and formulated, rediscussed and reformulated, on and on—a continuing and, to the Cubans, natural and essential revolutionary way of doing the business of social life. And of course all the groups involved from the beginning of whatever the scheme is, the people and Fidel, together with the party directors and the technical persons assigned to the work, keep a running conversation going as the days pass and things happen and change.

So it appears to have been with the Isle of Youth project in the past year and a half. No doubt the Communist Youth League helped to mobilize the first youngsters who went to the island to make good the land and material damaged by Hurricane Alma. It should be understood, by the way, that these mass mobilizations or recruitments are not campaigns of compulsion. They are voluntary responses to appeals for human help in vital work; and are similar to the response of people in the United States when disaster—a flood, for example, or a forest fire—occurs. There is also present in these mass mobilizations a patriotic revolutionary fervor, since the revolution is young and has, you might say, turned most Cubans on.

As the pioneers on the Isle of Pines got on with the task of cleaning up the place, and began to dream of a future on the island; as Fidel caught the drift; and as the Young Communist League, the Central Committee and the Political Bureau (I am reconstructing from my imagination; no one person has described this to me) started to ponder the possibilities, an immediate problem appeared: the presence on the island of prisoners and a prison on the one hand, and, on the other, the young people. So Fidel closed down the prison. Prisoners who had conducted themselves in a manner approved by the authorities were free to remain at work on the island. The others were removed to the main island.

Between 1959 and 1966 the island population grew slowly; in 1967 it ascended sharply. The figure I was given for the present population is 40,000, divided into approximately 23,000 permanent residents, mostly adults; 5,000 students at the institute for applied science in the former prison, and 12,000 workers. If I am correct—translations were being made at the time I got these figures into English for me and French for a young Algerian reporter, and, besides, Cuba is a dizzying and complicated encounter for a stranger like myself—the 12,000 workers are mainly the new youth, who not only work but also attend school classes, as do many, perhaps most, of the Cuban people.

The projected population figures are, for 1970, 90,000; and for 1980, 120,000. If things turn out as planned, the increase will be composed of additional youth from Cuba and the growing families of the first youth settlers, although there is a present problem that must be solved before marriages and offspring can proceed on an even keel: the current ratio of boys to girls is about 15 to 1. "We are giving this unfortunate unbalance much attention," the Young Communist League secretary in charge told me. "But many girls, you know, for many reasons, including our Spanish traditions, are not accustomed to leave home and parents at an early age. So we must talk very seriously with them and their parents to overcome the reluctance." And if you cannot persuade them? I asked. "Well," he said, "then they do not come. They must make the decision to come or stay at home." And, I went on, supposing they come and then change their minds, as girls sometimes do, and wish to leave the island? "Then they go," he said. "You may ask any of them you meet if that is not the case."

I did ask the question. The answer was always as he had given it to me. But I think it is safe for me to conclude, on the basis of both interviews with a dozen or so girls and observation of hundreds of happy faces, that the percentage of girls who leave is very low. In fact, when I asked one girl what she did in Havana during the five days' leave each young person is permitted at the end of forty-five-day periods on the island, she told me she spent many hours telling her friends to join her on the Isle of Youth.

The youngsters live in what are called encampments—collective houses in barracks style, some of cinder-block construction with thatched palm roofing, some with tin roofs, some with corrugated tin siding. Most of the encampments are not coeducational but are like separate summer camps for boys and girls in the United States—although the encampment facilities are primitive by U.S. standards and conceded to be primitive by any standards by the young party officials. Furthermore, the distances between them are considerable and transportation is hard to come by, since gasoline, rationed now in Cuba, is reserved for the most part for the tractors and trucks which chug and clatter all over the island. So although there is no prohibition, indeed there is a willingness, for girls and boys to get together to dance, sing, play games or whatever, "we face," the secretary said to me, "the transportation question which we are now studying firmly with the aim to improve the bus service to Nueva Gerona" (the island's largest of six small cities and a place that on a Saturday night bears at least a superficial resemblance to the East Village of New York or San Francisco's Haight-

Macpherson, Toronto Star

"How About Us Crazy Cubans?"

Ashbury). "Also," he continued, "to improve the supply of bicycles and motorcycles to reinforce the jeeps, cars and trucks."

The work done by girls on the Isle of Youth consists in the main of planting and cultivating coffee and fruit trees, oranges and grapefruit particularly, but sometimes a crossbreed of sour orange and grapefruit achieved by a grafting technique invented in Egypt (I was told by an Egyptian journalist) and perfected in Algeria (I was told by the young Algerian). Whatever the facts of that development, the 28-year-old "bachelor woman"—her description of her state—demonstrating the technique to me was a Cuban who at age 17 had been a courier between the underground in the city of Santiago de Cuba and Fidel's guerrillas in the nearby Sierra Maestra. She was using two tools, one a pair of excellent clippers, the other a neat sharp knife. I asked her where this equipment came from. The clippers from Spain; the knife from China.

The boys, as vaqueros (cowboys) and cowhands, work the ranches where cattle are being bred (by artificial insemination) and pastured in sufficient quantity to supply the present and projected population with all necessary milk and meat. The horses they use for their work are handsome animals, descendants, I was told by a smiling Bulgarian veterinarian in command of one ranch, of the horses maintained for riding pleasure by the Yankees who nine years ago had bequeathed them, along with shoreline estates, to the revolution. "A bequest," he said, "not altogether of their own free will."

The Isle of Youth is to Cuba what Cuba considers itself to be to Latin America (and maybe to North America too): a laboratory for developing the human society of the days to come. Some weeks ago I read in a New Statesman article by K. S. Karol a startling remark made to Karol by Fidel, to the effect that the Cuban Revolution, through Communist distribution of the goods of life, would do away altogether with money and the money mentality. I resolved at the time that if ever I had the chance myself to converse with Fidel, I would ask him how he proposed to initiate the process of eliminating money from the scene. On my visit to the Isle of Youth I discovered that the process, if only in tentative and experimental form, has already begun—in the laboratory, as I say.

The objective of production on the island—production of coffee, fruit, beef, poultry, eggs, milk and vegetables—is to furnish these free to the island population as they are now furnished free to the worker-students. Also furnished free now to the youth are all the essentials of their existence: work clothes, tools, transportation (such as it is) on the isle and to and from Cuba on the periodic visits, medical and dental care, athletic equipment, textbooks, and so forth. For their work, 7 A.M. to 5 P.M. with a two-hour break for lunch, six days a week, they receive 80 pesos a month. What for? For, I was told, "Sunday clothes" to wear to town, for treats such as soft drinks, ice cream, perhaps cosmetics, for the movie house in Nueva Gerona which costs money although two other theatres on the island show free movies, for, in general, the kind of personal items and satisfactions on which U.S. teen-agers spend some of their allowances.

But the plan is to increase gradually the free things and to decrease in proportion the money paid in wages until it disappears altogether. This sounds both simple and complex and I am sure it is. The economist whom I have mentioned commented that he saw many difficulties in the program. "Still," he added, "perhaps I have studied economics to the degree that I do not see the matter as clearly as Fidel, whose mind is less encumbered."

What the future will bring to the Isle of Youth, and to Cuba, may be envisioned in the outlines of the planners and dreamers. But there are always revolutions in the revolution, always changes, always outside interferences, always such practical puzzles as to how the Isle of Youth will work out its economic and social relationship to Cuba, and Cuba its relationship to the world around. Where, for example, will the shirts and the underwear be made, and the radios, the phonograph records and such? How will these be transformed into "free items" for the smaller island as against the larger, for Cuba as against a shrinking and uneasy but still strongly capitalistic world?

Perhaps a fundamental part of the answer does not lie in the formulated projections, in the contemplated mechanics of production and distribution, but rather in the nature of the basic crop that is being sown comprehensively on the Isle of Youth as a vanguard guerrilla campaign, entertaining for its objective the whole of Cuba and no doubt more besides: the new youth itself. Sugar has been the commodity by which Cuba has survived, but the revolution has generated a novel means of survival and example. "With clearly defined features," Che Guevara wrote in 1965, "there now appeared in the history of the Cuban Revolution a personage which will systematically repeat itself: the masses."

And on October 18, 1967, in his second speech confirming the murder of Che in Bolivia, Fidel proclaimed: "If we wish to say how we want our children to be educated, we must say without hesitation: 'We want them to be educated in Che's spirit!' . . . If we wish to express what we want our children to be, we must say from our heart as ardent revolutionaries: 'We want them to be like Che.'"

Perhaps it is still possible in the United States to discount the rhetoric of Fidel Castro as flamboyant bombast, screening a malevolent whimsy which has somehow, but only temporarily, bemused the Cuban people. I have always considered this judgment, in whatever variation it has been sounded, to be a dreadful mistake. It could be, as a matter of fact, that the real mistake, understandable in a culture whose ideology is "individualism," has been the overwhelming concentration on Fidel Castro himself, rather than on where and by whom the revolution is happening: the people of Cuba, what Che called the new Cuban personage, the masses, particularly the masses of children and youth. Let me give a very small sampling of what I think I mean. To do so, to be sure, I must present the sample in individual form. And yet it is to me an accurate sample of the personage of the young masses whom I observed in Cuba and on Cuba's Isle of Youth, a sample of Che's defined personage and of Fidel's unquestionable determination to educate the children and youth of Cuba to be "like Che."

We had driven, my interpreter and I, over a number of dusty, curving roads on the Isla de la Juventud, which certainly has a road as well as a transportation problem. Our jeep brought us to a lonely settlement of shacks and barracks, beyond which lay an expanse of water out of which a few palms here and there sprouted limply: the picture of a land devastated by flood which, indeed, turned out to be the fact, except that it was a planned flood. The "lake" had been created by a dam and was to serve as both water supply and swimming hole.

The encampment contained 250 boys late of the streets, the reformatories, the broken homes of Havana: delinquents, in short; troubled and troublemakers, some of them having been convicted of armed robbery or killings; dropouts from school, orphans, runaways and the like. They had not been dispatched to the encampment, no, they had been persuaded to give it a try. (So the story of the 26-year-old encampment director and his two political education assistants went.) After a session with them, wherein I learned that the boys, ages 14 to 18, were being trained in the mornings to be citrus technicians and being instructed in classroom sessions by volunteer teachers from Havana in the afternoons, I stood on the porch of the shambly headquarters waiting to meet a boy whose acquaintance I had requested after being informed that there were two lads in the camp whose parents, sick of the revolution, had departed for the States.

At length Marquido appeared, in the company of several others. As I think back on the event I do not recall that the supervisors were in the vicinity when I conducted a brief interview, which attracted more and more boys, the word having gotten around, maybe, that a "Norte-americano" was on deck. There were possibly thirty or forty in the cluster as I finished receiving the information that Marquido was 14, that his father had been well off before the revolution and could not adjust to the change, that the boy had himself decided to remain in Cuba (I had no way of checking that part of his recital), that he was healthy and contented with his work and studies, that he liked the camp and how it was "helping us all to be responsible for ourselves and each other in good ways." (I had heard a few minutes before that petty theft was quite a problem at the camp, but no matter, Marquido had the floor.)

"May I now ask you a few questions?" he said, looking me square in the eyes. He was large for 14, with broad hefty shoulders, a generally stocky build, fair skinned and tow headed, unusual for a Cuban. He reminded me of a U.S. athlete type, the kind of boy who in 9th grade has the body development and easy stance which promises he will be a tackle or a blocking back. I told him, sure, he could ask me anything. He said: "Tell me, what do you think of the United States?"

"First of all," I said, "it is my country, you understand, just as Cuba is yours. And so I answer you from that foundation, that it is my country. It is also a country that was born in revolution; and from that revolution come many fine democratic principles, of freedom and equality, in which I have believed all my life, ever since I learned them at an early age in school."

"But is there now," he asked, "freedom and equality in your country all these years after your revolution?"

"No," I said. "Some have more freedom than others, some are more equal than others."

"Then your revolution has not succeeded."

I said that was true, it had not yet succeeded in realizing its principles, which was something that disappointed and disturbed me.

"But what do you do about it?" he asked. He was proceeding in his inquiry with the utmost courtesy but I was beginning to sweat a bit, nonetheless. Also I was getting the sensation of being interrogated by Che's "personage," for the voice of Marquido seemed to be emanating from the whole of the faces studying me.

"Well," I said, "I am an editor of a daily newspaper in the United States. I also speak to audiences from time to time. And in both my writing and speaking I express my belief in freedom and equality and I criticize directly the forces in my country which block their realization."

"Such as the economic system of monopoly and imperialism?"

"Yes," I said.

"And the social system which oppresses the black people?"

"That too."

"And the political system of your government which makes war on the Vietnamese people?"

I said, yes, the newspaper for which I wrote editorials expressed horror at what the United States was doing in Vietnam and took the position that it had no business there, that the Vietnamese should be let alone to determine their own destiny. I said that was my personal feeling as well as the policy of the newspaper.

"But why," he asked, "is your government killing people in Vietnam? What do you think? Why?"

"I think," I said, "because private economic interests in the United States, which have a powerful influence upon government, own or control possessions and resources in many parts of the world. As they once did in Cuba. And they wish to keep them. And they are trying to teach in Vietnam, by war, that people must not undertake revolutions which would repossess the resources now owned or controlled by U.S. private investors."

"Do you write such things in the newspaper?" he asked.

"Pretty much so."

"What is your paper's circulation?"

"A little less than 40,000."

"Is it read throughout the country?"

"No, just in a small section of Pennsylvania."

"And there, do many people agree with you and the newspaper about Vietnam and these other things?"

"Not too many," I said. "But possibly I am wrong. I think more and more people in my country are beginning to worry and to protest the war policy toward Vietnam."

"But do they understand," he asked, "that it is the system of imperialism which leads to such wars?"

"No," I said, "I think very few understand or believe that."

"Do you?"

"Yes."

"Are there many like you where you live?"

I laughed. "No," I said, "not many."

"Any?"

"Yes," I said. "But don't ask me to give you a number. I don't know."

"Tell me," said Marquido, "do you have in your country such places as this camp where boys are taught to live and work well and cooperate?"

"We have similar places," I said. "And many good people who are interested in projects like this."

"But are they successful?" he asked. "Do they have the backing of the government and the society? And how can your country try to help some boys and send other boys to kill Vietnamese boys and many be killed themselves?"

"My country," I said, "is full of contradictions, heart-breaking contradictions."

"Which only revolution can resolve," he said, his eyes dancing with mischief.

"Well," I said, "that's your story."

"Not mine," said Marquido, "Cuba's."

"What is Cuba?" I said. It was a silly question but he had had me on the ropes for too long.

"What is Cuba?" he repeated. "It's this." He waved a hand in a gesture to indicate the encampment. "It's us." And he indicated his comrades. "Come back again," he said. "Come back to Cuba and to here. Whenever you come you will be welcome and you will see many improvements. Please now. Will you tell my parents in New Orleans that you saw me and I send them affection? Also that I'm fine. I will give you their address."

He did so and I will follow through on that for Marquido, new man in Cuba, age 14.

CREDIT CARDS

THE THIEF IN THE MAILBOX

EDWARD K. SHANAHAN

Mr. Shanahan is a Washington reporter who covers the activities of Congress.

It is unsettling to rip open what looks like another piece of junk mail and find two Shell Oil credit cards inside with your name printed on them. "What's this?" you ask. You hadn't sent away for any new credit cards. Noticing that the cards were sent to an address you had moved from nearly a year ago, your initial reaction is relief that the envelope was properly forwarded and didn't fall into someone else's hands.

But your next reaction is anger. Where does the Shell Oil Co. get off printing up credit cards with your name stamped on them, putting them in an envelope marked "contents valuable," and shipping them around the country with no guarantee that you will ever get them? The answer is simple: Shell Oil has that right because there is no law against it.

Furthermore, the card states that use or even retention of it constitutes acceptance of all Shell-dictated terms. The major condition is that you agree to pay for all purchases made by any person who presents the card, whether authorized to do so or not, until or unless the Shell Oil Co. has received written notice that the card is lost or stolen. So if you don't want the card, the best policy is to destroy it—by snipping it up into bits.

In 1968 more credit cards will be issued than the country's total adult population—or some 150 million. Further, it is estimated that more than a million cards will be lost this year and another 300,000 stolen—many of them from mailboxes. There are no federal laws governing the distribution of credit cards and no agency charged with policing them, but a lot of people are beginning to get concerned and there are indications that credit card controls may develop into one of the major consumer-protection issues in the current session of Congress. Even late in 1967 there was some legislative activity in this area.

Early in November that old populist and long-time antagonist of the banking industry, Wright Patman (D., Tex.), chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee, focused on bank credit cards. During hearings held by his committee, it was disclosed that at least 848 banks have some form of credit card plan and $1,137 million of credit was outstanding under these plans as of early October. Last summer First National City Bank of New York sent out about a million unsolicited "Everything Cards" to customers who met certain credit requirements, and by the first of the year the bank had lost approximately $100,000 from the use of these plastic keys to wealth by persons unauthorized and unknown. It had stopped issuing unsolicited cards in September. The specific legislation under study by Patman's committee would prohibit federally insured banks from issuing credit cards unless the recipients requested them and unless the amount of money available from them was specified, in writing, in agreements between the banks and the recipients.

Said Patman: "The widespread use of this new credit device by the banks raises serious legal and policy questions which must be answered by the Congress. Frankly, I am very concerned about the unregulated mailing of millions of unsolicited credit cards" by banks. He charged that many banks made no credit investigations before issuing the cards and in fact had no conception of the total liability of credit extended through the use of such cards.

A more cautious note was sounded by Andrew F. Brimmer, a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System: "We doubt that the problems involved in guarding against unsafe or unsound practices in this area are so pressing as to require immediate legislative solutions."

Furthermore, he said, restricting unsolicited mailings would seriously hamper banks in launching new credit card plans. That would give banks already in the field an unfair advantage.

Betty Furness, the President's Special Assistant for Consumer Affairs, said she strongly supported restrictions on bank credit cards. "I don't think credit should be handed out like candy at Christmas." One of her assistants later told a reporter that Miss Furness, not long ago, had herself been the recipient of an unsolicited credit card. "It's like someone is out there with your bank book," Miss Furness was quoted as saying. Her office reports that they get countless letters complaining about unwanted credit cards.

Patman will continue his inquiry into bank credit cards in 1968 but it is not known if he will or can broaden the scope of his investigation to cover all unsolicited credit cards. The most interesting consumer-oriented bill covering all kinds of credit cards is one worked out by Rep. Joseph E. Karth (D., Minn.) and co-sponsored by fifteen other House members. Under this bill, all unsolicited credit cards would have to be sent by registered mail and delivered only to the addressee. The envelope containing the cards would have to be plainly marked: "Unsolicited credit card—addressee may refuse." If the addressee did refuse to accept the card, the sender would have to pay the cost of return postage. It is estimated that it would cost about $1.40 to send out each such card and a similar amount for the return trip if it was rejected. With what must have been tongue in cheek, Karth said of the bill: "It is in no way intended to limit the innovative practice of banks and other businesses who wish to offer the public credit."

But what the bill does, Karth went on, is "provide the consumer a choice of refusing or accepting unasked-for credit, and it will help to prevent credit instruments from falling into the hands of unauthorized, fraudulent users. I believe these are the minimum rights every American consumer should enjoy. Protection of one's credit rating and good name and prevention of unjust debt is something I believe everyone is entitled to."

Karth's bill has been picked up by Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) who has a good record on consumer legislation and a knack for generating publicity as well. In offering the bill in the Senate in December, Mondale said: "The convenience of credit cards is welcomed, but the harassment of unwanted cards is not." He said the proliferation of such cards has reached alarming proportions. In Chicago, he said, five banks sent out 5 million cards to people who had not asked for them. Many of these cards were stolen, some by postal workers, causing the banks to retract the cards, according to Mondale. Texaco, he said, recently distributed 2 million unsolicited cards in California. "Texaco's success—the mass issuance brought a sales jump—may very well tempt others to follow suit," the Senator warned.

In the present absence of controls, if an unsolicited card falls into the hands of an unauthorized person, the burden is on the person whose name the card bears to prove to the company that he lost the card or that it was stolen. While trying to establish his innocence, he is subjected to the dunning of the company's collection department, his credit rating is threatened, he is inconvenienced, and runs the risk of having possible expenses if legal help is needed.

A man wrote to Representative Karth recently about an experience involving credit cards. Soon after leaving Pennsylvania for a stay in the South, this man was sent to his Pennsylvania address a Humble credit card. The card was stolen from his mailbox and used for five months without his knowledge, the writer said. It was not until he moved back to Pennsylvania that he got a bill from Humble for charges in excess of $100. "I am still fighting this purported past-due account," the man wrote. "I am highly embarrassed by it."

RACE AND SELF

TOLERANCE IN MILITANCY

GARY T. MARX

Mr. Marx is an assistant professor in the Department of Social Relations, Harvard, and an associate at the M.I.T.-Harvard Joint Center for Urban Studies. He is the author of Protest and Prejudice (Harper & Row).

In the particular movement in which I am involved, hate doesn't have much function. Hope does . . . none of us really have time to hate. It's too all-consuming.

Civil rights worker, Cleveland

I did not join the movement because of love, but because of hate. I hate racism and am out to smash it.

Stokely Carmichael

Writing in the early 1920s Franklin Frazier noted that "if the masses of Negroes can save their self-respect and remain free of hate, so much the better, but . . . I believe it would be better for the Negro's soul to be seared with hate than dwarfed by self-abasement." Since that time some radicals have assumed the importance of hate for racial protest as well as psychological well-being. And one tradition in social theory is that hatred of an out-group serves to strengthen identification with the causes of the in-group.

Yet analysis of the connection between protest attitudes and hatred of whites, carried out when the civil rights movement was at its peak, suggests that the opposite may well have been true. In late 1964, as part of a University of California study sponsored by the Anti-Defamation League, samples taken to be representative of the black population in New York City, Chicago, Atlanta and Birmingham were compiled. A national sample of Negroes living in non-Southern urban areas was also prepared. Negro interviewers sought to determine each person's opinion on a wide range of civil rights issues, including attitudes toward whites.

Those questioned were asked about their own civil rights activity, and on the basis of eight questions an index of militancy was constructed. Built into this index were questions dealing with a number of dimensions of racial protest such as impatience with the speed of integration, opposition to discrimination in public facilities and the sale of property, perception of barriers to Negro advancement, support of civil rights demonstrations, and expressed willingness to demonstrate. A parallel set of questions was used to build an index of anti-white sentiment.

When the measure of militancy was matched with attitudes toward whites, it became evident that as militancy rose so did tolerance. Those in civil rights organizations were less anti-white than those not in such organizations, and when members of civil rights organizations also scored high on the militancy index (giving the militant response to six or more of the eight items) they proved to be the most tolerant Negroes in the sample. Almost half of this group expressed little or no generalized hostility toward whites and only one in ten was strongly anti-white. In marked contrast, the least tolerant were those uninvolved in civil rights organizations and seemingly unconcerned with the civil rights struggle. Three in ten of the unaffiliated conservatives (those giving nonmilitant responses to six or more of the eight items) expressed strong dislike for whites and only slightly more than one in ten were without such sentiments.

The ironic possibility emerges that, although the civil rights struggle obviously increased overt conflict between Negroes and whites, it may actually have reduced generalized intolerance of whites, particularly among those most determined to fight for their rights. While the comparisons are at best rough, it is worth noting that when data from the study of 1964 are compared with those made in 1959 and 1949, no increase in anti-white sentiment can be seen. Of course, the findings reported above say nothing about the intensity of hostility that some militants may have felt, nor do they imply that the protest movement has not lowered Negro inhibitions about publicly expressing anti-white sentiments.

A consideration of the social and psychological factors associated with concern for civil rights, as well as with tolerance, and the nature of the civil rights struggle at the time of the study, make the correlation understandable. Thus Negroes higher in social position and social participation, those raised in urban areas and in the North, and those considered to have a positive self-image, a high morale, and to be intellectually sophisticated, were the most likely to show civil rights concern. They were also the least likely to be anti-white.

Furthermore, and beyond these shared correlates, there was no doubt, for many, an ideological link between militancy and tolerance. Militancy may have increased sensitivity to the injustice and distortion of reality which arises from categorically labeling other human groups. The greater sophistication that comes with concern for racial justice may shatter the image of a monolithic racist white society, and the inconsistency in attacking white racism from the perspective of the black racist may be realized. In addition, militants were much more tolerant of the civil liberties of religious dissenters and more accepting of diverse points of view. It seems likely that, for many, a relative tolerance for whites was part of a generally more tolerant world view.

It is true that the civil rights struggle drew upon profound frustration and discontent. However, in the case of the activist, frustration was mixed with hope, and was more likely to be caused by the situation of one's group than to be the deep personal frustration characterized by Eric Hoffer's True Believer. Those aroused by the civil rights struggle in 1964 were likely to have a high morale rather than the sense of despair and hopelessness which is often thought to lead to prejudice. In its beginning phase the civil rights movement was a mixture of very deep Negro anger and Christian principles of love and forgiveness. From not stooping to hate in a hate-filled society, people otherwise deprived gained feelings of self worth and moral superiority.

But what of today, when one American city after another explodes in racial violence and radical change has come about in the civil rights movement? The link between militancy and tolerance may not hold for black power advocates as it did for the followers of Dr. King. Indeed, reading the mass media might lead one to assume an inverse relationship between the two. A great many observers have been quick to label black power as "racism in reverse."

To be sure, anti-white sentiment exists within the black power segments of the civil rights struggle, just as it exists within the Negro community at large. For some black radicals any tolerance for whites smacks of Uncle Tom. Yet this is peripheral to the emergence of the black power movement. Anti-white prejudice is not something suddenly created by the black power movement and is not what the movement is about. The tie so often made between black militancy and hatred of whites stems more from the sensation-seeking bias of the mass media and the incipient racism of white society (which recognizes the legitimacy of white ethnic interest groups only) than it does from a careful consideration of the facts.

The emergence of something like the black power movement was to be anticipated; it is only surprising that it did not occur earlier. The dream Martin Luther King spoke of in his March on Washington speech and the idyllic vision held by early civil rights workers of a just interracial society have not materialized; in some respects things have gotten worse and continue to deteriorate. The relevant statistics are all too well known and need not be repeated.

As was the case with the Jews in Europe, the type of orientation dominant within an ethnic minority group at any one time is to an important extent dependent on the receptiveness of the dominant group. When the dominant group seems approachable, emphasis is placed on inclusion and assimilation. When the dominant group is not receptive, or its supposed receptiveness proves illusory, the minority group may increasingly turn inward and in a separatist direction. Other periods in American history show Negro protest movements going toward or away from the dominant society. For example, the hopes raised by the Civil War and World War I led to an initial emphasis on inclusion; the shattering of those hopes led to the predominance of separatist leaders such as Booker T. Washington and Marcus Garvey. Other leaders, for example Paul Cuffee and Martin Robinson Delaney, like many of today's black power leaders, began strongly in favor of integration and then, overwhelmed by futility, took up separatist positions.

As represented by CORE and to a lesser extent by SNCC, the black power movement has been unduly labeled pro-violence and anti-white. To argue for the strengthening of Negro institutions is not to be anti-white, nor is it to support segregation. To pursue the ethnic interests of one's own group through organizations made up and led by members of that group need not mean the preaching of hatred toward outsiders. It can simply mean operating within the context of a pluralistic society that recognizes as legitimate the claims of various ethnic groups. To the extent that such a movement is conducive to the development of a positive self-image, it might even be expected to lessen negative attitudes toward outsiders. Psychoanalysts such as Karen Horney and Erich Fromm have stressed the connection between acceptance of oneself and of outsiders.

There is some evidence that an earlier SNCC definition of the problem along strictly racial lines is softening. SNCC now talks of human rights rather than civil rights. In a recent talk at Columbia University, H. Rap Brown stressed that "a revolution is not a black or a white thing." In an address to Harvard white students working in Negro areas, a SNCC leader suggested that whites would not be unwelcome in the ghetto provided they were discreet in snapping their fingers. In their recently published Black Power, which might be subtitled "Essays for the concerned middle-class white," and which, because it tries to be social science analysis as well as a black Communist manifesto, partly fails as each, Carmichael and Hamilton give slight evidence of categorical hatred of whites or of irrational anger. They suggest that concerned whites have a much needed role to play in the civil rights movement and look forward to an eventual coalition of poor blacks and poor whites "as the major internal instrument of change in the American society." Hamilton recently suggested that calls for violence were rhetorical and noted, "armed revolution is not feasible and will not become so. Blacks would lose a race war and it would break their spirit."

Carmichael has repeatedly stressed in his speeches that pro-black doesn't have to mean anti-white and that if whites fail to see this it is their hang-up, not his. In an earlier speech he suggested that the black man "wants to build something of his own . . . and that is not anti-white. When you build your own house, it doesn't mean you tear down the house across the street. It just means you're building your own house." However, it might be noted that failure to obtain the deserved resources to build one's own house is a powerful stimulus to tearing down someone else's.

One can observe thus far an important disjunction between the actions of black radicals and their statements.

An analysis of the themes and intensity of the anger expressed in such statements would not lead one to predict that in several years of urban violence almost the only people who have been killed are Negroes, and the only people doing the killing are policemen and National Guardsmen. Nor would it have led one to predict that a deep-lying and passionate hatred of whites per se has not been a defining characteristic of most urban uprisings. The integrated (or rather, racially parallel) character of some of the looting, the looting of Negro-owned stores and attacks on middle-class Negroes, the restrictions of the uprising to Negro areas, and the almost carnival-like atmosphere at times attest to this. For the more politically oriented participants, the uprisings were an attack on the white-dominated system and its representatives, while for others they were an effort to enjoy on the spot some of America's opulence that had been denied them.

In some cases extreme statements have been used to gain attention and to strengthen bargaining positions vis-à-vis the dominant society, or to gain power within the black community. In considering the variance between attitudes and action, Lee Rainwater suggests that Negro cultural emphasis on expressivity over instrumentality is relevant. He states: "A WASP riot under similar conditions would probably be a much more hard-nosed and certainly more bloody and violent event." But even when the makers of inflammatory statements mean what they say, it is important to remember that they are driven to their positions by the frustration of goals defined as legitimate by the state itself, and that they are "extremists" of a kind very unlike the K.K.K. or the American Nazi Party, with whom they are all too often wrongly compared. It is the partial realization of these sanctioned goals (nondiscriminatory treatment and greater dignity for Negroes) that drives white extremists to their positions. Most Negro "extremists" want to get the whites off their backs; they have no wish to deprive whites of the constitutional rights that apply to everyone.

The connection between tolerance and protest anger that held in 1964 would not hold for some segments of the civil rights movement today. Yet this does not mean that the relationship has yet been reversed, nor that there is any necessary reason why the intensity of black anger need be connected with categorical anti-white sentiment. And it may be true that the disorganized and hopeless are a greater threat to white society than are the organized. If the legacy of Malcolm X works to produce anger, it also channels it onto what is perceived as an oppressive system rather than onto whites per se. The changes in Malcolm X's perspective as a result of his trip to Mecca and break with the Muslims are understood by many of the more militant leaders.

The continued failure to improve measurably the average black man's situation may yet make the connection between militancy and tolerance noted for 1964 (and still at least hypothetically possible) an ironic footnote to a wildly escalating conflict. But while it would make slight difference to a person caught in the middle of a race war, the escalation is ultimately explainable by the inability of American society to change rather than by the internal requisites of Negro protest anger.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Some Versions of the Proletariat

THE AMERICAN WRITER AND THE GREAT DEPRESSION. Edited by Harvey Swados. Bobbs-Merrill. 521 pp. $7.50.

YEARS OF PROTEST: A Collection of American Writings of the 1930's. Edited by Jack Salzman (with Barry Wallenstein). Pegasus. 488 pp. $7.50.

MICHAEL B. FOLSOM

Mr. Folsom teaches literature at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and is preparing the memoirs of Michael Gold for publication.

Some matters suffer anthologizing; others demand it. Though a collection of great passages from Shakespeare is an impertinence, selection of medieval lyrics is a necessity. We really want an anthology when the whole of a body of writings adds up to less than the sum of its best parts, when select parts can make a good whole. Perhaps no material is more demanding—and deserving—of the anthologist's hand than the literature of the American 1930s.

Marprelate and Hooker, Nashe and Harvey, Lyly and the host of sonneteers have little force in our most crucial definitions of the English 1590s. All that is background, absorbed in or overshadowed by far greater work. But in the American 1930s, background is foreground. The great works of the period—say, U.S.A., Grapes of Wrath, Studs Lonigan—seem oddly tangential to much that concerns us. They offer precious little insight into “proletarian literature,” Marxian literary arguments, or the excruciating problems of the ideologically committed writer. Much of that literature died of its own incompetence, most of those arguments of their own narrowness, and the problems, as formulated in that age, are not exactly relevant today. But something was alive then, something now newly troubling again, and we would understand it. Judicious collection in popular format of the prime and fugitive materials of that antique age in our literature is about the only way most of us will be able to approach that understanding.

The two anthologies at hand are welcome, not only because they dredge up a lot of old goodies which make it more difficult than ever to write off the 1930s as a literary wasteland but also because they provoke contrary speculations about what exactly did flourish back then, and why. A good anthology, like any other work of art, selects drastically and imposes its own meaning, as well as its special order on the matter. In their contents and in their editorial commentary, these two offer rather different views of the same decade in our literature. Salzman's is the more useful and the more faithful. Swados' is, in many ways, the more interesting, coherent and challenging.

Years of Protest is more useful, first of all, because it is more dense. In startlingly hectic and cheap-jack fashion, its fewer pages are crammed with almost twice as many selections as Swados' handsome and leisurely volume. Years of Protest is more useful also because of the variety of its contents. Salzman points out that his is “an historical anthology rather than a critical one,” and he has selected material largely according to its esteem and significance in the 1930s. Swados has limited his choice to what his sensibility and his opinions tell him remains relevant and appealing.

Thus, for instance, Years of Protest includes a good sampling of literary squabbles—Gold versus Wilder, Partisan Review versus New Masses, Farrell versus the “Stalinist” critics. The worst of such documents embalm pea-brained, old-fashioned urgencies, indeed. Swados dismisses the lot as “wearisome.” But the best (like those Salzman reprints) record a verve which suggests how deeply the arguments mattered. And perhaps it is not so much the issues of those literary debates that are dated as it is their style. Just now the community of letters is rocked again by events into reconsidering its coquettish relation to the community of men. We have our own language in which to discuss what Robert Lowell is doing in Washington and LeRoi Jones in Newark, but we should be able to translate the manifestoes and backbiting of literary politics in the thirties, and we must recognize behind the rhetoric of that age a predicament to respect. At the very least we cannot know the period without a taste of its notorious public literary arguments.

Similarly Swados' taste cramps our view when, for instance, he explains his exclusion of Mike Gold and Clifford Odets on the ground that their styles are beneath contempt. One need feel no love for either man to acknowledge the central importance of Jews Without Money and Waiting for Lefty in the literature of the decade. Swados observes that “Gold's Jews Without Money entered the language almost as Babbitt had.” Odets, he says, was one of the “younger ‘rebels,’ who were also taken seriously in their day. . . .” Years of Protest reprints a chapter of Gold's book, and Odets' play entire.

Salzman does not try to frame a coherent critical approach to the literature of the 1930s, but his controlling attitudes are obvious enough—for instance, in his chosen title. He is in essential sympathy with the radical political spirits of the time, and he suggests that the heart of this literature lies in its protest—against the men and institutions that made a national disaster out of greed, inertia and mendacity. He notes the differences within the Left and its real disasters, but his commentary is burdened with a minimum of refought squabbles and inherited sectarian bias.

Against the understanding that political enthusiasms garbled many a talent, he balances the understanding that precipitous and self-serving defection has not been pretty either. Commenting on a selection from Grace Lumpkin's strike novel, To Make My Bread (1932), he concludes:

In 1953, Miss Lumpkin testified to a congressional committee that the Communist propaganda in her early work was written under pressure. She has been described by Whittaker Chambers as “a devout woman whose days are filled with good works.”

And, characteristically, he reprints some of the “classics” of “proletarian” fiction which are notably lacking from Swados' collection—for instance, Albert Maltz's “The Happiest Man on Earth,” Ben Field's “Cow,” and Whittaker Chambers' “Can You Hear Their Voices?”

Swados' argument is much more conscientiously wrought. At its best, his long introduction has a humane and passionate tenor not really found in Salzman's introductory sketches. Swados sums up the very best he finds in the writers of the 1930s, the nature of their work and its relevance:

. . . They conceived the very act of creation as one of affirmation of the value of human life; and the relentlessness with which they pursued—wherever it was to take them—the truth not just about themselves but also about the American experience can very well serve as a model for the apprentice artists and the questing students of another day.

Swados collects works which express his sense of "the true radicalism of the depression . . . this radicalism, this humanity, this searching not for absurdity but for meaningfulness, not for individual dissolution but for the profoundest kind of comradeship . . ." and his collection adds up to an admirable record of man's humanity to man. The James Agee of Now Let Us Praise Famous Men is the exemplar of this radicalism, the hero of Swados' anthology.

Swados' literary radicalism is essentially anti-political. He is not so much interested in protest as in consciousness—un-class consciousness. He sees the depression writers turning to ask, not "Who am I?" but "Who are we?"—and he finds them discovering that "America was a unified land, that its problems were national problems, that its misery was national, that solutions and resolutions would have to be national."

Such a view of social disaster leaves much more room for sympathy and concern—humane consciousness—than for an organized politics of opposition and protest. Swados' view of political radicalism in the thirties wavers between condescension and contempt. He is understandably troubled by the ineluctable drift of the American literary community toward the policies and programs of alien "Stalinism." The large soul of his humanism gives way to tortured apologetics and crabby polemics. He extenuates and explains, tells how numberless writers witlessly lost their souls to the Party, and how others helped save the honor of American men of letters by their prescient disaffection and anti-communism. Going the American Legion and HUAC one better, he discovers that:

. . . of the crimes usually attributed by professional patriots to Communists there is one which neither [patriots nor Communists?] has as yet truly comprehended: the perversion and betrayal of the idealistic dreams of a generation of writers and intellectuals who had confided their aspirations to the keeping of a clique of second-rate politicians.

In his struggle with old bugaboos, Swados loses the distance and balance of good sense. At the depths of his contempt, moral sense eludes him as well. He ranges a decade and more out of his "hacks and has-beens" of the Hollywood Left:

In keeping with what their employers unctuously termed "the American Way," the blacklisted screenwriters were convicted and duly released from prison—to find not ostracism, but Oscars, not contempt but contracts. . . .

Duly released—all in good form. Not a word of outrage at the blacklist itself, not a note of concern for thousands of ruined careers, or the cop-out of a generation of "good Germans," quiet liberals who clung as doggedly to their jobs as the Hollywood Ten (whatever their talents) clung to their beliefs. Not a twit of understated displeasure at the unctuous Kazans and Dmytryks who co-operated. Also a dose of hyperbole about the subsequent commercial success of the blacklisted.

Anti-communism corrupts. It is especially sad to see it mess up such a humane intelligence, such an otherwise formidable sensibility as Swados'. I do not think we are going to get a really coherent understanding of the literary 1930s until a yet inchoate new generation of radicals sets to work, free equally of the compulsion to snicker at its heritage and the illusion of reincarnating it bodily. Certainly only the young and the radical can really grasp an age that was essentially young and radical—indeed, only they have any special need to. Salzman may or may not consider himself a radical (he is young), but he suggests the poise—equable, engaged and witty—which right critics will achieve. Perhaps we still have to wait for a time when the most vigorous and candid discussion of the old Left's incompetencies and bungles can be framed without seeming a caricature of meretricious red-baiting, a time when the real contributions of the old Left to the building of the nation and its literature can be warmly and frankly appreciated without sounding like special pleading.

These two new anthologies make the attempt at a wide understanding of the literary 1930s all the more possible. Neither usurps the other's claim to our attention, for few of their selections overlap, and the solid particularity of vision in Swados' collection (as opposed to his less temperate editorial views) must be reckoned with and respected. Nor does either of these anthologies wholly supersede Louis Filler's earlier one (The Anxious Years, Capricorn, 1964), which has many virtues and some nasty vices of its own.

Then there is the daddy of them all, Proletarian Literature in the United States (1935), edited by Granville Hicks and other prominent literary radicals, with a long introduction to the subject by Joseph Freeman. Wholly partisan in its way, and covering only half the decade (the "proletarian" half), this anthology offers a view of the literary 1930s which none other can duplicate: it speaks with all the authority of the inside, with the special voice of the men we now try to understand—perhaps ultimately no more wise than any other, but a voice to which we must also hark. The book is long out of print, and it should not be.

More Than Stone Can Bear

IN A TIME OF TORMENT. By I. F. Stone. With a preface by Murray Kempton. Random House. 436 pp. $7.95.

PATRICK MacFADDEN

Mr. MacFadden is a free-lance journalist.

In a Time of Torment gathers together some 100 essays, mostly reprinted from I. F. Stone's Weekly, one from The New Republic, ten from the New York Review of Books. They cover much of American political activity between the years 1961 and 1967. Hence the torment in the title.

A span of six years does not ordinarily lend itself to the long view. Yet this particular stretch deals with parts of two administrations at home, many more administrations and semi-administrations in Southeast Asia, and several invasions of one kind or another in various parts of the world. It has been an active time. In Mr. Stone's skillfully edited progress reports one may trace the peculiar elephantiasis contracted by the body politic (painful to beholder and sufferer alike), responsive neither to massive bloodlet-ting nor ritual exorcism. Altogether it has been, to borrow a title from one of Mr. Stone's pieces, "more than steel and chrome can bear."

Nor has language itself entirely escaped the inflationary epidemic. Mr. Stone records several examples: Theodore White on the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts—"designed to be the most fantastic monument of man's spirit since Athens"; Prof. Allan Nevins on Ngo Dinh Diem—"one of the true statesmen of the new Asia"; even President Johnson, again on Diem—"the Churchill of Asia." Sometimes the epithets appear to have wandered in from a kind of politicized Ripley Believe-It-Or-Not: President Kennedy on the Bay of Pigs—"a struggle of Cuban patriots against a Cuban dictator," Secretary McNamara informing a bemused Congressional committee that there were, in South Vietnam, three times as many Catholics as Buddhists. A scoop, Stone remarks, "comparable to the discovery that Ireland is largely populated by Protestants."

With such a scenario, writ larger than life, one can better understand current events, and even forecast future arrangements. Clearly, for example, domestic activities such as Presidential campaigns need no longer be confined to the restrictive boundaries of the Republic. And so it is proving to be. The known world henceforth may properly be thought a baseball diamond, of generous proportions, bases to be touched, however rudimentarily, in Canberra, Cambodia and Camranh Bay. Thus George Romney, breathless in Amman; thus too Richard Nixon, loose and running, among the startled burghers of Bonn. And humble among the Lords Temporal, even the Holy Father is summoned, to be photographed with the great ones of the earth and, on showing signs of becoming tiresome, summarily to be dismissed.

Murray Kempton's fulsome introductory tribute places Stone's historical imagination in high company: "Burke had it, Marx had it, and de Toqueville [sic] had it; today Walter Lippmann has it; Mr. Stone has an honorable place in just that small a company." However that may be, Kempton is surely right to recall to us the 18th century: consider Burke on the credibility gap of George III's administration:

They never had any kind of system, right or wrong; but only invented occasionally some miserable tale for the day, in order meanly to sneak out of difficulties into which they had proudly strutted. And they were put to all these shifts and devices, full of meanness and full of mischief, in order to pilfer piecemeal a repeal of an Act which they had not the generous courage, when they found and felt their error, honourably and fairly to disclaim.

The analogies are seductive: amiable corruption at home, limited warfare abroad, the Monarch's oft-stated feeling of being in thrall to a demanding Providence. On this reading, President Ho crosses the Delaware, the Soviet Union and China serve as the rebel-aiding France and Spain. It would be precipitate, even impolitic, to see an erstwhile anti-monarchic younger Pitt in Senator Kennedy but, mutatis mutandis, may we not observe in Mr. Humphrey some of the features of the hapless Lord North? There comes a point, of course, when the parallel is less useful: in those days, the Secretary of State was answerable for his excesses in the courts.

Despite the melancholy proceedings they record, Stone's essays are something of a triumph. Not their least virtue is the sturdy avoidance of that opaque language encountered in political journalism—fair deal, less fortunate, equality of opportunity, head start—figures apparently drawn from race track and gaming table, homo ludens, as it were, eternally in the saddle. But then Stone is not so much concerned with the techniques of social engineering as he is with the soul of the nation, the state of the collectivity. Living in peculiar times, he is forced to the thankless task of explaining the ways of man to God. "Acquiescence in sham," he writes, "is the price of membership in the nation's elite." And he is more interested in value than in price. That is to say, he is a deeply conservative man—significantly, many of his pieces are examinations of what conservatism might be—who looks to socialism as a means to conserve what has been morally best in the American experience. To the modern liberal's "does it work?" he opposes "will it do good?" His spiritual forerunner is that other great conservative, Tom Paine. The concern that holds his writings together, that gives shape and style to their characteristic angles and perspectives, is a moral concern, against which the art of politics, as currently practiced, is a confidence trick. It is for this preoccupation that we read him and are in his debt.

"A major, pioneer study of peacemaking following the conclusion of the First World War"*

"It was high time for a re-examination of the whole question of the Peace Settlement of Versailles . . . What we needed was a re-interpretation which took account of the new terms of reference. This task Arno Mayer has brilliantly achieved . . . This is an exemplary book . . . No one, so far as I know, has hitherto demonstrated in the same way the interplay between internal, or domestic, issues and foreign policy . . . This is the way contemporary history should be written." — GEOFFREY BARRACLOUGH, author of The Origins of Modern Germany and An Introduction to Contemporary History

* "Professor Mayer's book is a major, pioneer study of peacemaking following the conclusion of the First World War. Analyzing the problems of settlement . . . in terms of the domestic pressures to which all statesmen were exposed, the author highlights the tension between the conservative and progressive forces in each country . . . His book is based on intensive research in unpublished materials as well as in official and other records. The exhaustive bibliography is in itself a feature of great value." — WILLIAM L. LANGER, author of European Alliances and Alignments, 1871-1890 and The Diplomacy of Imperialism, 1890-1902

POLITICS AND DIPLOMACY OF PEACEMAKING

Containment and Counterrevolution at Versailles 1918-1919
by ARNO J. MAYER,

Professor of History, Princeton University
946 pages • $15 • now at better bookstores

ALFRED A. KNOFF

AAACAAACAAACAAACAAACAAACAAAC

LIBERATION

Dare We Call It Genocide?

Testimony from the

WAR CRIMES TRIBUNAL

The evidence from the war in Vietnam uncovered by the War Crimes Tribunal was suppressed by the Establishment press. Why? Read in Liberation the shocking testimony by three American veterans of Vietnam, an analysis by Dave Dellinger, a dissent from the Tribunal by Staughton Lynd and other documents.

INTRODUCTORY OFFER

With your one-year $5 subscription we will send you FREE our issue on The American Resistance with analysis of mobilization and resistance actions . . . strategies for the future.

LIBERATION

5 Beekman Street
New York, N.Y. 10038

Enclosed is my subscription to Liberation:

- ☐ 1 year $5.00
- ☐ 2 years 9.00
- ☐ 3 years 13.00

Please send the FREE issue on The American Resistance.

Name

Address

City

State Zip

Our double, 80-page War Crimes Tribunal issue ($1.50) is available at better newsstands. Liberation is distributed by Eastern News Distributors. (N)

Downhill for Socialism

THE DECLINE OF SOCIALISM IN AMERICA, 1912-1925. By James Weinstein. Monthly Review Press. 367 pp. $10.

WILLIAM C. PRATT

Mr. Pratt is a member of the History Department of Emory University in Atlanta.

Everyone knows that socialism is irrelevant in the land of the free and the home of the brave. We don't need foreign "isms" and never did. We have had a few Socialist cranks, but no one has ever listened to them. At least no one has listened very much to them since 1912, so say Daniel Bell, Ira Kipnis, David Shannon and others who have written about the Socialist Party in the United States. Kipnis even entitled his book, The American Socialist Movement, 1897-1912. All the existing accounts agree that after 1912, it was downhill all the way for the S.P.

James Weinstein, in his The Decline of Socialism in America, 1912-1925, however, demonstrates conclusively that instead of being destroyed by the World War I experience, as other accounts suggest, the party actually grew in strength in 1917 and 1918, and his substantial scholarship forces us to re-evaluate the S.P. in the 1912-19 era.

Up until now, the 1912 Presidential vote was always cited as "proving" that the S.P. vote reached its peak that year. Didn't Debs get 6 per cent of the vote? And didn't the S.P. vote fall off after that? Look at Benson's performance in 1916. Why, he got 400,000 fewer votes than Debs did four years before! Need any other proof? More than 1,200 Socialists were elected to public office in 1912. Since that figure was never again reached, 1912 must have been the peak year.

Weinstein traces S.P. voting strength from 1912 through 1920, and destroys the 1912 "peak" thesis. In many territories, the S.P. vote actually increased during that period. In 1912, twenty Socialists were elected to state legislatures; in 1914, thirty-three; in 1916, twenty-nine; and in 1918, when according to the earlier scholars the S.P. was falling apart, thirty-two Socialists were elected to such posts. Clearly, S.P. representation in state legislatures did not decrease after 1912. What did decrease, however, was the number of state legislatures in which the S.P. was represented.

No reader of The Decline of Socialism in America will ever again pass over the 1916 election as had been done previously. Benson, obviously not the strongest candidate, conducted a poor campaign and ran behind the S.P. ticket in almost every state, sometimes as much as 50 per cent! The S.P. performance in the 1916 election was not nearly as bad as Benson's vote might suggest. By focusing almost entirely upon the showing of the national ticket to the exclusion of local S.P. efforts, the earlier studies frequently obscure the nature of the American Socialist experience.

Morris Hillquit's strong showing in the 1917 New York mayoralty race should have indicated to previous historians that the S.P. had considerable drawing power even after the entry of the United States into the war. Instead, they have explained it away by labeling it merely the anti-war and civil libertarian vote. According to this view, Hillquit benefited from the anti-war vote and from the reaction of liberals to the repressive measures that Wilson had applied against the Left. Weinstein, however, points out that the winner of the election had not declared himself in favor of the war until after he was elected. Actually, he probably drew away much of the anti-war vote from Hillquit. Wouldn't a good number of us vote for Robert Kennedy over Julian Bond in the hope that a vote for Kennedy might get us out of Vietnam, while a vote for Bond probably would elect Nixon?

Although the S.P. weathered the war storm, and even seemed to grow in voting strength, the repression of the war years took its toll. Socialist newspapers were denied the service of the mails; Socialist leaders were indicted and convicted under the Espionage Act, and local patriots did the rest. Socialist activity everywhere was disrupted, but west of the Mississippi it was almost completely destroyed. Weinstein overestimates the optimism of the party leaders in 1919. The disintegration of the S.P. which he locates in the 1919-21 period probably began during the war. With the party split of 1919, and the subsequent formation of the Communist and Communist Labor Parties, the S.P. was fatally disrupted as a national organization. After 1919, American radicalism was "marked [by] the disintegration of the Socialist Party as a truly national organization and the dispersal of organized radical forces." Weinstein's treatment after 1920 focuses upon the Communist and farmer-labor movement, discussing the interaction of the various groups on the Left until the 1925 collapse.

Weinstein's painstaking research sets the record straight on the voting strength of the S.P. after 1912 and clearly demonstrates the relevance of socialism as a political force in our society. In a few areas, however, this work fails the reader. Weinstein simply neglects to tell us how the Socialists acted in public office. How did they run Schenectady and Milwaukee? What did Socialists do in state legislatures? The effectiveness of individual Socialists in public office undoubtedly played an important role in their eventual success or failure, yet this aspect of S.P. history Weinstein ignores.

Weinstein, stressing the internal factors for the S.P.'s decline, de-emphasizes the consequences of the wartime repression and the subsequent Red scare of 1919-20. One might argue that had not American democracy failed at certain crucial points, we might still have an effective Left. Had the mails really gone through during the war, and the Bill of Rights actually been maintained throughout the 1917-20 period, perhaps the story of American socialism would be different. Certainly, as Weinstein points out, the left wing of the S.P. completely misread American conditions in 1919. But wasn't it aided and abetted in this misreading by the climate of repression that then prevailed in our society? Didn't Wilson and the Legionnaires help persuade it that socialism could not come about through the democratic process?

Weinstein seems to say that the conditions necessary for a revolution cannot be created simply by hoping for them. After World War I, the Russian Revolution could not be imported into the United States. The absolute failure of the left wing of the S.P. was a result of its refusal to study American conditions. Had the left wing not subordinated itself to foreign direction and example, and abandoned the democratic process, socialism would have had a better chance for success.

What Weinstein does not say, but his research suggests is: given the example of the successful Russian Revolution and the repressive atmosphere of 1917-20, it is understandable that many young committed radicals came to the conclusion that democracy did not work and that violent revolution was the only way in which socialism could be established.

ARCHITECTURE/ ERVIN GALANTAY

Ours is not the first civilization to be obsessed by road building; the Roman and Inca empires come immediately to mind. But their highways were simply connections between cities; by contrast, the amazing 41,000-mile U.S. Interstate Highway System is a self-contained network, along which cities may or may not be "plugged in." Expressways superimpose a new, geographic form and the curvilinear geometry of speed on the familiar grid pattern of cities. Their scale is commensurate with the vast spread of the modern metropolis, and where there are no strong topographic features, expressways could contribute an orientation and visual order. Instead, alas, they often compound existing confusion by bisecting established neighborhoods, crisscrossing capriciously and displaying other forms of design misdemeanor. In the process some cities became as entangled as Laocoön in the creeping growth of expressways.

Searching for the shortest and cheapest route, highway engineers often let their concrete pythons loose on parks and historic areas, and have become an apocalyptic menace to the habitat of minority groups and other low-income families. Such vandalism may be minimized in the future, since Section 138 of the new Federal Highway Law calls for "maximum effort to preserve parklands and historic areas" and requires that alternate routings be studied to avoid damage to the "beauty and historic value" of sites. Also, the Federal Bureau of Public Roads, long a citadel of bulldozer-minded engineers, has been quietly absorbed by the newly created Department of Transportation, which is not only more sensitive to criticism of its programs but seems eager to have urban expressways used as the sinews of community renewal. Sensing the new wind from Washington, several cities are shaping their renewal programs around highway projects, among them Baltimore, Chicago and Seattle. The most imaginative and ambitious scheme so far is New York's "Linear City," first proposed by Mayor Lindsay in February, 1967, as a "dramatic new concept" aimed to derive maximal environmental improvements from the building of the Cross-Brooklyn Expressway. This segment of the Interstate System is regarded as a public facility creating the occasion and opportunity for urban development and as a device for obtaining federal highway funds to initiate overall community renewal.

An action plan for the full development of Linear City, prepared by the Baltimore firm of architects and planners, Rogers, Taliaferro, Kostritsky and Lamb, is now awaiting final approval by the New York City Planning Commission. The Baltimore firm was selected because it fathered the idea of the "Urban Concept Team," which Secretary of Transportation Alan T. Boyd has praised as the most promising innovation to deal

23 years after the "end of the world"

This is one of the important social and psychological studies of our time, comparable in its impact and human interest to Oscar Lewis's La Vida. Dr. Robert J. Lifton, a Yale University psychiatrist, reveals the enormous effect of the Bomb on the city of Hiroshima and on its individual survivors—who speak of their lingering memories, their persistent struggles, their guilt at being alive. Dr. Lifton extends his analysis to include comparisons of A-bomb and concentration camp survivorship, leading finally to the development of a significant theory of the psychology of survivorship.

$10, now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE

with the problems of modern expressways. RTK&L achieved eminence in the profession by setting out to redefine the role of the architect in society. Rogers asserts that the responsibility of the modern architect goes "far beyond three-dimensional problem solving" and amounts to a commitment to improve the quality of urban life itself.

He first proposed applying the Concept Team idea to the design of urban expressways in Baltimore, arguing that the problems created by urban expressways are far too complex to be left to the engineers, and that a "multi-disciplinary group," headed by an urban designer, should be put in charge. This proposal infuriated many engineers entrenched in the Maryland Roads Commission, the Baltimore Highway Department and the Federal Bureau of Public Roads who fought the proposal as a threat to their professional status.

Nevertheless, Maryland Gov. Spiro T. Agnew turned to the idea when Baltimore's urban highway program came to a standstill amidst heated controversy about its threat to parks and residence areas. To avoid squabbles among local professionals, the Governor appointed San Francisco architect Nathaniel Owings to head the "Concept Team." Owings enjoys the enthusiastic support of newly elected Mayor d'Alessandro, but since his team is not empowered to change the proposed expressway corridors, its recommendations can only mitigate disruptive effects by deciding such questions as what should be built along or above it, and whether it should be placed in a cut or on stilts.

Ideally, a "concept team" should choose the optimal routing for an expressway on the basis of a cost-benefit analysis that would weigh psychological, aesthetic, historical and social factors against the engineers' pet criteria of minimal land cost, ease of construction, speed and safety. In spite of the limitations placed on the Owings team, the new approach stirred national interest when Secretary Boyd publicly endorsed the "Baltimore Concept" in his Boston address to the National League of Cities on July 31, 1967. At that time, Donald T. Elliott, chairman of the New York City Planning Commission, became aware of the possibilities of mating the Concept Team idea with the Linear City proposal and turned to RTK&L for consultants. It is rumored that Mayor Lindsay has applied for a $10 million grant from federal highway funds for a more detailed feasibility study.

The routing of the Cross-Brooklyn expressway along the right-of-way of the Bay Ridge line of the Long Island Railroad was approved in 1966. The new expressway will connect the approaches of the Verazzano-Narrows bridge with expressways serving Kennedy Airport and Long Island. A branch will link the Cross-Brooklyn Expressway to the Triborough Bridge, bringing the total length of proposed new highway to 24.5 miles.

Linear City will stretch along and above the expressway in an arc of about 5 miles, originating in the area of Brooklyn College and ending for the time being at a point north of Linden Boulevard where a new community college will provide a temporary anchor for the development. The railroad beneath the expressway and Linear City will operate during the construction and may in the future provide shuttle service to connect segments of Linear City. Above the expressways there will be ample areas for parking, and the roof of this parking level will provide the main platform on which will stand buildings of varying height and configurations, with a sequence of pleasant pedestrian spaces between them.

Unlike the single-standing towers of the Port Authority that straddle the Manhattan approaches to the George Washington bridge, the buildings of Linear City will be subordinated to an overall structural concept and planned to adjust to changing requirements of the future. The continuous form promises to reintegrate the city's manifold activities, a departure from pedantic zoning practice and the creation of neatly buffered islands for a single use or activity. At points, Linear City will be no wider than the railroad right-of-way; at others, its extensions will deeply penetrate adjacent areas: a Gulliver securely tied to the Lilliputian pattern of row houses in residential blocks.

The most important component of Linear City will be its system of educational facilities, which will provide a full range of services from preschool to adult education for the five mid-Brooklyn communities of Brownsville, Canarsie, Midwood-Flatlands, Flatbush and East New York. This solution derives from the complaints by Negro parents in Brownsville that the seven schools originally planned for that area would be "de facto" segregated. They had suggested instead an "educational park," drawing pupils from all sections of central Brooklyn. Opponents of the educational park deplore the impersonality of such large, centralized institutions, and point to the disadvantage of divorcing the schools from their neighborhoods where they can double as social centers in the evenings.

The proposal that has been made to locate a string of schools in Linear City combines some advantages of the neighborhood school with those of an educational park. The educational ideas were developed by Cyril G. Sargent, a professor at City College, who is a consultant to the Planning Commission. His system would include "primary centers" for preschool children, "special-interest centers" and "home center" equipped with clinics, libraries and recreational facilities. Oldtimers in the Board of Education reportedly detest Sargent's ideas, but in August, 1967, Dr. James E. Allen, Jr., the State Commissioner for Education, directed the city to proceed with the construction of the schools in Linear City and to have them ready for occupancy

NEW #2 AMERICAN REVIEW

The strong new voice of American writing — original fiction, essays, poetry with a contemporary focus.

Signet paperback, only 95¢
wherever books are sold.

YOU have a conscience!

READ THE BOOK THAT HAS OPENED AMERICA'S MOST HEATED CASE invitation to an inquest by Walter and Miriam Schneir

Delta Paperbacks $2.45
Doubleday $5.95

Both available at bookshops or from the Sobell Committee

"No longer can ignore the possibility the Rosenbergs and Sobell were victims of a frame-up" —Cleveland Plain Dealer

"It is unlikely the Rosenbergs and Sobell were guilty" —Washington Star

"Devastating" —Harvard Times

"Disquieting" —Newsweek

Efforts are under way to have an Ombudsman appointed to review the evidence of prosecution forgery and perjury in the case of Morton
Sobell. Write for more information.

Committee to Free Morton Sobell
150 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10011

Send me "Invitation to an Inquest":

..... copies, paperback @ $2.45

..... copies, hardbound @ $5.95

Enclosed is payment of $

(please print)
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

A Highly Effective and Individualized New Method for Identifying the Right Colleges for Each Student

COLLEGES AT YOUR FINGERTIPS has been widely praised and adopted because it makes available a completely new method of college selection—one that eliminates the drudgery and guesswork—that brings data processing techniques on a personal, flexible level to the complex job of college selection.

It is now possible to isolate in minutes, without plowing through thousands of pages of raw college information, all those colleges—and only those colleges—which best meet the student's goals and to which he has a reasonable chance of admission. And all this is accomplished in a stunningly designed package, beautifully printed on six different colors of card stock in an instantly visible, easy-to-use format, that is—

- So logically designed that it organizes according to the student's goals the basic information on virtually every accredited four-year college and university in the U.S.;
- So flexible that it makes possible personalized college choice tailored to each individual's needs and goals;
- So up-to-date that it gives you immediate access to the latest information for every college as of the current school year;
- So low in cost that it provides the basis for a complete high school counseling program—and is readily available to every family.

Colleges At Your Fingertips

1968
EDITION

BY ELLA MAZEL

It is small wonder, therefore, that COLLEGES AT YOUR FINGERTIPS is being used in high schools from New Hampshire to Honolulu, and hailed, in the words of one educator, as "A major contribution toward reducing the confusion involved in college selection . . . makes possible, clear, personalized interpretation tailored to an individual." (Dr. John Henry Martin, formerly, Supt. of Schools, Mount Vernon, N.Y.)

Of course, there are no cut and dried formulas, nor "one perfect college choice." But the beauty of the CAYF system is that it enables the student to define his own goals and preferences through the remarkably informative 16-page Student's Handbook that outlines 10 basic decisions that determine the type of college sought. These decisions cover (1) SAT or ACT scores; (2) cost; (3) location; (4) co-ed, men, women; (5) liberal arts or specialized career; (6) size of school; (7) size and type of community; (8) religious orientation; (9) fraternities and sororities; (10) ROTC and sports. Then, in a matter of minutes, the student can locate in the Master Guide all those colleges which match his or her capacities and desires.

Now See "Colleges at Your Fingertips" without Risk

COLLEGES AT YOUR FINGERTIPS has already proved of tremendous value to college-bound high school students and to high school Guidance Departments.

You are invited to send for a free examination copy now. Use this remarkable tool yourself—see how much drudgery it spares you—how it quickly eliminates unrealistic choices—how it broadens your horizons by bringing to your attention colleges you would otherwise overlook. The complete CAYF Master Guide, with Student's Handbook and College Selector form, costs only $17.50. But you are free to try it out and then return it for full refund or credit if you do not agree this is the most extraordinary college selection tool you have even seen.

COLLEGES AT YOUR FINGERTIPS

1889 Palmer Avenue, Larchmont, N.Y. 10538

Send me ——— COLLEGES AT YOUR FINGERTIPS, including Master Guide, Student's Handbook and College Selector. I am free to use it for two full weeks and then return the Master Guide without obligation, or else keep it and remit only $17.50 per copy, plus shipping charges, in full payment.

☐ Send bill. ☐ SAVE: I enclose payment. You pay shipping costs. Same refund guarantee.

Name _____

Institution (if any) _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

☐ SCHOOL COUNSELORS: Check here to receive a complete CAYF Kit, including one Master Guide, 20 Student's Handbooks and 50 College Selectors (only $19.95 net). Try it with your college-bound juniors—you can return just the Master Guide without obligation if you and your students are not completely enthusiastic.

no later than 1972. This would seem to imply a timetable for Linear City itself.

The entire project calls for an investment of $1,300 million over a period of five to seven years. Of this, $966 million will be siphoned from various public sources; $322 million is expected from the private sector. Since the expressway component qualifies for the interstate program, 90 per cent of its cost will be provided by the federal government; $350 million or 27 per cent of the total financing is assured from this source alone. Linear City itself requires an investment of $900 million. In return, the city will gain school places for some 18,000 pupils, 10 million square feet of offices, retail and manufacturing space, and housing for 20,000 people. At first glance, one is struck by the high cost of the platform structure in contrast to the gain of 6,000 dwelling units of which a mere 2,000 are now designated as publicly aided housing for low-income groups. In the present urban crisis, a public undertaking of this scope should include a much higher percentage of housing for the disadvantaged. However, the proposal has various hidden economies and long-term benefits: the use of the railroad right-of-way minimizes the relocation problem, and the new housing will serve tenants at all levels of income and thus advance socio-economic integration.

The program envisages the creation of new employment opportunities and there is enthusiastic talk among the planners of moving a segment of the garment industry from Manhattan to Linear City, bringing the workshops into the home borough of most of the workers. The land cost of the development can be figured as the cost of the platform above the parking level, and the leasing of the air rights from the railroad. Including its movement systems and utilities, the platform structure of Linear City will cost up to $430 million or 33 per cent of the total investment. Yet in combination with the relatively low cost of the air rights, the total may not be excessive when measured against the expense of conventional land acquisition and clearance, and the delays due to relocation of the residents of a built-up area of similar size.

Linear City offers multiple use of land that would otherwise be assigned exclusively to the expressway. Many of the new structures will contribute directly to the city's tax base, while the schools and other tax-exempt institutions concentrated along the 5-mile strip will pay their way since, if they were placed elsewhere, they would reduce the acreage of the borough presently in taxable use. Further, the probable effect of these vast public improvements will be to enhance land values in adjacent areas, thus eventually raising the tax total. To these economic gains one should add some hard-to-calculate aesthetic and psychological benefits: instead of yet another physical barrier, Linear City will provide a humanly alive organizational spine, a unifying element that will bring a sense of excitement and adventure to the dreary borough—something for Brooklynites to boast about.

Every year almost $1.5 billion are invested in construction in New York City. Of this, the municipality accounts for $420 million, 28 per cent of the total. In 1966, "The Mayor's Task Force" pointed to these figures and asserted that the city could upgrade the quality of the urban environment simply by setting an example of bold thinking and good design in its own undertakings. Mayor Lindsay has clearly responded to this challenge and—moving from vest-pocket improvements to the grand experiment of Linear City—set out to regain for New York its long-lost leadership in urban innovation. This is no trivial goal: as Rogers puts it, "innovation per se is an objective that is self-validating in the light of the failure of the existing social and physical institutions to adjust to the volcanic forces rocking our society." Linear City provides an opening for this sort of adjustment, and if built will put to test ideas ranging from design to urban psychology. In this focus, the high design costs of this prototypical environment can more readily be justified; they will benefit future projects of similar scope across the country. In its scale and in its novel use of a transportation facility as the backbone of overall urban improvement, Linear City is the most exciting scheme that has been put forward in New York since William Wilgus proposed the development of Park Avenue in connection with the building of Grand Central Terminal. Luckily for us, Wilgus' contemporaries had the good sense and determination to turn the Grand Central-Park Avenue idea into reality. Perhaps our society will again respond to opportunity and bequeath Linear City to future New Yorkers.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

My past week of theatregoing has been a wandering among small things. But small things may also be good, and from poor things one must learn to pick out the plums. Otherwise how could a steady regimen of entertainment remain tolerable?

Your Own Thing (Orpheum Theatre) is "a new rock musical suggested by Twelfth Night" with book by Donald Driver, music and lyrics by Hal Hester and Danny Apolinar. It is clever kid stuff. Like all programmatic nonconformity, one specimen of "rock," unless it be first rate, is usually indistinguishable from another. It becomes a paradigm of conformity.

Still, Donald Driver's direction—especially in the dance bits—has a promising degree of invention. Robert Guerra's setting is neat, and Michael Lunstead's slides and what they "say" are groovy. The text picks up the bisexual implications of Shakespeare's play: the hero thinks he has turned queer because he has fallen in love with the transvestite girl twin and tries to justify it to himself: and this kills the audience at 126 Second Avenue.

The "leads"—Leland Palmer and Rusty Thacker—display plenty of energy, and one laughs at an occasional line. The evening is mercifully brief and a good time may be had by all who care to attend the party. With a few martinis under one's belt one may also rejoice at being "in." Harmless.

I always enjoy seeing a "bill" at the New York City Ballet. It stimulates me to return: every fine ballet company

Paramount Pictures Presents

DIRK BOGARDE

SUSANNAH YORK

in SEBASTIAN

Technicolor® A Paramount Picture SMA

NEW EMBASSY 46th St.
Broadway at 46 St. - PL 7 2408

GUILD 50th
33 W 50 St. at Rockefeller Plaza
PL 7 405, 7

68th St. PLAYHOUSE
3rd Avenue at 68th St. - RE 4 0302

10, 11, 50, 1:50, 3:50,
5:40, 7:30, 9:30, 11:20

11, 12:50, 2:40, 4:40,
6:30, 8:20, 10:20

1, 2:50, 4:40, 6:30,
8:20, 10:10

does. Ballet is the best theatre in town. Balanchine's "Japanese" number Bugaku—some of it strikes me as exquisitely Hindu—has an insidiously fragile attractiveness what with David Hays's ascetically pretty set, Karinska's ineffably delicate and smiling costumes and the asymmetrical eroticism of the choreography by way of Suzanne Farrell's long-legged knowledgeable ability.

I find it difficult—as everyone should—to "judge," that is, to declare an opinion of a new ballet at a first view. One doesn't altogether grasp the design of the unfamiliar choreography or hear the surprising (if novel) score. But even without "seizing" either aspect of Balanchine's latest two-part piece of strange title Metastaseis and Pithoprakta (music by Xenakis), I was sufficiently taken with it to wish to see it again. One doesn't have to know immediately what one thinks of them or what they mean; they have a fascinating look and sound. Judgment, if at all necessary, should come later. The enigma is a pleasure. What amiable frauds some of our dance sages are!

I was amused by those at the opening performance of this ballet who hissed because either they didn't "get" it or because they failed to be ravished on the spot, as they expect to be when that dear devil Balanchine goes to work. I was also bemused by those whose decided opinions were instantly available as if the purpose of art were to furnish an exercise for their insight. The new ballet is a graph of "life" as it impresses a contemporary sensibility, but who can quickly decipher its exact nature or give it a name?

Seeing Jerome Robbins' The Cage for the third time—it is a ballet one can readily comprehend, and that may be what is wrong with it—I appreciated the subtle excitement of Stravinsky's String Concerto in D, probably neo-classic if you need a category, but all Stravinsky and irreducibly modern in its tension. Patricia McBride danced in place of the indisposed Melissa Hayden. Miss McBride doesn't "horrify" as the lady spider is supposed to do; she enchants. What a treat it would be, one feels, to be destroyed by her!

As for John Taras' new entry Haydn Concerto, I liked the scenery and costumes of Raoul Pène duBois very much: so serene and gracefully gay. As for the rest it didn't disturb me; I could take it or leave it. As someone much more expert than I in these matters remarked, "The Greek pieces are avant-garde, the Haydn is derrière-garde."

Israel Horowitz's The Indian Wants the Bronx, a one-act play preceded by another, It's Called the Sugar Plum, from the same author, merits a visit (Astor Place Theatre, 434 Lafayette Street). The two plays are ably directed by James Hammerstein and very well acted by Al Pacino and Matthew Cowles in the first named and by John Pleshette, nicely paired with Marsha Mason, in the second.

These plays have the ring of authenticity. It's Called the Sugar Plum begins well, goes on a bit too long in respect to its aim and tries to cover too much ground: a youthful fault. But it is a humorous and kindly observation of the grubby and foolish sexuality characteristic of the hip young, nurtured on a sophistication derived from total ignorance and which expresses itself in the verbiage of pop psychoanalysis. The general effect is of a penny-whistle idyll.

The Indian Wants the Bronx is sterner stuff. It is funny and terrifying. Two young fellows harass and mortify an innocent Hindu (they think at first that he might be a "Turk") while he waits for a bus on a deserted city street at night. (Why, one wonders, doesn't he run away?) The boys' malevolence is "play": a consequence of their idleness in an environment empty of any fulfilling contact or purpose. They are not evil: they are stinging bugs produced by the dry rot in the wide fringes of the social structure. They produce shivers because their menace and violence are part of the greater beastliness inherent in our society, which, because it does not inspire creative action based on humane thought and energy, turns to wanton and senseless destructiveness.

The actors in this play brilliantly reveal the incipient ferocity born of moral isolation that can be observed in persons who still possess some of the charming folly of untrammelled youth. In the opening play it is innocence coupled with schooled dumbness that the actor conveys with apt ease.

Horowitz's writing of The Indian Wants the Bronx demonstrates a perfect ear for the speech of his two punks. He is not slumming: he has made himself part of their spirit. But like other playwrights of his generation (those between 21 and 30), he should not dwell too long or too lovingly within that sphere; it is narrow and shallow for lack of a more complete understanding of the world outside it. That world may be equally ferocious, but it is nevertheless the world, and all of it must be explored to make art splendid and life worth the strife.

There are several ways in which one may regard Robert Anderson's I Never Sang For My Father (Longacre Theatre). One might say that it is another father-and-son play of which there are recent examples (O'Neill, Arthur Miller) more ambitious and extended in connotation. Or one might judge it without comparison on its own unpretentious scale. I prefer to do the latter.

It is a play of decent sentiment. I was not deeply affected by it but I was affected, and many people will be much more so, if they are not primarily concerned with significant statements. The play's effect is salutary because, while it is not marked by the original articulation of an experience, it does represent an experience, a sincere setting down of what the author has lived through. That is always to be respected; it always touches off some intimate emotion in the spectator. It is not that he recognizes the equivalent personal situation in his own family but that he is reminded of the drama which in one way or another always exists between sons and fathers, be it one of love, of mutual resistance, of love's absence, or of a feeling akin to hatred. Something which has stirred the author awakens shadowy recollection of things which have stirred us. Whatever one thinks of Anderson's play as theatre or as writing, it was written because of something actually felt by him and I always find this honorable.

It is well cast and simply staged by

WRITERS

N. Y. publisher wants books on all subjects, fiction, nonfiction. No fee for professional opinion. FREE: Brochures that show how your work can be published, publicized, sold; etc. tracts. Write Dept. 147B

EXPOSITION PRESS INC.
386 Park Ave. So., New York, N. Y. 10018

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

2-12-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

ART

ORIGINAL PRINTS and the unique printmaking Annual, Artist's Proof. Available by membership in the non-profit Pratt Center. 11 Broadway, New York City 10003.

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 11 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

MUSIC

HERMAN SCHWARTZMAN
Pianist - Teacher - Lecturer

Announces Master Classes —
Piano and Two-Piano Literature.
Former students invited.

Call Mornings or Evenings
914 YO 3-4582

TRAVEL

CULTURAL SUMMER TOURS in depth to socialist countries. For professionals, students, artists, writers. Write American Dialogue Magazine, 32 Union Sq., N.Y.C. 10003

PERSONALS

"McCarthy in '68", "Reagan & Lassie in '68", "Dump Johnson in '68", "LBJ for Ex-President", "RFK in '68", "The Governor of Alabama is a Mother", "Draft Beer, Not Students", "Kill for Peace", "Stop the War", "Ban Napalm", "Give LBJ the Bird", "Make Love Not War", "Studying Causes Cancer", "Legalize Pot", "Incest Begins at Home", "Chaste Makes Waste", "Hands Off Tim Leary", "Make War on Poverty, Not People", "Sex Before Finals", "Apple Pie Makes you Sterile", "Melt General Hershey". King-Size bumperstrips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-N, Chicago, Ill. 60690

NO MORE WOODEN NICKLES

HOFFA FOR PRESIDENT also Impeach Johnson on 1 1/2" discs and 6" rulers, 12/$1-100/$5 —circulars 50/$1; stickers, balloons 3c; Key Tag 25c. Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25c to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. Box 18214, San Francisco 93118.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

"LBJ DARTBOARD GAME." A giant 14" solid cobra construction dartboard with LBJ's face as the target (or Reagan, Bobby Kennedy, Sigmund Freud, Nixon, Nasser, Wallace and DeGaulle) is yours for only $3.95 postpaid. Three precision brass darts imported from England are included for your bull's eye accuracy. Send check or money order to: TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-V, Chicago, Illinois 60690

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE
Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. M, 11 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

I WILL APPRECIATE hearing from anyone who knew Agnes Smedley. Tillie Olsen, 1435 Laguna, San Francisco, Calif. 94115

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Alan Schneider, though I wished the scenic simplifications employed were somewhat more interesting or agreeable to look at. Hal Holbrook, who unfortunately has to narrate or comment on some of the play's background, does so with relaxed directness and dignity. Later he rises to the parental climactic confrontation with a fine emotional honesty.

As the father, a recognizably irritating personality who nevertheless rarely becomes as dreadfully impossible as one might expect, Alan Webb is excellent in the economy and the intelligence of his performance, sufficiently "dry" to avoid both bathos or caricature.

TELEVISION JOHN HORN

That Edward R. Murrow who died three years ago was a man ahead of his time is demonstrated by the following excerpt from a lecture delivered at the Guildhall, London, in October, 1959, under the auspices of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and Granada TV Network. Nine years later, Mr. Murrow's remarks are especially timely for Americans in their year of major political decision.

In a free society, politics essentially involves the resolution of conflict. It is part of television's duty to define, illuminate and illustrate the nature of the conflict—to supply the voter with the raw material upon which informed opinion may be based.

Thucydides said: "We both alike knew that into the discussion of human affairs the question of justice arises only where the pressure of necessity is equal; that the strong take what they can, and the weak grant what they must."

The true function of television in politics is to operate a market place in which ideas may compete on an equal footing.

It is true that the voter may elect to purchase the second-rate, shopworn or shoddy idea. He may mistake a mobile countenance for an agile mind. He may vote for profile rather than for principle. An unruly lock of hair may be more effective than a disciplined mind.

There is no way to guarantee that television will prevent the voter from being as wrong as he has been so often in the past.

Television offers no guarantee that demagogues can be kept from political power. It merely provides them with wider and more intimate, more immediate circulation.

I would suggest that the evidence so far indicates that television can retard or accelerate a trend in public opinion, but it cannot reverse it. The hope so fondly held by enthusiasts a few years ago, the hope that television would make certain that the voter would sort out the phony from the statesman, is not proved.

I would doubt that under today's systems of communication a Lincoln or a Jefferson could be nominated or elected.

According to all reports, Jefferson had a most abrasive voice, and did not suffer fools gladly. While being interviewed on some panel program he might have told a particularly obnoxious questioner just what he thought of him, and that, of course, would have been fatal.

Mr. Lincoln did not move gracefully, was not a handsome man, had a wife who was no political asset, and he was a solitary man. In our present society he probably would have been examined at an early age by a psychiatrist, received an unfavorable report, have been told his attitude toward "togetherness" was altogether wrong, and advised to enter a trade school if he could gain admittance.

On the other hand, it is conceivable that Woodrow Wilson might have won his fight for the League of Nations, and thereby changed world history, had he been able to use the tools of television and radio. He was a rather pedantic persuader, and these instruments wouldn't have changed him, but they would have given his ideas wider circulation; and the efforts of those who attempted to distort those ideas might have had less success. It is part of television's brief history that circulation is directly related to controversy.

But it is well to bear in mind that no large section of the public demands more information or a better presentation of it. Public affairs is a form of specialization. It is not recreation. The public as such does not feel the call to specialize, even in its own good. On the whole it is unenterprising—it wants its fun. By the time most people turn on the television set the work of the day is over. There is a welcome break in drudgery. Most people, after working hours, prefer to be called away from reality, not made to face it. There is a limit upon the attention the public is willing to devote to politics. This would be true even if television fulfilled its functions to the utmost.

Television by itself does not usher in the democratic millennium, and its inability to do so is not its own peculiar failure. It is due to the unwillingness of men and women, even in the highly developed democracies of Britain and the United States, to take more trouble to govern themselves better.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1236

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Re-doubled such effort, and a problem would be associated with witches. (4,3,7)
- 9 Such a society is obviously for the birds. (7)
- 10 Does it have more ply than other compounds? (7)
- 11 Sounds like two letters might be too much! (6)
- 12 The others don't move, but it might be on the bus schedule. (4,4)
- 14 Secures fibers of wool, for example. (7)
- 15 Sponge. (5)
- 17 The battle of a specified amount in an undetermined number. (5)
- 19 One of these could be smoother, though they might spread easily. (7)
- 21 . . . at least if it's warm! (We helped Berlin with one of them.) (3,5)
- 23 A good score to secure in plasterwork.
- 25 and 8 down Do a little smooching, and cut it short! (More than one has fallen this way.) (4,3,4)
- 26 With a lot of sharp points, like a bone in the vertebrae? (7)
- 27 Backward writing for some? It has a peculiar twist. (7,7)

DOWN:

- 1 Makes an attempt when about 80 or so in some plays. (9)
- 2 Persuades one to look for Mussolini-like qualities so? (7)

- 3 A cub's made slightly upset by such an unexpected attack. (9)
- 4 and 22 down A dull color's silly for the castle! (9)
- 5 The pre-senior's rejection of painful memories, in a way. (10)
- 6 No match for such things, or just an application of it? (5)
- 7 Your British company is probably kept to a minimum. (7)
- 8 See 25 across
- 13 Such saws are no longer sharp. (10)
- 15 Making about a thousand, or doing what they did to Sam McGee? (9)
- 16 The day Mr. Fogg got back? (9)
- 18 Naturally it shouldn't happen! (7)
- 20 Conventional indication, alternatively one for "Two Gentlemen of Verona," for example. (7)
- 21 A relative of the tuna. (4)
- 22 See 4 down
- 24 Man? Wight, too. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1235

ACROSS: 1 Toulouse-Lautrec; 9 Rorqual; 10 Columbia; 11 Eleven; 12 Adjutant; 14 Obsecrates; 15 Hear; 17 Each; 19 Peroration; 22 Reaching; 23 Pavlov; 25 Accents; 26 Stirrer; 27 Yellowstone Lake. DOWN: 1 Three to get ready; 2 Unreels; 3 Opulence; 5 Lacedaemon; 6 Umlaut; 7 and 4 Rum-mage sale; 8 Chapter and verse; 13 Mare's-nests; 16 Paradise; 18 Chancel; 20 Illyria; 21 Shinto; 24 Oslo.

PUBLICATIONS

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____ Zip _____

★ BOOKS FROM HANOI ★

in English

— HO-CHI-MINH'S PRISON DIARY .75

— BIOGRAPHY OF HO-CHI-MINH .50

— HO-CHI-MINH: AGAINST U.S. AGGRESSION .50

— GEN. VO NGUYEN GIAP: ONCE AGAIN WE WILL WIN .50

— INITIAL FAILURE OF U.S. "LIMITED WAR" .50

— U.S. BIGGEST OPERATION FOILED .25

— ON SOCIALIST REVOLUTION IN VIET NAM, 2 vols. 1.50

★ VIETNAMESE STUDIES: ★

— SOUTH VIETNAM 1.00

— VIETNAMESE WOMEN 1.00

— FAILURE OF "SPECIAL WAR" 1.00

— FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEMS 1.00

★ SUBSCRIPTIONS ★

— VIETNAM COURIER, 26 weeks 5.00

— VIETNAM (Illustr.), 12 months 5.00

★ Indicate quantity desired on left of title ■ send payment with order to ★

★ CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS ★

U.S. Gov't. Licensed Importer & Distributor

2929-24th St. San Francisco 94110

(In California, add 5% sales tax on books) N

★ FREE CATALOGUE ON REQUEST ★

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

CHINA NORTH VIETNAM LIBERATED SOUTH VIETNAM and LAOS

Books, magazines, records, cards, etc. Send 25c for lists.

NEW ERA BOOKS
Paragon, Bath, Somerset, U.K.

DEBATE THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE—pros and cons on the deployment of the ABM; 11 articles prepared by military and political experts. Pp. 169. Paper, $1.50; Hardbound, $5. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 5201 Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois 60615

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most ■■ citing American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

EL GRITO—JOURNAL OF CONTEMPORARY MEXICAN-AMERICAN THOUGHT. Quarterly. Articles, short stories, satire, poetry, art, history. Limited supply of first issue remains. $4.00 year. $1.00 sample copy. Quinto Sol Publications, P.O. Box 9275, Berkeley, California

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242.8400

We'll send you this new book FREE if you become a NATION subscriber

"There are charitable ways of describing Lyndon Johnson"; writes Jules Feiffer in the introduction to LBJ LAMPOONED: "They will not be found in this volume."

LBJ simply is not our picture of the Happy Warrior. Somehow we don't think he's yours either.

And there's much to be learned from cartoonists' insights into what goes into the making of this particular President.

We'd like to share the book with you and we'd like you as a regular NATION reader.

In fact we need creative readers to do our job (we've been at it 102 years) of contributing to sane discourse on and sound insights into American life. A job we've never taken more to heart than we do in this Presidential election year.

FREE with each NEW subscription

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

I'll join the good fight. I enclose $10 to subscribe to THE NATION for 12 months (48 issues). I understand you'll send me LBJ Lampooned free with this new subscription.

Name

Street

City State Zip

NA 2-12

The good fight is now in

THE NATION

—why not join now?

SAIGON FROM A ROOFTOP THOMAS W. PEW, Jr.

THE

NATION

BURLINGAME

FEB 19 1968

LIBRARY

FEBRUARY 19, 1968 35 cents

WAITING FOR ROCKY

Trials of a Non-Candidate

JAMES DESMOND

The Rockefeller Decade

JEROME L. WILSON

declares War

Epidemic of 'Law and Order'

GEORGE LARDNER, Jr.

Havana Cultural Congress

HELEN TIGHEMAS

The Academy in Moral Disarray

NEIL COMPTON

S-21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Chicago's reputation

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Christopher Z. Hobson's letter [The Nation, Jan. 8] says the University of Chicago's "libertarian reputation is no longer deserved." Basis: the nonrenewing of Jesse Lemisch's contract after the trial three-year term (plus an extra year to give him more time to find a job); a claim that Staughton Lynd wasn't hired because of a statement made on Lemisch's behalf; remarks by three members of the faculty . . . and the temporary suspension of fifty-eight students for refusing to move their demonstration outside the Administration Building.

As to Lemisch, I wasn't part of the discussions, but I've heard the story of the other side, and it isn't Hobson's. . . . As to Lynd, I heard he'd been asked to discuss his interest in an appointment by the chairman of the Social Thought Committee after the man learned Lynd had been unjustly cut off from a job by a local college. Lynd was interested, the chairman went to ask people, found (1) there were no funds left (this was summertime and the appointment was for fall); and (2) the one or two historians around who'd read Lynd's stuff thought there were better people doing similar work. . . .

There's plenty wrong with Chicago, but of the twenty colleges and universities I've taught or studied at here and abroad, I think it's the openest, most free and best. (I receive no bonus for this and can't be fired short of murder.) I don't mean it shouldn't be criticized every day; just that it can be defended from any political quarter. Even Hobson's letter is useful: it reminds people in such institutions as this that they'd better spell decisions out clearly. . . .

Richard Stern

Department of English, University of Chicago

correction

The Nation regrets that changes in wording, introduced in cutting Christopher Z. Hobson's letter [Jan. 8] on Prof. Jesse Lemisch's firing from the University of Chicago, had the effect of altering Mr. Hobson's meaning. The final sentence as printed concludes: "Chicago's libertarian reputation is no longer deserved." Mr. Hobson wrote: "not now deserved, if indeed it ever was." The Nation notes that its rewording deletes Mr. Hobson's question as to the validity of Chicago's past libertarian reputation. Similarly, an earlier sentence, "Is a political firing alien to the spirit of the University of Chicago?" was changed to read: "alien to the present spirit." We regret that the published text conveys a meaning different from the one Mr. Hobson intended.

Editors

San Francisco State

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The Nation has launched a veritable press campaign against San Francisco State's student radicals and their organizations (Movement Against Political Suspensions; Black Students' Union). In attempting to maintain SF State's liberal image, John Shover and Marshall Windmiller (Dec. 18) and David Swanston (Jan. 8) resort to larger-than-life descriptions, falsification and mystification of the issues. Shover persists in characterizing the campus war recruiting question as one of free speech (an argument that even Windmiller rejects). Moreover, Shover argues that the war crisis convocation provided

(Continued on page 250)

EDITORIALS

Thoughts in a Dry Season

The political situation could hardly be more desperate than at this moment it appears to be. The Democrats will almost certainly nominate Johnson (it is always possible that he may withdraw), the Republicans may well nominate Nixon, and this would probably mean that Johnson, with an assist from George Wallace, would be re-elected. All the same, The Nation has no intention of "copping out" on the 1968 election and therefore offers these modest suggestions.

As we see it, "dissenting" Democrats should by all means support Sen. Eugene McCarthy. To be sure, his name will appear in only a few primaries, but committees have been formed to aid his candidacy in other states and these committees could turn out to be both useful and important. True, he has declared no intention of carrying the fight beyond the convention, but it is unrealistic to expect an incumbent Senator to repudiate his party in advance of the convention. Some "dissenting" Democrats find fault with the Senator's style of campaigning; others would no doubt have preferred Sen. Robert Kennedy in the challenger's role. But Kennedy has taken himself out of consideration, and as to McCarthy's style it may have a wider appeal than his critics imagine. Writing in The New York Times from New Hampshire, Tom Wicker observes that McCarthy's methods of presenting a self rather than an image and of assuming that his audience will understand his points and respond sensibly to his ideas seem to work well for him among the New Englanders. The pros will continue to cry for hokum, but the pros have been confounded often enough by their professional bias for dismissing the public as fools. The case for McCarthy is quite simple: he is the one candidate, at the moment, who is opposed to the war. It is said that a low vote for him will aid Johnson, but that is surely the best reason for making that vote as large as possible, by giving Senator McCarthy the support he deserves and has every right to expect from those who oppose the war.

Unfortunately, some of the "anti-war" groups are running harder at the moment against McCarthy than they are against Johnson. A part of the New Left favors a boycott not merely of the election but of electoral politics as currently practiced. Another wing of the New Left has qualified a new party devoted to Peace and Freedom in California and there are somewhat similar movements elsewhere. The Negro militants are no doubt formulating their own plans, but to date they have shown little direct concern with the war in Vietnam. It is fine that some of these groups are looking ahead and planning for the future, but in the future we may all be dead. The immediate objective should be to impose the maximum restraint on Johnson, in the hope that his war policies can be modified or reversed after the election. Let each of the groups that oppose the war do their special "thing" but let all of them keep the immediate objective in mind. Peace and Freedom partisans in California, by re-registering in April, could vote for McCarthy in the Democratic primary and still vote for the Peace and Freedom ticket in November. Psychologically this would be like voting against Johnson twice. And by November, many Democrats and Republicans may want to cast a protest vote.

McCarthy's candidacy does not stand alone. Democrats with a conscience will want to do everything in their power to help re-elect seven Democratic Senators who have opposed the war: Fulbright, Morse, Gruening, Nelson, McGovern, Church and Clark. Not to support these men would be base ingratitude; it would also be the stupidest kind of "anti-politics." Republicans who oppose the war should support Senators Morton, Aiken and Javits. Let them do what they can to prevent the nomination of Nixon. The limited logic of the two-party system—and it is very limited indeed at the moment—suggests that the best hope of terminating the war lies in a Republican victory (see: "Calculus for '68" by Eldon Kenworthy, The Nation, January 8). A Republican victory would mean a change of personnel, a pause, an opportunity to reconsider present policies. The Republicans have a responsibility for the war, but they do not have a vested interest in the disastrous policies of the Johnson Administration. It is doubtful, as Senator Aiken and others have suggested, that the Democrats can terminate this war; the Republicans might. Of course the GOP may yield to its quadrennial death wish and nominate Nixon, but the remarkable build-up for Rockefeller of recent weeks is an indication that the party may really want to win this election. Recent events in Vietnam, we are convinced, have whetted the national appetite for new leadership. At some point soon, we hope, Governor Rockefeller will make himself "available"—if only so that he will feel free to speak out on national issues. On balance he has made a good record as Governor (see articles p. 234) but the public wants to know what he thinks about the war.

Goliath Entrapped

The Vietnamese David may have to give up all the ground he gained in the Tet offensive, but the war will never be the same again. Goliath is in a state of shock—the nation-wide Vietcong assault has left Washington "numb, grim and off-balance." Goliath will recover, but only partially; a permanent trauma has been inflicted. (See "Saigon from a Rooftop" by Thomas W. Pew, Jr., in this issue.)

The explanations for what happened are as important as the things that happened, because the explanations are by their nature predictive. Not precisely the same mistakes will be made, but with the same people in charge mistakes which look different but are the same at bottom are a practical certainty. It is therefore interesting to compare the diagnoses of two writers, working for different papers, who were so far apart geographically that it is impossible to believe they had any communication. In The Washington Post, and writing in Washington, Ward Just says that most officials there view the past week "as a political disaster for the Allies." It was a week, he goes on to say, "in which the Johnson Administration more than ever resembled a Chinese court, with the mandarins assembled to tell the leadership what it wanted to hear." In The Wall

IN THIS ISSUE

February 19, 1968

EDITORIALS

226

ARTICLES

230 Saigon from a Rooftop

Thomas W. Pew, Jr.

231 Miami Declares War:

Epidemic of "Law and Order"

George Lardner, Jr.

Waiting for Rocky

234 Trials of a Non-Candidate

James Desmond

235 The Rockefeller Decade

Jerome L. Wilson

238 The Dominican Fuse

Howard J. Wiarda

241 Haiti: Prison Compound

Francis B. Kent

BOOKS & THE ARTS

243 The Havana Cultural Congress Helen Yglesias

245 Crisis (poem) Cleveland Moffett

246 In Moral Disarray Neil Compton

247 Theatre Harold Clurman

249 Films Robert Hatch

249 Television John Horn

252 Friendly Dissuasion Nathan Silver

255 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 8

Street Journal (February 6) Robert Keatley, writing from Hong Kong, explains that at the operational level "... bureaucracies fall back on ways and clichés they know best. . . . They live in their little compounds and read their own propaganda and eventually they begin to believe that stuff." Keatley is quoting a military man from another country, but he probably agrees, and so does many another newsman in that part of the world.

While Goliath is tied into knots, what passes through the mind of Lyndon B. Johnson, who escalated from some 16,000 "advisers" in Vietnam to 500,000 support and combat troops, plus the Seventh Fleet? One wonders whose advice started him off on this fatal course. Evidently he expected a fairly easy victory at modest expense in lives and money, after which he would emerge as the victorious war President who accomplished with wisdom and resolution what his predecessors had failed to do. ~~Then, as the~~ going became tough, he embarked on the "credibility gap."

Jack Newfield in the Village Voice, not being subject to the inhibitions of a White House reporter, says that Johnson lies by instinct. This is somewhat wide of the mark. He lies only to the extent necessitated by his weird view of the world, and more often than not he believes what he is saying, or hopes it will come true before long. He probably envisions himself as a Franklin D. Roosevelt or Winston Churchill standing firm against "appeasers." He is himself the prisoner of twenty years of American cold-war myths, and there is no one left to disillusion him. His military advisers suffer from the same psychosis—not in the strict clinical sense, but by the nature of their occupation and the rigidity of their minds. The intelligent retired admirals and generals who could save him do not have his ear; at least have not had it up to now. If he would call together True, Shoup, Hughes, Gavin, Griffith and the dozen or so who have spoken out against the war, he would learn the truth, but acting on it politically would still be the problem.

Perhaps, however, Mr. Johnson is contemplating some such move. At a White House lunch of his regular advisers—Walt W. Rostow, Richard Helms, et al.—the photograph shows Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway (U.S.A. Ret.), former commander in Korea (after MacArthur) and a dissenter from the present Vietnamese policy. His jaw cupped in his fist, Mr. Johnson is gazing fixedly in the direction of General Ridgway, who returns the gaze with the expression of a man who has just uttered a mouthful and is ready with more. A transcript of the discussion would be enlightening to the citizens who are sending their sons and their taxes into the bottomless pit.

On Camera

In what one of his interrogators on Meet the Press called his "valedictory mood," Secretary McNamara quoted four lines from Eliot's "Little Gidding":

*We shall not cease from exploration
And the end of all our exploring
Will be to arrive where we started
And know the place for the first time.*

Never in public had the Secretary seemed more human, as these lines helped him search for the innocence of good instincts and the expiation of errors which apparently he no longer wished to let stand unacknowledged. He specified but one of these, his sponsorship of the Cuban invasion which ended in the Bay of Pigs, and would perhaps have mentioned others but for the restraining influence of his immediate neighbor, the Secretary of State. Once he turned toward Mr. Rusk with a laughing comment; he met no answering smile. That famous egg-like surface permitted no departure from public impassivity (except perhaps for an eye gleam and tiny smile at a rapid put-down of Roger Hilsman).

One wondered about this impassivity. Is it only diplomatic cool? Does it mask a deep need for the quick, uniform, high-souled brutality which military action best supplies? Does it enforce the suppression of what might lead to the relaxed privileges his seat-neighbor was beginning to take? Asked by Peter Lisagor of the Chicago Daily News about South Vietnamese indifference to the government of President Thieu, Secretary Rusk responded that of course there were villagers in South Vietnam as elsewhere whose only concerns were crops, healthy babies and protection from marauders.

What connection was there between that answer and the poverty-stricken Georgia boy who threw coal at trains in the hope that firemen would throw enough coal back to heat the family home? How close were we to the adolescent who put on the military uniform which masked that poverty. The impassivity erased the distance, but in "Little Gidding" there were other guiding lines:

*There are three conditions which often look alike
Yet differ completely, flourish in the same hedgerow;
Attachment to self and to things and to persons, detachment
From self and from things and from persons; and, growing between them, indifference
Which resembles the others as death resembles life. . . .*

Did that famous face which somehow seemed its own death mask exemplify that lethal indifference, or was it only a fatigued exemplification of Lord Acton's terrible maxim on power?

RICHARD STERN

Key Man in the Complex

In the governmental-corporate elite of Washington, Clark Clifford has for many years been an astute, informed and influential figure quite without parallel. The lengthy summary of his clients and connections by Richard Harwood of The Washington Post lists Time, Inc., E. I. du Pont de Nemours, General Electric, International Telephone and Telegraph, American Broadcasting Company, Hughes Tool, Phillips Petroleum and other oil companies, El Paso Natural Gas and various Wall Street mutual funds, pharmaceutical companies, sugar companies, railroads and what-not. His public confidants have included John F. Kennedy, whose personal lawyer he was before Kennedy became President, Lyndon B. Johnson and Lady Bird, Stuart Symington, Cabinet officers, Congressmen, minor White House advisers (he being the chief one himself)—in short, a considerable proportion of the Who's Who of the federal Establishment. And in whatever capacities he functioned, Clifford has been, in effect, the principal liaison figure between big government and big business.

Therein lies the difficulty. A Charles E. Wilson or a Robert S. McNamara could sell his stock and cut himself off effectively enough from his former employer to satisfy the conflict-of-interests statutes, but how does a Clark Clifford go about such surgery? He did not practice law in the conventional sense. He did not lobby—such opportunisms were beneath him. He was never seen in the courtrooms and hearing chambers of Washington; such appearances, when necessary, he delegated to others. He confined himself to major problems, involving more often hundreds of millions rather than millions in small denominations: in the case of the divestiture of the controlling stock interest in General Motors by the du Ponts, he saved the family some $2 billion in taxes.

Now, atop the Pentagon, how does he go about divesting himself of these corporate and private interests and erecting a wall between his Defense Department duties and his multitudinous prior activities? Harwood says that by his own account Clifford worked as a planner, adviser and interpreter of the ways of government to his clients and the ways of his clients to the government, the two groups being on roughly equal terms. Clifford's law firm has been described as "a kind of Central Intelligence Agency, collecting day after day the 'unwritten knowledge' of Washington on which great policy decisions are based." But many of these former clients of his, who acted on that unwritten knowledge, are major defense contractors—General Electric alone had defense orders in 1967 totaling nearly $1.3 billion. Clifford must continue to do business with G.E.—only now he will be sitting on the other side of the table and bargaining at arm's length with these and scores of other contractors. And to make matters more complicated, he is a palpable hawk, like the President himself and the President's two other intimate advisers, Dean Acheson and Supreme Court Justice Abe Fortas. It will be surprising if the military-industrial complex suffers any loss of that undue influence against which General Eisenhower warned us before repairing to the golf links.

Pictures To Remember

Time was when a great metropolitan newspaper, having done its bit to get the United States into a righteous war, hired a star reporter to tell the home folks about our victories in glowing prose. Some first-rate reporters are or have been in Vietnam, but a war so squalid cannot produce heroic writing. It is not true that a picture is worth ten thousand words, or even ten—everything depends on the picture and on the words—but it is a fact that in this war the photographers, both still and movie, have brought the war into the living room with a greater emotional impact than anything the printed media—excellent as much of the reporting has been—has been able to convey. And it is often a perilous assignment: while exposing film, the photographer may be exposed to enemy fire.

The first round of photographs that had world impact was the immolations of the Buddhist monks. The motion picture of the old man sitting quietly in the pyre, and finally falling on his side in the still-glowing ashes, is perhaps the most horrible and unforgettable scene ever photographed.

The camera has brought the war into the home of every American. The Germans may claim that they knew nothing about the systematic murder of 6 million European Jews, and in some cases this may have been true—although one suspects that few civilians tried very hard to find out what was going on. But for us there can be no excuse. The photographers have shown us not only the battle scenes but the torture of Vietcong prisoners by Vietnamese government soldiers, while American officers stood by acquiescently. The latest exhibit did not involve torture, only cold-blooded murder. Brig. Gen. Nguyen Ngoc Loan, the South Vietnamese equivalent of Beria and the other Soviet secret police chiefs, executed a young Vietcong on a Saigon street. The photo sequence, taken by Eddie Adams of the Associated Press, shows the guardian of South Vietnamese liberties with his pistol held to the captive's head just before firing, and a moment later pocketing his gun as the body tumbles to the street. The VC is alleged to be a political officer in civilian clothes; he looks more like a schoolboy. The Thieu-Ky government was caught off guard in every possible way over the Tet holiday; these photographs, probably intended to show the Vietcong what was in store for them, were radioed all over the world and have made the government's position still more precarious.

If the American public is not moved to revulsion by the TV pictures of the war and by the stills printed in the newspapers, John Jay Chapman's observation is apposite: if you don't resist evil, he said, you lose your sensibility. You are no longer able to distinguish between good and evil. This may be true of many Americans but it is not true in regard to a large and growing minority. Nor is it true of our friends, or whilom friends, abroad. MacLean's, the Canadian equivalent of Life (but with a quite different political slant) devotes 12 pages of its February issue and 20,000 words of reportage to the Vietnamese War. Like it or not, MacLean's says, we are involved; Canada exports no arms to Vietnam, but last year it sold upward of $500 million worth of military merchandise, mainly to the United States. "Questions of morality and decency," it says, "haunt the Western world." Some of the most gruesome photographs which have come out of Vietnam illustrate the text. A U.S. Naval Reserve flier doesn't need the pictures. "It turns out a lot like the Nazis, I guess," he concludes. "You do the job you're trained to do. If you let it get you down, if you go in there worrying about women and children, you can't do your job. It's a matter of survival, really—you've got to be able to fly that machine well all the time and you can't if you're up there haggling with your conscience."

The Vietnamese, those who are not in the pay of the Americans—or, what amounts to the same thing, in the pay of the Thieu-Ky regime—have no need for the pictures either. They see the real thing. The American general who declared that the Vietnamese hate the Vietcong needs either an ophthalmologist or a psychiatrist. The Vietnamese faces in the streets of Saigon or Hue show plainly whom they hate: It is the Americans.

SAIGON FROM A ROOFTOP

THOMAS W. PEW, JR.

Mr. Pew is editor and associate publisher of the Troy Daily News, Troy, Ohio.

Saigon

At the end of the fourth day, the Indian doorman at the Eden Roc Hotel raised the clattering metal shutters on the lobby and announced with an enormous grin and in his singsong English: "Fighting all stopped. VC all going away today."

During the siege it has been possible to guess just how things were going by his expression. When he looked dark and opened the shutter quickly to let us into the street and then banged it shut behind us we knew there was danger. When he smiled and stepped out of the stuffy lobby and onto the sidewalk we figured things were going well.

It's too bad the Eden Roc doorman couldn't be on the U.S. Army General Staff, or at least a doorman at the American Embassy. He no doubt knew, as did many of our Vietnamese friends, that nine battalions of Vietcong and North Vietnamese regulars (around 2,500 men, according to Brig. Gen. Phil Davidson) had entered the city from all sides on the night of January 29. Perhaps he was even aware that they had slipped into the city in twos and threes and met at pre-selected rallying points where they were issued weapons and two days' rations.

Americans in Saigon have read with interest reports from Washington that President Johnson claimed the Vietcong's "general uprising" to have been a "complete failure" from a military standpoint. Apparently the Commander in Chief is not on the same wave length with his staff in Vietnam, because General Davidson, the Military Air Command J-2, otherwise known as General Westmoreland's intelligence man, says: "A follow-on attack of the same size is a daily potential with known divisions of men held in reserve."

Furthermore, General Davidson affirms that "the main enemy concentration has remained quiet." He refers to the two divisions of North Vietnamese troops around the Khe Sanh, and the two other divisions that are known to be in the area just south of the DMZ. These divisions, according to his estimate, have about 35,000 to 40,000 combat-ready men fully equipped with modern weapons, and have with them regiments of rocket launchers.

General Davidson also said there were bits of information to indicate the possibility that another North Vietnamese division (the famous 308th that spearheaded the attack on the French at Dienbienphu) was in the vicinity of the DMZ by the South China Sea. And he mentioned thousands of troops, over and above the combat-ready forces, that are presumably committed there.

But his estimation of the Vietcong strength is not limited to the vicinity of the DMZ. When General Davidson says that "we should realize the enemy has not yet realized his full capability," he is referring to a capability throughout South Vietnam. He affirms that the Vietcong "has the capability to launch the same type of attack, of equal scope, and he could go at almost any time."

Such an estimation of the enemy is a far cry from

Mr. Johnson's wishful thinking. Far from being a "complete failure," the attack was a skillfully executed and highly successful probe of the combined U.S. and ARVN strength. Its purpose was to confuse, disrupt and test the allied forces and, at the same time, to influence the people. To that extent, it was a complete success.

Indications that it was a probe and not a full-scale attack are to be found in the fact that not only were great forces withheld throughout the country, but Communist field commanders were apparently not at liberty to use certain powerful weapons at their disposal.

When this writer asked General Davidson why the big Tan Son Nhut air base just outside Saigon had not been hit with the same type of rockets that have brought such havoc to Danang on many occasions, he replied that we should wait and see about those rockets. He said, frankly, "We are in an on-going situation," and an "on-going situation" isn't, as the Commander in Chief labeled it to the American people, a "complete failure" from a military standpoint or any other standpoint.

The "on-going" situation has created a staggering 20,000 refugees in Saigon alone, and in the Mekong Delta area it has created another 125,000 refugees for the United States and the South Vietnamese to care for. The figures for the rest of the country are just as serious.

If this is not confusion and disruption on a grand scale, if it isn't "creating turmoil" (one of the Vietcong goals, according to General Davidson), then the meaning of those words has certainly changed. In fact, the only goal cited by General Davidson that the Communists didn't achieve was the fomenting of a general uprising, and it is anything but certain that they really expected it. As the Vietcong well knows, the average South Vietnamese is apathetic and incapable of an uprising.

It is true the Communist losses were heavy, but then it is true that they have never been ones to shrink from heavy losses—and there are always those 65,000 uncommitted troops to keep the on-going situation on-going. Furthermore, the incredibly well-coordinated attack on all quarters of the country at once tested and proved what must be one of the most highly developed communications systems in modern warfare—all the more fantastic since U.S. intelligence doesn't even know how it operates. The logistics accomplishment of supplying arms and ammunition and food to many thousands of men who are supposed to be operating in a hostile environment without open use of roads and without air power speaks for itself.

If one of the Vietcong's intentions, as is reported, was to impress the people, then the people most certainly have been impressed. And among those who have been most impressed are the many Americans who climbed to the roofs of their hotels in Saigon at all hours of the day and night to watch the battles below in a city they had believed secure.

The roof of the Eden Roc Hotel, on Tudo Street in the heart of the city but not far from the Saigon River, offered an ideal crow's-nest for spotting the course of the Communist probe as it raged day and night in every quarter of the city. Some Americans would bring their evening cocktails to the roof and sip drinks and munch on cheese and crackers and Gibson onions as they pointed out particularly sensational aspects of the fire fights.

During the day it was possible to watch the jets peel out of formation, swoop down from the sky and deposit flaming balls of napalm on the outskirts of the city. A Norwegian correspondent wondered aloud how many women and children were burning up in the hell's inferno those bombs ignite. With nightfall, the mortar flares began going up into the sky over the city, creating strange little perverted suns that threw weird shadows among the buildings as they danced toward the ground on miniature parachutes.

When a VC force was definitely spotted in a section of the city, the helicopter gun ships would fly in and the Gatling-gun armed planes (Puff the Magic Dragon) would appear on the horizon. Flying over the target and sometimes firing two cannons, they belched out thousands of rounds of tracer bullets that cascaded from the sky in a liquid spray. Within an hour after dark for three days fires could be seen blazing all around the city, some of them started by the allies and some by the VC.

At the tailor shop just across the street from the Eden Roc a squad of White Mice, as the Vietnamese police are called, appeared suddenly and quietly. Watching from the 8th floor we could see them fan out into position in the street just as football players are seen from the press box going into a well-practiced play.

One stood behind the jeep nervously fidgeting with his machine gun, another was behind the tree to the right of the door. One crouched behind a garbage can overflowing with accumulated trash and two deep flankers were down the street on the sidewalk pressed up against the building.

When they were all in formation, three raiders went up the middle. The metal shutter rattled to their knock and it was no more than cracked when they had forced their way inside. For a few moments all was quiet. Then one of the men appeared at the door and waved the jeep away. Within minutes the jeep returned, followed by a truck loaded with reinforcements.

Finally the two policemen who had remained in the shop reappeared in the doorway with a single man. He was quickly escorted to the jeep and within an instant both vehicles, the police and the suspect were gone into the night without a sound. The doorman appeared on the roof and announced: "Plastic charge: they find plastic charge." Later, we heard that it wasn't true, but that night the VC came to the doorman's house and killed one of his family. It was earlier that day that he had said they were all gone.

MIAMI DECLARES WAR

EPIDEMIC OF 'LAW AND ORDER'

GEORGE LARDNER, Jr.

Mr. Lardner, a reporter on The Washington Post, was formerly on the staff of The Miami Herald.

Miami

Walter Headley is a gruff, heavyset ex-cavalryman who still parts his hair down the middle and wears a Masonic pin in his lapel. He looks like a police commissioner from some movie of the 1930s.

Unlike the movies, Walter Headley has not faded. He is in his twentieth year as Miami's chief of police. Two scrappy mayors fought long and hard to have him removed. Both are in their graves. Headley, 62, is still riding horseback in Orange Bowl parades. Now, almost overnight, he has become the hero of the nation's law-and-order circuit.

The chief won his current eminence the day after Christmas when he "declared war" on lawbreakers in Miami's Negro districts. Angered by an outburst of violence during the Christmas weekend, he proclaimed the crackdown with a harsh, brusque rhetoric that sped across the country. According to Headley there had been fifty-eight robberies and strong-arm holdups, fifty-five of them committed by Negroes. Three of the victims were slain.

"We don't mind being accused of police brutality," Headley rumbled into the TV cameras. "They haven't seen anything yet. . . . We're going to use shotguns and dogs to stop them from now on. . . . Felons will learn that they can't be bonded out of the morgue."

Turning to civil disorders that stem from discontent, the chief again vowed to meet violence with violence if necessary. "We haven't had any serious problems with civil uprisings and looting [in Miami]," he asserted, "because I've let the word filter down that when the looting starts, the shooting starts."

It is a measure of the national mood that Headley has been far more praised than condemned for his outburst. Some criticized his "inflammatory" talk; a state NAACP official called for his resignation; CORE's Floyd McKissick accused him of "setting up the first Fascist state of Miami." Yet the chief struck a chord that will not be easily quieted.

The oracle of law and order was Barry Goldwater. Now it is evident everywhere, from the newsletters of Herbert A. (I Led Three Lives) Philbrick's United States Anti-Communist Congress to President Johnson's State of the Union message. Republicans and Democrats alike are bidding for the law-and-order vote in election-year platforms and speeches. "Crime" has become a political shibboleth of reaction—reaction which deplores not only robbery and rape but Supreme Court decisions, draft-card burnings and, most of all, urban riots.

The message from Miami reflects it all. Headley's imme-diary target was everyday street crime, but his underlying emphasis was, as it is elsewhere, on race and riots. "Ninety per cent of our Negro population is law-abiding and wants to eliminate our crime problem," Headley said. "But 10 per cent are hoodlums who have taken advantage of the civil rights campaign." To one reporter, he added: "I'm fed up with holding back. . . . When we pick them up, they throw civil rights in our faces. They know we can't do anything to them."

The police chief vowed to reverse the trend with stepped-up patrols bolstered by shotguns and dogs. His men were told to enforce Miami's "stop and frisk" ordinance on young gangs loitering on street corners and in bars and poolrooms.

"Community relations and all that sort of thing has failed," Headley complained, with the controversial flair that has become his trademark. "We have done everything we could, sending speakers out and meeting with Negro leaders, but it has amounted to nothing."

The chief's performance sent shivers through the ghettos, tensed to see how it might be translated by the men on the beat. The fact that not one of three who died in the violence was a Negro made many suspicious of the motives for the crackdown and it made the imminent confrontation the more dangerous.

The next night, members of Headley's newly formed tactical squad, carrying shotguns and carbines, tromped through Negro night spots, calling for IDs and checking for weapons. Even two off-duty deputies from the Dade County Sheriff's Department found themselves frisked. The police picked up fifteen knives, three guns and plenty of resentment. It was duly reported by a third off-duty deputy, Marvin Wiley, who had stationed himself among the hundreds of patrons at the first night club Headley's men visited. Wiley is a full-time community relations service officer for the Sheriff's Department. (There is no such job in Headley's office.) "The people were teed off," he reported later. "They said things like, 'This ain't gonna cause nothin' but trouble.'" One Negro merchant and civil leader warned: "It wouldn't take much to touch off an insurrection."

The fears have solid foundation. A recent Brandeis University study of 218 racial outbreaks across the country shows that only five could be blamed on agitators while some seventy of them, or 30 per cent, were touched off by "confrontations between the police and the [Negro] community."

Since that first-night show of force, however, police have not again swept through the bars. The crackdown has become much less visible, the dogs and shotguns being kept in the patrol cars instead of out on street display. Many Negroes are convinced that Headley has "backed down."

The rumple-faced World War I cavalryman says he hasn't retreated an inch. It is the hoodlums, Headley declares, who have backed down. "Some say the criminals are just 'cooling it' until the heat's off," the chief says, "but the heat's never going to go off." Within a month of the crackdown, he adds, robberies and strong-arm holdups have dropped as much as 65 per cent.

Headley's critics say the statistics prove nothing. Dr. John O. Brown, local vice chairman of CORE, points out that shopping, with or without a gun, usually drops off after Christmas anyway. But what upsets the critics even more is the backhanded slap the chief has dealt to community relations, a cause about which it might be said that Walter Headley cares very little. When Negro leaders hastily called a meeting last June in the face of widespread rumors of riot, Sheriff Wilson E. Purdy listened for four hours; Headley sent a subordinate. The meeting was held outside Miami's city limits. "Why I should go out somewhere in the boondocks," Headley blustered, "I don't know."

It makes his support among many, usually older, Negroes all the more remarkable. Apparently, they have been without adequate police protection so long that they are in no mood to quibble. Shotguns and dogs? Says Rev. Thedford Johnson of St. John's Baptist Church: "They could justify machine guns and lions if that's what it took to wipe out crime in our streets."

No one denies that the crime rate in the slums of Miami or in any big city ghetto is far too high. Says Mrs. Athalie Range, Miami's only Negro city commissioner: "I would be the first to admit we must get tough if we are to survive." Headley says police statistics show that 85 per cent of the city's crimes of violence involve Negroes. But he prefers to describe his headaches in terms of "punks" and the restraints imposed by Supreme Court decisions. He waves off his critics as "do-gooders" and "bleeding hearts." "Don't those people know that most of the crimes in the Negro district are against Negroes?" he asks. "Everyone knows I'm not a racist."

Civil rights leaders respond that the distinction may be lost on the men in uniform. In any event, Headley himself has been attacked not so much on grounds of racism as for being "a police chief from another era" when precinct-station concepts of civil liberties, much less civil rights, were at best primitive. That era, some fear (and others hope), is itching to make a comeback—in the name of "law and order."

In the old days, even Headley concedes, police were apt to shrug off nighttime complaints from the Liberty City section of town as "just another nigger cutting." Now, compelled to deal with rising crime rates in ghettos that threaten to go up in flames, Headley and many of his colleagues profess to see no solution except to "get tough." In his public pronouncements, at least, Headley has come close to giving his officers a free hand. Up to now, he has said, the police "were more or less anticipating court decisions and perhaps holding off a little. Now we are going to start jailing them. Let the courts do what they will. If they turn them loose, we will pick them up again."

So far in Miami, however, it has been primarily psychological warfare. As the crackdown has become less obtrusive, so has the community's apprehension. A successful veteran of Miami's political wars, Headley has sought to sweeten his local image somewhat by agreeing that community relations has a value, and by denying any intention to impose a reign of terror. But Negro youths who continue to cluster on the sidewalks or venture into the poolrooms are still being stopped and frisked or even picked up and, according to some reports, they are growing increasingly resentful and bitter. Just this month, Headley was forced to drop one policeman and suspend another for allegedly stripping a 17-year-old Negro down to his shorts and dangling him by his heels from a highway overpass. Underlying all this, the threatening rhetoric remains, ripe for nation-wide emulation.

"I don't regret a damn thing I've said," Headley declares. "I hope it's contagious."

That it is proving contagious can already be detected in city after city. Newark (N.J.) Mayor Frank Adonizio declares enthusiastically that Chief Headley "has acted as a catalyst for all police departments around the country." In Chicago, where the Democratic National Convention will be held, Mayor Richard Daley told the City Council: "The rioters aren't going to take over any convention or any street or any city—no matter how many or where they come from." Similar declarations have been made by officials in Jersey City, Philadelphia and North Little Rock, Ark. Law men from Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Detroit are investing in armored cars. In Kansas City, Mo., police have been training private citizens in the use of firearms—on the ground that they ought to be taught how to handle the weapons they've already bought.

President Johnson struck the chord again in his State of the Union message. "The American people," he said, doubling the funds he hopes to get in his "safe streets" bill, "have had enough of rising crime and lawlessness." His denunciation of violence and those who preach it touched off the only spontaneous bursts of applause that his Congressional audience accorded the pedestrian fifty-one minute speech.

The GOP is pushing the theme even harder. It didn't work for Barry Goldwater in 1964, but as House Minority Leader Gerald Ford (R., Mich.) has said, Goldwater "didn't have the ferment. The crime issue is much more dramatic now than it was in 1964."

Rep. Charles E. Goodell of New York, another influential House Republican, likens it to Vietnam in the anxieties it causes. "It's unsettling people, making them unhappy and frustrated," he says. "It's not a clear-cut issue. It's an accumulation of a whole variety of factors."

"Murder is epidemic; rape is commonplace," complained Rep. Richard H. Poff (R., Va.), chairman of the House GOP Task Force on Crime, in the Republicans' generally lackluster reply to the President's message. "Crime has grown six times as fast as population. . . . The American people want the 'enforcement' put back into law enforcement."

Plainly, crime attracts far more hawks than does Vietnam. In Miami, Headley says he has gotten 6,000 letters and telegrams of support—and only twenty-two criticizing him. "Most of these," he sneers, "didn't have the courage to sign their names." Meanwhile, his department has been flooded with inquiries about joining the force—more in the past month than in the entire preceding ten years. Most of these came from policemen in other cities where, presumably, there are still some restraints on putting the "enforcement" into law enforcement.

The 6 ft. 3, 265-pound Headley insists that his is the only language the "punks" can understand. He recalls with relish how last fall "some do-gooder came into the office with two punks" his men had accosted in a pool-room. One of the youths began blurting out his complaints.

"He said, 'The cop did this, the cop did that, the cop did the other thing,'" Headley mimicked. "I told him to say 'policeman, not cop.' And he says, 'Oh, you don't like to be called 'cop,' huh?'"

Headley beamed for his punch line. "I said, 'Not any more than you like to be called nigger.'"

This is community relations, Miami style. Spread that across the country, then add a dash of black power. It takes no prophet to guess the consequences.

WAITING FOR ROCKY

Trials of a Non-Candidate

JAMES DESMOND

Mr. Desmond, a political writer for the New York Daily News, is the author of Nelson Rockefeller: A Political Biography (Macmillan).

The peculiar political posture of Nelson A. Rockefeller in the 1968 Presidential election, which dismays his friends and foes alike, is certain to continue until March 22. That is the last day for filing declinations in the Oregon primary, and Rockefeller, despite a plethora of press-agent attempts to sweep the problem under the rug, is morally and politically committed to hold open his option to enter the contest as a last resort. He hasn't and can't shut the door.

Morally, the New York Governor, remembering his bitter experience in 1964 when the forces of Sen. Barry Goldwater sewed up the nomination long before the delegates knew it, is pledged to the concept that the delegates at the 1968 Miami convention will have a choice. An "open convention," he has insisted repeatedly, is essential if the Republican Party is to regain its force in American life. Politically, that means that the delegates must be offered an alternative to Richard M. Nixon, now shown by the polls to have a virtual lock on the nomination if he can sweep the New Hampshire and Wisconsin primaries against the faltering George Romney.

And Rockefeller, a far more sophisticated and practical politician than he was in his stabs at the nomination in 1960 and 1964, is realist enough to know that if Romney is walloped in the primaries, he himself is the only alternative in sight. The others mentioned, Sen. Charles Percy of Illinois and Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, have conspicuously failed to generate any national enthusiasm that would make them fitting stand-ins should Romney go down. In fact, the very mention of Reagan sends shudders through the liberal wing of the Eastern Republican establishment, which this year is making overtures to Rockefeller, after spurning him in 1960 and 1964.

The box Rockefeller finds himself in is, of course, largely of his own making. His early commitment to Romney as the best hope to wrest control of the Republican Party from the Goldwaterites of 1964 has largely tied his hands. As Rockefeller has himself pointed out, he cannot declare himself on national and domestic affairs in this time of crisis in American life without seeming to inject himself into the nomination contest against Romney.

Yet Rockefeller, although he has scrupulously kept his promise to Romney, may be the instrument of the Michigan Governor's defeat. For if the unauthorized write-in campaign for the New Yorker in unpredictable New Hampshire should draw a significant number of votes, Romney would be the one most likely to suffer. How that campaign is going is impossible to assess. Political observers, made cautious by Henry Cabot Lodge's stunning defeat of Rockefeller and Goldwater in 1964, are unwilling even to guess. But Rockefeller was closing fast on Goldwater in the 1964 primary until Lodge joined the race, and presumably residual loyalties will channel a large bloc of votes to his non-candidate banner.

Rockefeller has said that the Romney campaign will get rolling if the Michigan Governor polls 35 per cent of the vote in the New Hampshire primary on March 12. But Romney's own campaign manager in Wisconsin, Wilbur Renk, insists that Romney must come to that state backed by 45 per cent of the New Hampshire vote, if he is to have a chance in Wisconsin's primary on April 2.

And between those two dates falls Rockefeller's moment of decision on March 22 in Oregon. For while the Oregon secretary of state, Clay Myers, a Republican, is vested with discretion to name primary candidates, he must by law include any prospective candidate "recognized in national news media" as a possible contender. And no one can doubt that the national news media recognize Rockefeller as a potential contender at the convention, if not in the primaries.

Oregon is a cruel pinch for Rockefeller. On the one hand, if he decides to let his name stand on the Oregon ballot before the Wisconsin test is recorded, he will lay himself open to the charge that he used Romney as a stalking-horse in New Hampshire (it is unlikely that the Michigan Governor will withdraw from the contest if he makes a poor showing in New Hampshire). On the other hand, Rockefeller's well-wishers in Oregon, who have an unofficial write-in campaign already going to cover the eventuality that he removes his name from the ballot, might well lose their enthusiasm if he declines. And there is a group in high Republican circles that believes that Rockefeller, who beat out Goldwater in 1964 largely on a campaign keyed to the chant, "I have come to Oregon" (something Goldwater neglected to do), must show himself to the people, if he seriously intends to put up a fight for an "open" convention.

Although Gov. Tom McCall is actively supporting Rockefeller in Oregon, and Sen. Mark O. Hatfield is said to be just about ready to enlist in the cause, there is a distinct pressure to persuade the New Yorker that a write-in, if Romney fades, is a chancy thing under the best of circumstances and that the circumstances may not be the best if Nixon makes a primary sweep.

All of which means that Rockefeller's options on his future are rapidly narrowing. How far he can go with Romney—unless the Michigan Governor's campaign shows signs of developing more power than has been apparent so far—is one of the big questions he must answer, and answer soon. Sticking too long with Romney could foreclose the contest and give Nixon, who shows up in the polls as the favorite of the Republican press, an uncontested nomination.

Rockefeller has one small opening available to him if he allows the Romney campaign to run its course. He has said that he will go to the convention as New York's favorite son if that is necessary to preserve unity in the state party. That could give him a tiny wedge to make a last-ditch fight at the convention itself. But it is viewed as foredoomed, because by August the states will have to commit themselves to Nixon, if he locks up the nomination, or face reprisals from the possible next President. That is a risk few pros like to take.

Meanwhile Rockefeller, unable at the moment to offer encouragement to his friends, has nevertheless kept himself out of range of foes who would like nothing better than to pin him down this far before Election Day on the pressing issues of the day—meaning specifically the Asian war crisis.

The Rockefeller Decade

JEROME L. WILSON

Mr. Wilson covers Albany as a legislative correspondent for WCBS-TV News. From 1962 to 1966 he was a New York State Senator and author of the new state divorce law.

Albany

If Nelson Rockefeller were to be elected President in 1968, he would have completed nine years as Governor of New York State. Since his election is at least possible, the manner in which Mr. Rockefeller has governed New York becomes a subject of national importance.

One first thinks of power when reviewing the gubernatorial years of Nelson Rockefeller—the easy, unself-conscious exercise of the will of one over the state's 17 million. This exercise is most clearly manifest in an awesome assemblage of bricks and mortar. For perhaps no governor has altered the public physical environment of New York State as has Mr. Rockefeller. (Gov. DeWitt Clinton's building of the Erie Canal is the possible exception.)

In a way, therefore, it is easy to compile the record of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, because it consists of things—not tone, not concept. Since he took office in 1959, his administration has built enough new dormitories and academic facilities to accommodate more than 100,000 new full-time students at the State University. New York's highway system has been extended by 12,000 miles—"enough to stretch to Hawaii and back," the Governor's advertisements boasted during the 1966 re-election campaign. There are 50,000 new middle-income apartments; 120 new commuter cars, with hundreds more on the way. The state's mental patients have been provided with 11,000 new beds and the buildings to house them; by next year there will be 8,000 beds for narcotics patients, a controversial program, which the Governor started from scratch.

But this shopping list of construction may say less about the kind of public executive that Rockefeller has been than do what some consider the razzle-dazzle methods he has employed to finance it. Operations typical of his methods are the billion-dollar expansion of the State University (SUNY), and the new complex of state office buildings in Albany (South Mall), also to cost close to a billion dollars.

The straightforward way to raise $1 billion is to have the state legislature appropriate the money, outright, by legislative act. But that is a big chunk for one legislative session to appropriate, and someone might be moved to suggest that taxes be raised to pay the bill. One can safely surmise that the Governor ruled out direct appropriation by the legislature as politically not feasible.

Another constitutionally acceptable route to money in New York is for the state to float bonds in the amount needed. But this method requires the approval of the people at a state-wide referendum, and the Governor evidently thought that this path, too, was politically treacherous. New Yorkers have been generally reluctant to approve multimillion-dollar bond issues, shying away from the string of zeros that must be printed right on the ballot. Furthermore, in the case of an expanded state university, a number of forces in the state have not been exactly seized by the idea of more public higher education.

Rockefeller's solution was to go around right end. First, he had the trustees of the State University raise student tuition fees to a uniform standard. Next (this was in 1962), he set up a State University Construction Fund, which has to date completed 418 individual projects, with an additional 323 under construction or on the drawing boards.

To provide the funds for this edificial extravaganza, Mr. Rockefeller had the State Housing Finance Agency and a newly created State Dormitory Authority float their own bonds. Meanwhile, he had pushed through the legislature a relaxation of the housing agency's original mandate which understandably had been limited to financing housing. That done, the Governor redirected the increased student tuition income and dormitory room rentals at the state colleges away from the state's general funds, using these moneys to pay the debt service on the bonds issued by the Housing Finance Agency and the Dormitory Authority.

The result of this agile footwork was to raise at last reckoning $1.2 billion for new state university construction. Furthermore, the money for these projects was obtained without requiring the approval of the people, or of the legislature except in separate and at times obscure pieces.

Democrats in the legislature who now say they oppose this method of financing make two admissions: At the time, "we didn't have brains enough to connect one bill with another"; and "he probably couldn't have built it otherwise."

The state office building complex at the South Mall is being funded by even more sparkling legerdemain, and again shows Mr. Rockefeller as a master manipulator of funds for public building purposes. When he took office at Albany in 1959, the drive from the state capitol to the executive mansion some 10 blocks to the west was a disturbing experience. Substandard housing and grimy store-front businesses lined Eagle Street, which is the route for most of the way. Today Eagle Street is lined on each side by gaping holes, fresh foundations and growing structures which hint at what is to come. There will be new office buildings for the executive and legislative departments, a state museum and library, a huge half-moon piece of sculpture and a reflecting pool. To put it bluntly, Rockefeller would have had a fat chance of financing this colossal monument to administration if he had called for the approval of the people at a state-wide referendum. The bond issue could have been defeated on the single factor that the legislators' offices are slated to be air-conditioned.

At this point, the Governor's famous grandfather, who knew something about the art of manipulative finance, begins to smile. For, lo and behold, it is not the state but Albany County that is putting out the bonds to pay for the entire state facility. And because the county is issuing the bonds, and with them paying for construction and land acquisition costs, the county itself will actually own the completed buildings. Under this Rockefeller scheme, the state will be reduced, at least from a legal standpoint, to the status of a humble tenant in its own office buildings. Of necessity, the state will pay a generous rent: it must cover interest and amortization, plus a payment in lieu of the local property taxes lost by the construction.

But these are the mere bare bones of the arrangement. Approval by the legislature is crucial during the early stages of such a project, and while it has been said without exaggeration that the Governor "owns" the Republican State Committee, a number of Democratic members were getting wiser. So Rockefeller reached up his sleeve for an ace to get the Democrats.

Albany, both county and city, is firmly controlled by a Democratic machine. Soon the city's Democratic mayor and the Republican Governor had worked out the "modus operandi" outlined above, and the Democratic mayor became a staunch lobbyist among Democratic lawmakers. The result was that the project sailed through the legislature with substantial majorities. It was a help that the then current session had to approve only one year's payment of the compact, leaving it to the legislatures of the next fifty years to keep the arrangement going.

So well has this "lease-back" arrangement worked, that the Governor has undertaken similar state office building projects in a number of other cities. Also, repeating the device he used to finance the State University, the

View of South Mall

Nelson Rockefeller's Christmas Card in 1967

Governor has created the Mental Hygiene Facilities Improvement Authority, a body that receives diverted "responsible relative" fees and applies them to sustain the bonds needed for the construction of more mental health facilities.

The most telling argument against this method of funding, unless one cares to complain that it deprives the people of a portion of their sovereignty, is that these special authorities and even the counties themselves, cannot borrow money as cheaply as can the state. "The difference is about half a point," the Governor admits in his smiling, casual way. As a matter of fact the Governor has used the argument that, by building the projects now and even funding at higher interest, the people will save money eventually because of inflationary trends in the national economy.

But the Governor hasn't neglected the "straight" bond issue route, when he thought the project had enough popular appeal to win on the voting machines. He won approval of a $1 billion pure waters bond issue early in his administration, and last November, after an energetic state-wide campaign, he persuaded New Yorkers to approve the largest bond issue in the state's history—$2.5 billion—for transportation.

The transportation bond issue campaign was a happy one for the Governor. He went from community to community, telling the people what it would bring them. Some arithmeticians in Albany thought him a bit overgenerous in his promises. A ranking Republican legislator tallied the Governor's largess at $50 billion rather than $2.5 billion; he even purportedly promised a subway for Syracuse. But the bond issue passed by a 750,000 vote margin, and the dollar figure was clearly on the ballot.

Also, in a conventional manner the Governor has had to raise taxes to support increased state programs. During his years in office the state budget has climbed from $2.03 billion in fiscal 1959-60 to a forecast of $5.4 billion in 1968-69. When he was first elected, Rockefeller raised personal taxes and he has asked the legislature for another increase this year. In 1963, having made a campaigned promise the previous November not to raise taxes, the Governor asked for increases in a host of state licensing "fees." In 1965, after moving in his Republican legislators to solve a Democratic leadership fight, he got the Democratic faction which the Republicans had supported to pass the state's first state-wide sales tax. It was probably one of the rare examples of coalition government in Statehouse politics.

Much of the new tax money has gone back to the localities. The Rockefeller administration has, for example, increased threefold state aid to local elementary and secondary schools. State aid to the autonomous City University of New York rose from $8.3 million in 1959 to $63.8 million in 1967. Before this aid was granted, it should be pointed out, the Governor attempted vigorously but vainly to have the state take over the City University. If there is a trend to city-state relationships during the Rockefeller administration it is the gradual assumption of city functions by state government. This shift of responsibility has accelerated as the Governor has increasingly turned his attention to the nation's urban dilemma.

Thus, on March 1 of this year, a date safely past the biannual January transit negotiations, the state of New York will assume full control of running the city's subway and bus system. In addition, the Governor has let it be known to legislative leaders that he favors a state takeover of the city's welfare services, and reportedly he has even considered a sanitation union suggestion that the state be responsible for cleaning New York City's streets. In December, he announced a proposal for six large state recreation areas to be built within the city's limits. Finally, the state's Public Employees Relations Board has become increasingly involved in the city's labor disputes with its municipal employees.

Of course, city-state relations haven't yet reached the stage, as in the early 19th century, where the mayor of New York City was an appointee of the governor at Albany, but Rockefeller clearly believes that the city, and for that matter its mayor, should be a creature of the state. Generally, the Governor is impatient with Mayor Lindsay, whom he looks upon as an amateur in the art of government.

One reason for the distance between the two men is that, whereas Rockefeller is at root a pragmatist, the Mayor is basically a "gut" liberal with an almost white-charger approach to problems. Lindsay has spoken of improving the tone of the city, of battling the "power brokers." Rockefeller deals in bricks and construction projects, unashamedly accepting the endorsement of the conservative construction unions in his election campaigns.

Rockefeller fails many of the liberal indicators, but the overall impact of his record can be judged progressive. As a case in point, he has wobbled on the drawing of a strict church-state line in the state constitution, and signed into law a large textbook aid program for parochial schools. At the same time, he has created almost from scratch a state public higher education system which in the long run could competitively surpass New York's religious and private universities.

In 1965 Rockefeller committed liberal heresy by vetoing the $1.50 minimum wage bill and he has never shown much enthusiasm for New York's abolition of capital punishment, although he did sign the bill. As for "one man, one vote" apportionment, he chose to ignore the concept until ordered to pay attention by the federal courts. When it was really tough for Lindsay and the liberals during New York City's fierce Civilian Review Board fight, Rockefeller stayed aloof, and he has since maintained a close friendship with the city's victorious Patrolmen's Benevolent Association. He recently supported the association's attempt to restore to the police the right to use their revolvers against "fleeing felons."

On the other hand, the Governor pushed hard to make New York the first state in the nation to prohibit discrimination in private housing, and not atypically he is putting up a large state office building in the heart of Harlem on 125th Street. Also, the Governor has been outstanding among the nation's political leaders in recognizing the health needs of the poor. New York's Medicaid program, establishing massive free medical care for those in need, would have been termed radical just a decade ago. Unfortunately, Mr. Rockefeller has had to propose cutbacks in the program this year, primarily because of restrictive federal legislation. Of course, the Governor is soon to translate this concern for health into construction. He is reported to be contemplating the funding of a massive program for new hospitals under the aegis of the State Housing Finance Agency. "I don't think the people would approve another bond issue right now," he said recently, referring to the just completed transportation bond issue campaign.

Whether Governor Rockefeller's record in New York State forecasts a national administration of domestic affairs as broad as that conceived by Franklin Roosevelt no one can say. However, his performance in the state is on a scale that at least raises the question.

As for foreign affairs (the state of New York has no foreign policy), Rockefeller was for a period a hawk on Vietnam, saying that the country should support its President. Now, he says that he does not have the information to form a judgment. This "no position" on Vietnam is probably the wisest for an aspiring Presidential candidate. One can only surmise that Nelson Rockefeller knows it.

THE DOMINICAN FUSE

HOWARD J. WIARDA

Mr. Wiarda teaches political science at the University of Massachusetts. He has completed a book on the political development of the Dominican Republic, to be published soon by Praeger.

Santo Domingo

As this troubled election year gets under way, it is appropriate to recall that, both at home and abroad, disenchantment with the Johnson Administration began not so much over Vietnam as over U.S. intervention in the Dominican Republic in April, 1965. To be sure, escalation of the Vietnamese conflict during that summer quickly pushed Santo Domingo out of the headlines; but it may well be that the long-range implications of the Dominican intervention will be as important as those stemming from the war in Vietnam.

When the Dominican revolt broke out, President Johnson was still coining popularity out of his impressive accomplishments in the realm of domestic legislation and his sweeping victory over Barry Goldwater. The first Vietnam teach-in had just been held, but the promise of the "Great Society" seemed still feasible. Military intervention in the Dominican Republic destroyed this rosy picture. In May, 1965, the United States had almost as many troops in Santo Domingo as in Vietnam. Further, it was the Dominican fiasco that opened the "credibility gap," revealing for the first time within recent memory the gulf between the U.S. Government's actions and its words.

The Dominican crisis brought home the fact, only weakly perceived before, that the Alliance for Progress—as originally conceived—was dead and buried. The Alliance had been suffering transformation before this time, but the Dominican intervention revealed that the United States had abandoned the early Kennedy goal of assisting a democratic social revolution in Latin America. Indeed, the case of the Dominican Republic is the best example we have that the United States will not permit a genuine social revolution to take place within what it considers its sphere of influence; that it will, on the contrary, pursue the "lesser evil doctrine," siding with the "safe" status quo-oriented oligarchs and generals to suppress such revolutions when they occur. In the process of change from the early Kennedy years to the present, the Alliance for Progress has become just another economic give-away program.

These trends are nowhere more apparent than in the eighteen-month-old regime of President Joaquín Balaguer. Balaguer, it will be recalled, was the former puppet President under Rafael Trujillo. He came back from exile and defeated, in the June 1, 1966, elections, another former President, the democratic-leftist Juan Bosch, who also had been at least titular leader of the "constitutionalist" forces in the 1965 revolution.

Any assessment of Balaguer's first year and a half in office is bound to be mixed. On the more positive side, there is little doubt that many things are booming or at least becoming more settled in Santo Domingo. The amount of building construction is both visibly and statistically impressive. Optimistically proclaimed by Balaguer as the "Year of Development," 1967 was the best year yet for Dominican tourism (a dubious blessing, as the Puerto Rico-like "coca-colonization" of the country continues). Water systems, road construction, electrical power expansion, school building are all going forward. Balaguer's strict austerity program has begun to have an effect, and a measure of confidence has been restored. By almost all indicators, 1967 was not an especially good year economically, but ground was gained.

The economic recovery is being accomplished in large part thanks to a huge influx of United States money, men and materials—seemingly to make amends for the disastrous military intervention of 1965. The number of U.S. Government personnel here (between 600 and 700, excluding the Peace Corps) is exceeded in this hemisphere only by the force in Brazil; in terms of density it is by far the largest in the Americas. The United States is backing an immense number of projects, and the amount of money being spent, now beginning to slack off because of the Vietnamese pinch, is also huge. The Dominican Republic is receiving more U.S. aid per capita than any other country in the world.

Most U.S. personnel are highly skilled and experienced technicians, military and civilian. They thus fit in nicely with the present nonpolitical, economic development orientation of the Alliance for Progress. The goal of promoting social change in the context of democratic political development has been abandoned. Thus the present U.S. effort, though often well-meaning and staffed by the best AID people available, is being carried out in a political vacuum; it therefore makes little real impact, and is bound ultimately to fail. It is meaningless to speak, as the U.S. team does, of apolitical agrarian reform, an apolitical labor movement, and apolitical armed forces in a country as highly politicized as the Dominican Republic. Indeed, almost all projects and proposals acquire a political connotation whether the United States wishes it or not. By trying to divorce economic growth from political modernization (or by adhering to a simplistic State Department definition of political development as meaning only "free" elections and a "loyal" opposition), the United States is being both unrealistic and ineffective.

It seems likely that Walt W. Rostow's The Stages of Economic Growth: A Non-Communist Manifesto and his subsequent adaptation of the "stages" concept to considerations of foreign policy and assistance have had too much influence on official U.S. thinking and actions in recent years. Stemming from this work, as well as from that of sociologist Seymour Martin Lipset, is the idea that if only the United States can raise the economic level of the underdeveloped nations by pouring in ever-greater amounts of dollars, political change will inevitably follow. As these societies develop economically, the argument runs (admittedly oversimplified): the middle class will grow, ideology will decline, politics will become more moderate and pragmatic, and eventually "they" will become "just like us." Most scholars of development now realize that such correlations do not necessarily hold and that the political variable is probably more important than the economic. Happily, the lag between social science findings and government action seems to be lessening, but meanwhile the United States plunges ever deeper into a program that is known to be based on false assumptions.

The very size of the United States mission in Santo Domingo has important political implications. As C. L. Sulzberger of The New York Times has pointed out (when speaking of Brazil), a very large number of U.S. personnel stationed in a country insures more and more meddling in affairs that should be—and as easily could be—left to the host nation. All the AID, MAAG, State Department, Defense Department, USIS, Peace Corps, etc., personnel in the Dominican Republic must justify their presence with ever more projects and activities. The inevitable result is an unjustifiable amount of meddling in all aspects of Dominican internal affairs.

From the Dominican point of view, the United States dominates Santo Domingo. The troops which came during the revolution have been pulled out, but U.S. advisers now operate with almost all Dominican military units. The people are convinced that the green berets, sometimes posing as Peace Corpsmen, and probably other special counterinsurgency forces are here, though the embassy denies it. The CIA continues to maintain a beefed-up staff, while AID representatives have been known to sit in on Cabinet meetings. The large American colony has made the housing shortage worse than ever, and rents and prices for many items have zoomed. Almost all Dominicans, whether they approve or not (it is usually the business and military elements who approve), believe that the United States, not President Balaguer, is running the country. It is clear to Dominicans of all political shades that their country has become if not a colony of the United States in many respects, then certainly a dependency.

Embassy political officers flatly deny that interpretation—and, curiously, their view is also correct. For while the United States exercises enormous influence in Dominican affairs, its power, paradoxically, is also extremely limited. Washington has found that it cannot compel a government to adopt a policy to which it is manifestly opposed or which it views in a different light—unless the United States is willing to take over that government completely. Thus, while the United States is practically sovereign in some areas (such as the Dominican Office of Community Development), it can do little more than make suggestions in others.

President Balaguer's position regarding the U.S. presence in his country is interesting. Though hardly a dramatic or caudillo-like leader, he is a remarkably able and realistic politician. Being a realist, he has acquiesced in the U.S. influence with few apparent misgivings. He is nationalistic in his public pronouncements, yet seems to offer no resistance whatsoever to the fact that some of the major decisions have been taken out of his hands. He may well believe that the best thing for the country, as well as for his own political future, is to "let the Yankees do it."

Balaguer has, furthermore, been very skillful in managing the political issues within his range of decision. He has juggled appointments with remarkable acumen. Extreme rightists and leftists alike have been effectively "exiled" to diplomatic posts abroad. In the first days of this year, for example, the vitriolic newspaper editor and radio commentator, Rafael Bonilla Aybar, who had helped engineer the ouster of Juan Bosch's constitutional government in 1963, and who since the 1965 revolution had been refused readmittance to the country, was appointed Dominican consul in Puerto Rico. At the same time, the more able and moderate leftists and rightists have found a place in his government.

Balaguer's policies and programs have, in the same way, been designed to alienate as few as possible and satisfy as many as possible. His constitution offered something to the Left as well as to the Right, and remained silent on many of the issues that have proved controversial in earlier constitutions. Further, Balaguer has benefited from that fact that his is an elected government and therefore has a claim to constitutionalism and legitimacy. In what may be a significant development, however, the principal opposition group, Bosch's Dominican Revolutionary Party (PRD), has recently stated that the government has forfeited its claim to constitutionality because terrorism and violation of human rights are rife in the country. The PRD once launched a revolution against an illegitimate and unconstitutional government, and some people are betting that it is thinking along those lines again.

Though Dominican nationalists are convinced that the United States is running this government (and though it may be true in an ultimate sense), my own impression is that at least on a day-to-day basis Balaguer is in most respects still his own man. Physically the parallel seems ludicrous, for Balaguer is a meek, thin-shouldered little man who looks the bookish historian that he once was, but politically one cannot avoid being reminded of Lyndon Johnson. Balaguer apparently eats, sleeps (he is a bachelor), and lives politics; the government does nothing without political calculation. As a political technocrat who knows his people and their motivations intimately, Balaguer has had no equal since Trujillo.

Balaguer's style is to talk softly, appear meek and defenseless, listen to everyone, take advice from no one, and make most of the major decisions alone. In some ways, he is downright cute. At the opening of Santo Domingo's impressive industrial exposition, he delivered a speech, designed to lure foreign capital and reassure Dominican entrepreneurs, in which he said that the United States simply would not permit a second Cuba or another Castro-like revolution in the Caribbean. The point here is not whether this statement is true (it is, of course) but that Balaguer should say such a thing publicly. The statement embarrassed the U.S. Embassy; it also severely shook the PRD, who fear that if this is indeed U.S. policy, the United States will again use the "Communist" issue to prevent, by force if necessary, any fundamental restructuring of this country.

Whatever social and political structure survived the disintegrative 1965 revolution is currently being destroyed or undermined. The person of Balaguer—fragile though he appears—is about all that holds this country together. If he should be assassinated (Balaguer himself has talked of it), or be overthrown by the military (always a possibility), the Dominican Republic would likely again disintegrate into revolution and civil war. There are no groups or institutions that in a crisis could hold the country together. The armed forces are disinclined to govern and incapable of doing so. Balaguer has not built up his own political apparatus, the Partido Reformista; it remains wholly personalistic and would surely dissolve if he departed. The women governors whom Balaguer appointed in all twenty-six provinces are, as he well knew they would be, largely figureheads. Congress is wholly subservient to the President, while the Cabinet and other high government posts are staffed by representatives of many feuding political groups. The budget of the law courts has been severely cut and they are unable to act with complete independence; the President continues to harass the Autonomous University of Santo Domingo, which is now for the first time attempting to become a real university. The labor movement remains weak and highly divided. The Revolutionary Social Christian Party and its labor, student and peasant arms, which many view as the "party of the future," remains just that—and the future is probably distant.

Meanwhile the only well-organized political group in the country, the PRD, is itself disintegrating. It is being destroyed both from within (largely by Bosch himself) and from without (by constant and systematic oppression). The exiled Bosch has hurt the party by his disturbing writings—first the theme of "dictatorship with popular support," and now the idea of "Pentagonism as a Substitute for Imperialism." As ideas, these themes may have some validity but politically they would undoubtedly best be left unsaid. Bosch has never made up his mind whether he is a politician or an intellectual, but it is clear that he cannot be both at the same time. On the other hand, police oppression and intimidation of PRD leaders and followers, both in the countryside and in the cities, is systematically wiping out the party. Balaguer is either not able or not eager to curb police atrocities. The PRD may well become like the Apristas of Peru—a reform-oriented party permanently relegated to the opposition because neither the Dominican armed forces, the Church hierarchy, the ultra Rights in the business community, nor the U.S. Embassy will permit it to come to power. Bosch's "neo-Leninist" pronouncements and bitter factionalism within the party itself have not helped.

Similarly, Balaguer's own programs and policies have not helped to create the required national structure. Their motives are so political that the impetus to do something is lost in the tactics. The post-revolution "emergency plan," for instance, financed largely by the United States, did little except build beautiful boulevards and other "showcase" projects in the capital. The agrarian and other basic reforms are being managed by U.S. technicians who make ever more grandiose studies (more than $1 million spent just in studies), with the result that the necessary social and political reforms continue to be indefinitely postponed. The Dominican people, however, are not willing to wait much longer. It must be emphasized that the U.S. intervention, the provisional Presidency of Héctor García Godoy, and the election of Balaguer represented only an interruption of the 1965 revolution; nothing was resolved.

It is discouraging to observe that the United States seems condemned to repeat the same mistakes again and again. I have lived, worked and studied in this country: in 1962, during the post-Trujillo Council of State government, in 1964-65 during almost the entire Donald Reid Cabral-headed Triumvirate regime, in 1966 during the transition from García Godoy to Balaguer, and now again in 1967-68. I observe U.S. officials acting today in almost the same ways as they did in previous years. Agrarian reform, for example, a key aspect of social and political transformation, has gone ahead hardly at all during this entire period. Land surveys have covered the same ground time and again, and now a new and expensive aerial survey is being pushed by AID officials. The Dominican Republic does not need more land surveys and feasibility studies; it needs a political decision: to divide up the former Trujillo estates among the land-hungry peasants. Improved breeding techniques, agricultural extension services, elaborate credit unions, etc.—which this country can now ill afford—could easily wait.

The government of the Dominican Republic and the U.S. Embassy are largely standing still, while the Dominican people become ever more radical. They are no longer content with the status quo, but have acquired demands and wants of revolutionary proportions. Balaguer has not been able to meet these demands; and in the eyes of increasing numbers of Dominicans it is the United States and its conservative Dominican allies which stand in the way of change. This may or may not be true; the important point is that Dominicans think it true. A revolution of very bloody proportions and of far-reaching implications, nurtured by continued squalor, frustration, disease, misery, oppression, bitterness and terror is building up; it could make the 1965 upheaval look like a Fourth of July celebration. The Dominican Republic is calm and peaceful on the surface and its people retain their affability, but a cauldron is boiling underneath—and with reason.

I stress again that the problems are more political than economic. U.S. policy and the Alliance for Progress, based on erroneous assumptions about the nature of the development process and underestimating the degree of revolutionary fervor sweeping the underdeveloped world, seem sterile, unimaginative, and probably self-defeating. However, the present orientation of U.S. policy is likely to prevail, at least into the foreseeable future; we have become virtual prisoners of our own myths. If this is disastrous for the Dominican Republic, it is no less so for the United States.

HAITI: PRISON COMPOUND

FRANCIS B. KENT

Mr. Kent, a correspondent for the Los Angeles Times, has for the past four years been reporting on Latin America from a base in Rio de Janeiro.

Port-au-Prince

The civil servants at Haiti's François Duvalier Airport could not be more polite or accommodating. A $2 tourist card gets you quickly past Immigration, and an affable inspector in the Customs section waves you on without bothering to look into your bags.

The occasional tourist or businessman can spend weeks in Haiti without seeing the slightest indication that President Duvalier has converted this little country into a prison compound. On the other hand, he could be introduced quickly to the facts of life. Not long ago, an American reporter arrived at Port-au-Prince, checked in at a well-known hotel, and went to bed thinking of his work schedule for the following day. Before dawn he was awakened by security agents, hustled from the hotel, and held under guard until he was put on board the morning plane for Miami. This represents perhaps the mildest form of official brutality in Haiti. Much more common is assassination—on the streets in full daylight, or in some dark lane in the hills above Port-au-Prince.

In the ten years since François "Papa Doc" Duvalier came to power, Haiti's 4 million wretched citizens have come to know fear as a constant companion. To provoke Duvalier or his henchmen is to invite torment, if not death. The enforcers are everywhere, roughly one to every 350 people. There are 5,000 soldiers in khaki, 7,000 militiamen in blue denim, and no one knows for sure how many thugs and informers in the Tonton Macoute, Duvalier's personal secret police force.

Members of the Tonton Macoute (the term comes from an old nursery tale and is best translated as bogey man) are found in the army and in the militia, but many wear no uniform except for the outsize sunglasses that have come to be associated with terror. Some work as bartenders, cab drivers, and at other jobs that bring them into contact with the public.

Nowhere, except in the most private of circumstances, does conversation go beyond trivia. When the talk turns to politics, the Haitian's face goes blank. He volunteers nothing and answers questions in guarded monosyllables. Only the most sophisticated, the European-educated elite, will discuss politics or economics, and then only after being assured that nothing is to be attributed to them.

Fear and violence have not come recently to Haiti. They have been commonplace since the African slaves rebelled and won their independence from France in 1804. Today, conditions are little better than at any time in Haiti's 164 years of independence. A great many of the country's best thinkers have fled abroad, and many who could not escape have sought asylum in one or another of the foreign embassies in Port-au-Prince.

Raw, unrelieved poverty is rampant. Beggars in filthy rags roam the streets looking for tourists who come in ever-dwindling numbers. Shoes are a luxury and children often wear no clothing at all. At every hand are the sick and the dying, suffering with yaws, elephantiasis, hookworm, syphilis.

Statistics are spotty and frequently unreliable, but figures published by the Organization of American States put Haiti's per capita income at about $70 a year. Even this figure may be misleading, for it is estimated that 95 per cent of the population lives wholly outside the money economy.

Unemployment is staggering. The available work force is reckoned at 2.5 million, but only 57,000 have jobs. Of those, more than half are on the government payroll. Semi-skilled labor is available at 35c a day.

The gross national product has declined steadily since 1962, along with investment both public and private, while external assistance has virtually dried up. U.S. aid, once an important factor in the Haitian economy, is now represented by a token contribution for malaria control.

Government revenues have dropped more than 20 per cent in the past five years, due primarily to the loss of tourist traffic. Government officials complain that the U.S. State Department persuades American tourists to steer clear of Haiti. It is more likely, according to a hotel owner in Port-au-Prince, that American travel agents hesitate to recommend Haiti for fear that a client will be caught in some unpleasantness.

The odds, however, are heavily against the tourist's meeting up with the Tonton Macoute. Haitians for the most part are gracious and charming, quick to smile and quick to serve. Accommodations are excellent and advance hotel reservations, at least at present, are completely unnecessary. It is a fine vacation spot for those not offended by tyranny and destitution.

"Papa Doc" Duvalier, the slight, harmless-looking former physician who oversees all this, is a difficult man to sort out. Those who have known him down the years say that as a young doctor he worked tirelessly to help the poor. Yet he seems to show no compunction when it comes to mistreating his enemies, either real or imagined. He is said to go often to the basement of the Presidential palace to look on as his thugs work over a prisoner.

He receives reporters from time to time, according to no discernible pattern. Early last year he seemed eager to be interviewed and was as accessible as a U.S. Congressman. At present, though, his door is closed; two reporters recently hung on for weeks in Port-au-Prince, awaiting word from the palace that never came.

Is Duvalier secure? Can he hold on until age and failing health catch up with him? The evidence weighs heavily in his favor, although like all men in his position he is threatened constantly. Despite a rash of rumors that his heart is weakening and that he complains of other physical ailments, he looks as healthy as the next man of 60. On ceremonial occasions he shows himself to the people, but otherwise he stays within the white, flood-lit walls of the palace, which is fenced with iron and closely guarded.

There is no formal opposition to Duvalier's Party of National Unity, and elections are meaningless. After municipal elections in 1964, Duvalier announced that the

In An Early Issue

Our foreign policy toward Japan has a long but largely unexplored history—perhaps because it has been so consistently unsuccessful. In "The Third Time Around," to be published here soon, Walter LaFeber suggests that we are about to commit, for the third time running, the basic mistake that has always scuttled our diplomacy with Japan. Mr. LaFeber, of Cornell's History Department, is the author of The New Empire and America, Russia and the Cold War. His article, "America's Long Dream in Asia" (The Nation, November 6, 1967), won wide and admiring attention.

results had given him an overwhelming mandate and he therefore decreed himself President for life. Still, occasional incidents must be unsettling to the old man. Just last December the second in command of his terrorist gang, one Elois Maitre, was publicly shot down at the airport. Maitre survived, as a hopeless cripple with a bullet lodged in his spine. A month earlier, five men held up the Royal Bank of Canada in Port-au-Prince, getting away with $78,000 in Haitian currency. In what has been called a "bite-your-nails economy," $78,000 is a substantial sum of money.

What makes these incidents particularly interesting is that the submachine gun figured in both, and automatic weapons are not commonly found in the hands of anyone but members of the army, the militia or the Tonton Macoute. If men authorized to be in possession of submachine guns were at work here, it suggests that Duvalier has problems within the palace guard; if either or both assaults were staged from outside the official household, the inference is that unfriendly elements have unsuspected firepower.

Another incident touched closer to home, and was not open to speculation as to the principals. Duvalier's son-in-law, Max Dominique, who was a lieutenant colonel in the army and had been named ambassador to Madrid, arrived in Spain last August but, even before presenting his credentials, was ordered back to Port-au-Prince and put on trial for treason. He had been plotting, according to reports in Haiti, with fellow officers, nineteen of whom were put against a wall and shot. Dominique and his family fled to Switzerland.

Scarcely a month later, trouble erupted on the North Coast, near Cap-Haïtien. The Cacos, as the mountaineers in the north are called, were demonstrating against deteriorating conditions brought on in part by the abandonment of sisal plantations and mills.

Duvalier dispatched several hundred militiamen to the area, then ordered in about 150 troops of the elite Presidential guard. The latter were promptly demobilized and ordered to their home villages. According to reports in Port-au-Prince, the dismissed guardsmen were all Cacos and regarded as untrustworthy.

If there is a pattern to all this, it surely makes a worrisome picture for Duvalier, who at times must think of the many Haitian leaders who in the past have come to violent death. One, Vilbrun Guillaume Sam, was dragged from under his bed and thrown to a mob that hacked him to pieces, then paraded his parts through Port-au-Prince. That was only fifty-three years ago.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Havana Cultural Congress

HELEN YGLESIAS

Quite in advance of its opening session on January 4, the Havana Cultural Congress, a meeting of intellectuals of the world on the problems of Asia, Africa and Latin America, was judged by our State Department to be a spurious propagandistic device and out of bounds for U.S. intellectuals. Though there was considerable interest here in attending the Congress, through a combination of Cuban inefficiency in getting the invitations out in time and State Department shenanigans, the presence of a number of prestigious U.S. intellectuals was effectively discouraged. In the end, those who were lucky enough to obtain both a Cuban invitation and State Department validation to travel to Cuba, were required to sign an affidavit promising that they would not "participate in any meeting, convention, conference or other function while in Cuba, as a public speaker, delegate or other participant."

Cuba's propaganda aim in calling the Congress was transparent enough: to win friends, to break through the frightening isolation in which it more and more finds itself, and to make direct contact with leftist theoreticians and artists in those countries (capitalist and Socialist) where its official ties are bad or worsening.

The U.S. State Department quarrel with the Congress (I am being deliberately disingenuous; another objection would surely have been found if other circumstances had prevailed) began with the Congress' theory that intellectuals are scientists, publishers, technicians, agronomists, educators, doctors, cameramen, public health workers, as well as artists, writers, dancers and film directors. (The State Department complained that the Cubans had invited far too many U.S. doctors, for example, though they were not better disposed to permit Robert Lowell, Andre Schiffrin or Oscar Lewis to attend either.) The official list of Congress delegates (incomplete and in some cases wildly misspelled) numbered 470 participants from sixty-five countries. Just a sprinkling of some of the names of the delegates should reveal the patent absurdity of the State Department ruling that the Havana Congress did not qualify as a bona fide cultural event.

Spain's delegates included poets Blas de Otero and Gabriel Celaya, publisher Carlos Barral, painter Antonio Saura, film makers Juan Antonio Bardem and Jorge Semprún (La Guerre Est Fini).

France had sixty-six delegates, including economist André Gorz, lawyer Gisele Halimi, journalist K. S. Karol, physicist Jean Pierre Vigier, cartoonist Maurice Siné.

England's delegation of twenty-two included art critic Sir Herbert Read, ballet critic Arnold Haskell, historian Eric Hobsbawm, playwright Arnold Wesker.

Italy's delegation numbered twenty-five and included publishers Guilio Einaudi and Feltrinelli, novelist Luigi Nono.

From the Americas, among others were Andre Gunder Frank of Canada, Julio Cortázar (Hopscotch) of Argentina; sociologist Garmán Guzmán, novelist Gabriel García Márquez, whose novel A Hundred Years of Loneliness is a best-seller in Colombia; painter Roberto Matta of Chile; poet Aime Cesaire of Martinique. Mexico's delegation of twenty-four included muralist David Alfaro Siqueros and economist Edmundo Flores.

Hans Magnus Enzensberger, poet and critic, came from West Germany. Prince Norodom Renarddik, son of Sihanouk, came from Cambodia. There were delegations from the USSR, Laos, Korea, North Vietnam and the NLF of South Vietnam. China was notably absent, though an invitation had been sent.

The Congress listed twenty-one U.S. delegates, but there seemed to be no method or much accuracy to the listing. Some had come without U.S. permission and were participating as delegates; the SNCC group, an SDS group and four scientists, one of whom, Dr. Roy John, reported an earlier Cuban trip in The Nation of March 14 and 21, 1966. The official list included, among others, Jules Feiffer, cartoonist, writer and playwright; David Dellinger, editor of Liberation and anti-war leader; Saul Landau and Richard Moore, film makers of the documentary on Cuba recently televised on N.E.T.; Tana de Gamez, whose novel The Yoke and the Stars is based on the story of the Cuban Revolution; Irwin Silber, editor of Sing Out!; Barbara Dane, folk singer; Jose Yglesias; Robert Scheer of Ramparts. There were other Americans in Havana as well. I ran into Saul Gottlieb of Evergreen Review, Tom Hayden, Harry Ring of The Militant, Ronald Steel.

The living, for foreigners, at the still lush Havana Libre (formerly the Hilton) where we were taken, was easy indeed. There was an abundance of food, drinks, coffee, popular combos in the restaurants and bars of the hotel; and though we heard about the gas rationing, there were always cars or buses to take delegates for little side trips. We had a certain amount of free time every day and the scholarship students who served as guides were very encouraging about our visiting around as much as possible. Cuba sees itself as a revolutionary showcase for the world; nothing pleases Cubans more than a visitor who wants to see for himself. For me, it became a chance to see what changes had taken place since early 1961 when I was last there.

The city of Havana surprised me by being much more beautiful than it had been. It literally sparkled in a dazzlingly clean whiteness against the blue skies and water of the bay. The Malecon has been much improved; particularly from the Vedado section to old Havana, this broad, curving drive along the bay had a depressingly slummy look seven years ago. Though the old crowded buildings are still there, they have been repaired and painted, and the streets are much cleaner. The disturbing changes are in old Havana. Avenues of empty shop windows are a shock, no matter what preparation one has had for the sight. The special life of the old area of the city is altered too. There seemed to be fewer people in the streets; the many street vendors with their portable kitchens selling every conceivable variety of hand-eaten food are gone, and so are many of the sidewalk counters where one could get a 3c tiny cup of black coffee, everybody's radio filling the street with loud, popular Cuban music. Gas rationing has cleared from the narrow gutters of the city whatever cars were left, and it has also cut into the neon and street lighting. The result is a feeling of listlessness and darkness in the old city, an enormous contrast to the verve of 1960 and 1961. I recall that back then when I asked a passer-by for the time, he replied joyously, "Five o'clock, revolutionary time." I did not expect that sort of response now, not because "revolutionary time" has passed but because it has gone into a different phase.

A proof of the danger of generalizing on the basis of one occasion in Cuba, however, was the utterly changed character of the streets on the following evening when Congress delegates were invited to attend a performance of the Cuban National Ballet in old Havana. We were applauded by crowds of pleased Cubans watching the foreign visitors arrive. The performance itself was a stunning surprise. It included the new ballet, Carmen, created by Aurelio Alonso and danced by his wife, Alicia Alonso. It is a work which merits inclusion in the programs of the best ballet companies of the world, and is already part of the Bolshoi repertory, danced by Plisetskaya.

There was still another occasion in old Havana at a concert given by Raimón, a young Catalán singer from Valencia who is banned from singing in Spain. The concert was free and the enormous marble hall was full of people who came and went as they pleased whenever a song ended. Many brought their children with them. In the discussion period which followed the concert a Cuban spoke: "I was born in Valencia and I studied at the Luis Vives Instituto. Tell me how it is with the proletarian struggle in Valencia and tell me about Puerto Sagunto where my father was assassinated."

The man's question made a connection with the Congress which jumped into place for me with his reference to the Spanish Civil War. Congresses are boring; microphones, mimeographed papers and formal speeches in three simultaneously translated languages seem to rob the most brilliant company of their wits; but this Congress had almost nothing in common with usual meetings of academics or artists. Its spirit was a reminder of the great conferences held during the struggle against fascism, when it was the belief among the best intellectuals that what they did was supposed to connect with what they said and wrote, and that both carried some importance for their struggling fellow men. It is an assumption which has long been unpopular in the United States and which is just beginning to be talked of again.

For an American, entering the world of the Congress and of Cuba is to step through a mirror, where all assumptions are reversed. During the first day, I found myself starting at the frequent use of words like "comrade" and "Communist," an indication of the tension for Americans surrounding even the terminology of socialism. But I became used to absorbing recurrent shocks to my American sensibilities. Some were delightful, like the sight of payless telephone booths. One was extremely painful, as when I shook hands with the smiling NLF delegate, eager to meet an American who would come to Cuba—the physical presence of "our enemy" making me want to shed my American skin. At the same time I suffered the most contrary and painful responses to the violent diatribes directed against U.S. imperialism. If the State Department had followed a wiser policy they would have allowed the presence there of thoughtful dissenting voices like those of Christopher Lasch, Noam Chomsky or Mary McCarthy, allowed to attend without a strangling affidavit. Or are we seriously being asked to stop all dialogue with the Socialist and Third World and just slug out our differences?

Of the five working commissions of the Congress, I spent most of my time at the one discussing the responsibility of intellectuals to the Third World, listening for echoes of my own concerns in the statements of other "Western" visitors. The Congress addressed itself to a very wide group of questions; if I concentrate on the anti-U.S. imperialist views given, it is because such views overwhelmed the Congress and are of greatest interest to those of us who live in the heart of what was being dissected and reviled. Sometimes the landscape was described most bleakly even by Westerners. Irwin Silber of the United States called us the "ultimate triumph of 'Western ideals,' the ultimate 'sanctuary of the free world,' the core of imperialism . . . a land of deep unhappiness today. . . . And the arts—the glittering, flamboyant, high-pressured, meaningless creative arts of the United States—have become terribly sad reflections of a living death or the terrifying overture to imperialism's final hymn."

Christine de Rochefort of France went further than I cared to be carried. Speaking of the destruction of conscience in the Western intellectual, she exhorted the Third World:

" . . . do not trust me. Do not trust my words, nor anything I have. I am ill. Contagious. The only sanity I have is that I know I am ill. And those who think they are not ill are the most seriously ill."

This was not the tack taken by Jean-Paul Sartre who would have been a Congress "star" if a severe attack of arthritis hadn't kept him from coming. He sent a message which was interesting, beyond its expression of open solidarity with revolutionary Cuba, for its plea to the Third World to find a use for what could be valuable in the despised (by them) alien culture of oppressor nations. He warned of possible mistakes made "in the zeal of the struggle," mistakes which would "impede the cultural development of freemen" because they might discard some useful tools of Western thinking.

Sir Herbert Read also sounded a warning:

"To preserve a balance between the personal and the universal, between the local and the national, between the national and the international, such is the problem of the artist in our society. The danger is that we attempt to reverse the organic process in which the work of art originates; we begin with a social or 'mass' concept of art and try to impose it on the aberrant personality of the artist. . . ."

But the prevailing view was perhaps most eloquently expressed for the West in a message by Ernst Fischer of Austria:

"None of us from the Old World should pretend to teach you; we have grown up under other conditions. . . . In spite of that, we are united by a decisive bond: the confirmation of the world revolution, this long, incalculable, bloody and bloodless transit which reasserts itself through errors and knowledge . . . towards a world worthy of man; the conviction that the economic and military rulers of the United States have become the main enemy of the peoples, that the major task of every revolutionary strategy is to destroy its power, to prepare its collapse."

It was this view which culminated in the Havana Appeal, a special final resolution pressured for, interestingly enough, not by the Cubans but by Ralph Miliband of England. It called upon "writers, men of science, artists, teachers and students to join and intensify the fight against imperialism and to take up the part which is theirs in the struggles for the liberation of the peoples of the world. This commitment must begin with an unqualified rejection of the policy of cultural subjection of the United States, and this implies the refusal of all invitations, scholarships, employment, and participation in programmes of cultural work and research, where their acceptance could entail collaboration with this policy." [Italics added.]

The appeal touches upon a nerve much exposed lately and particularly painful to Latin Americans. They have been quarreling among themselves about the right and wrong of Pablo Neruda's trip to the P.E.N. Congress held in New York in the summer of 1966 and his subsequent acceptance of a decoration from the President of Peru; and Cuban intellectuals have mounted a major campaign against Mundo Nuevo, a literary publication edited by Emir Rodríguez Monegal, sponsored by the U.S. Ford Foundation, and concentrating on winning to its pages Latin America's leading leftist writers. Lajpat Rai of India seized this question and shook it until it rattled another set of bones:

" . . . for such 'leftist' intellectuals in these days of peaceful coexistence, the doors of the Socialist world are also open to the same measure. They are at equidistance from Washington and Moscow; they are at equidistance from the Congress for Cultural Freedom on the one side and the Afro-Asian solidarity move-

CRISIS

"Love is sometimes revenge, n'est-ce pas?"

*You knew perfectly what I meant in the moment—
Yet you pretended not to see,
that I might doubt
And explain again, get stammering mad and cry my self defense—
You stood injured and beautiful, dead wrong, yet certain in your woman's truth—
It began with Vietnam and ended with the blood of
My childhood on your hands.*

CLEVELAND MOFFETT

ment on the other. It is not uncommon in India for a 'leftist' intellectual to attend an economic seminar in Algeria or Moscow where U.S. imperialism is denounced as an enemy of the peoples of the Third World and a few weeks later to proceed to the United States with his family on a U.S. foundation scholarship to enjoy la dolce vita in the dollar land. Last year, twelve out of the thirty-five leftist scholars who had criticized the proposal for the Indo-U.S. Educational Foundation, themselves accepted research grants, professorships and fat scholarships from various U.S. agencies"

These were not the only struggles reflected at the Congress. In an ugly and amusing incident which created the topic for gossip for the following day, some French Trotskyists passionately upbraided Siquieros (apparently for his role in leading an armed attack on Trotsky's house long, long ago) and one young woman worked herself up sufficiently to kick the noted Mexican muralist as he stood on the steps of the art gallery waiting for the doors to open for the official reception. Closer to home, SNCC delegates made a point of dissociating themselves from U.S. whites. They accepted a drink, but then filed out one by one from the luncheon party to which all U.S. visitors were invited by the Minister of Education and president of the Congress, Jose Llanusa. Nor did they allow the camera to record their presence alongside U.S. whites at a reception for U.S. visitors given by the NLF Vietnamese delegates; they covered their faces by holding up open books, apparently brought for the purpose. And at one of the commissions, Latin American delegates lit into the reports of delegates from the USSR and Eastern European Socialist countries as clear signs of their insufficiently revolutionary outlook.

There were, too, ripples of some discomfort with the ardent picture of the revolutionary intellectual as a guerrilla seeking death in the manner of a Che Guevara, in response to which Roberto Fernandez Retamar of Cuba quipped that he was impatient with those intellectuals who "when they hear the word gun, reach for their culture." In the final resolution, there was some modification of the very strongest concepts and the intellectual was called upon not necessarily to seek out death, only not to flinch from it should it come. (In response to a request from a group of Cuban cartoonists, Jules Feiffer portrayed "The Intellectual as Guerrilla Fighter" as a jaded, elegant man, seated at a pool-side dining table, enormous sunglasses pushed up on his forehead, languidly sipping a frozen daiquiri.) Still, there was no doubt as to the gripping appeal of the example of Che Guevara for most Congress delegates and for the people of Cuba.

Che Guevara's portrait is displayed throughout Havana, and at the plenary sessions of the Congress and at rallies, appropriate passages taken from Che's writings were the major slogans. That the portraits are beautiful and the slogans felicitous is part of Cuba's special style, a style which dominated the freedom, seriousness and revolutionary vigor of the conference and which flowed on out into the streets of the Rampa, on which the hotel is situated. The Rampa, a broad avenue which leads to the sea, is modern Havana's main drag. "Coppelia" enlivens one end of the street. It is an architecturally charming and playful ice cream parlor rivaling Howard Johnson in the number of flavors served. Neon lights hung in the center of the Rampa crossway indicate what's happening: an easel for the art exhibition, a tragic and comic mask for the theatre. Parisian-looking signposts point out the direction of restaurants, movies, night clubs, exhibitions. Every window along the street is utilized as an exhibit for crafts, books, propaganda; the electronic music, which makes up part of the extraordinary Pop art exhibit on imperialism and the Third World, fills the street with a holiday or fair sound. The content of the shows I saw was astonishingly sophisticated.

The art exhibit, housed in a building which was converted from Havana's former fashionable funeral parlor, contained nothing that could be remotely described as Socialist-realist. The works are free-wheeling in a variety of experimental styles; the gallery itself is something of an experiment, combining a café, art show, discothèque, book shop and piped sound in a gay complex which the director insisted must not be called a gallery: "We want it to be a natural place, where nothing happens formally."

The Third World exhibit further down the Rampa combined film (an old Tarzan movie is run forward, then backward, for a hilarious comment on a popular Western concept of an underdeveloped country), comic strips, graphics, lights, sound and even live lions, giraffes and flamingos to stunning effect, culminating in a glorification of the guerrilla and Che Guevara. The building itself, which is a permanent installation for exhibits, makes brilliant use of closed and open space, drawing the viewer in from the street without effort—so that seeing the exhibit becomes an extension of the walk along the avenue. It is free to the public, and the crowds literally poured through. There was a good deal of discussion among Congress delegates about the exhibit, some finding it too harsh and direct in its anti-U.S. imperialist message, others wondering if it wasn't too subtle for the average Cuban to make anything of it.

This open, grasping experimentation is evident everywhere in Cuba. For Cuban artists, it is a natural result of their experiences. Many of them spent years in the United States, England or France. Alicia Alonso, Alejo Carpentier, Alfredo Lam, Edmundo Desnoes, Pablo Armando Fernandez are only a few of the names that come to mind. Combined now with a fierce nationalism and new revolutionary concepts, Cuban art is an explosive force, not confined to studies but put to the widest uses of the revolution. That Cuban propaganda should turn out to be a model of good design was one of its greatest surprises.

There have been struggles within Cuban arts to maintain an open approach, but at the moment the freest expression seems secure. The Congress displayed on its platforms not only Cuba's avant-garde artists but its politicians and old-line Communists Juan Marinello, Nicolás Guillén and Carlos Rafael Rodríguez, coexisting as Jorge Enrique Adoum of Ecuador said "in a new Cuban style . . . with only one limitation, expressed by Fidel Castro in 1961: 'Within the Revolution, everything; outside the Revolution, nothing'; and complying with Che's slogan: 'To serve the people presupposes quality; beauty does not clash with socialism.'"

What is so attractive in Cuba is the health a society generates when it is open to innovation and social experiment. It was the quality most admired, I think, by the Americans present and most puzzling to delegates from Socialist countries, who cannot reconcile Cuba's revolutionary political stance with its relaxed cultural openness.

But Cuban independence is nothing new, even if it pays for it, as seems to be the case at the moment, with a position of total isolation. In his final address to the Congress, Fidel Castro conveyed a strong sense of Cuba's isolation. He thanked the delegates for coming and said that Cuba would never forget that men and women of prestige had come from all over the world to discuss the problems of the Third World. It seems to be more to the point to wonder how the men and women of prestige, once back home with their unfriendly governments, would remember Cuba. At the end of a long tiring day, one of the delegates got into a slight fuss with our 18-year-old guide, a political science major and Young Communist Party member who prided himself on his understanding and militancy. The delegate became impatient with the explanations of the guide and suggested to him that none of us there needed these long political harangues; we understood the aims of the revolution. It angered the young Cuban. "Let's see what you write when you return," he said.

For a Norteamericana, a bad conscience about Cuba is unavoidable, given our joint histories, and it makes it difficult for us to realize that they care much less about us and our reactions than they do about their own independence. Cuba wants friends, of course, but it wants them without strings. The report that oil had been discovered on the beach outside Havana, while the Congress was in session, was greeted by my Cuban friends with a joy which had much more to do with the possibility of independence from the Soviet Union than with the prospect of being able to drive a private car again. What Cuba wants is the right to go on inventing itself; what it wants of others is even simpler—to keep their hands off.

In Moral Disarray

THE DISSENTING ACADEMY. Edited by Theodore Roszak. Pantheon Books. 304 pp. $6.95.

THE MORALITY OF SCHOLARSHIP. By Northrop Frye, Stuart Hampshire and Conor Cruise O'Brien. Edited by Max Black. Cornell University Press. 88 pp. $4.50.

NEIL COMPTON

Mr. Compton is chairman of the English Department at Sir George Williams University in Montreal. He writes frequently on contemporary culture and the popular arts.

The term "dissenting academy" has an honorable history. After the Restoration of 1660, the great English schools and universities lapsed into a century and a half of relative intellectual torpor, a condition exacerbated by the Test Act (1672) which closed them to those unwilling to participate in the Anglican sacraments. As a result, various non-conformist sects established their own educational institutions. The curriculum at many of these dissenting academies was so superior to that followed at the establishment schools and universities that many enlightened members of the aristocracy sent their offspring there to be educated.

Three hundred years later the universities of North America are in danger of drifting into irrelevance as their English prototypes once did. For all their wealth and apparent influence, they are in a state of moral and intellectual disarray.

No one is excluded from them on religious grounds, of course (though heretical political views may invoke a degree of persecution), but cultural and educational deprivation effectively keeps out thousands. Those who do gain entrance find themselves caught up in a huge, impersonal and often meaningless process. Discontented students and teachers are expressing dissent from the academic establishment's view of both curriculum and conventional scholarship through teach-ins and "free universities."

However, the dissenting academy contemplated by Theodore Roszak and his contributors, in this first of a series of "anti-textbooks" to be published by Pantheon, is not some new kind of educational foundation but the existing intellectual community, liberated from paralyzing servitude to the political and cultural status quo. The book's eleven essays are devoted to critiques of the way in which the major humanistic subjects are taught at American universities. Their cumulative indictment of the profession of scholarship, as it is now practiced, is a heavy and dispiriting one, particularly to academics who, like me, were once inclined (privately) to congratulate themselves upon not being as other men are.

The essays on politically useful social sciences provide the greatest fund of horror stories. Marshall Windmiller reveals that in 1967, the executive director and treasurer of the American Political Science Association served concurrently as president and vice president of the CIA-supported Operations and Policy Research, Inc. Kathleen Gough gives a detailed account of the distorting political circumstances under which anthropologists (many of them quite happily) have to do their work these days, and describes the weird perversity of "applied anthropology" and such exercises in "insurgency prophylaxis" as Project Camelot. According to Robert Engler, it is quite common for political scientists leaving government service (particularly RAND), and seeking university posts, to report to prospective employers that most of their "publications" are classified. M.I.T. has even awarded higher degrees on the basis of classified theses. As for Gordon C. Zahn's account of the vagaries of personal and intellectual freedom at some Catholic universities, it would pass for light relief if one could forget the victims' suffering and frustrations.

Noam Chomsky, whose celebrated essay on "The Responsibility of Intellectuals" is the last and best thing in the book, also wins the prize for the most hair-raising example of academic frightfulness. He quotes the testimony of Prof. David N. Rowe, Director of Graduate Studies in International Relations at Yale, before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in 1966. Rowe suggested that the United States buy all surplus Canadian and Australian wheat so that there will be mass starvation in China: "Mind you, I am not talking about this as a weapon against the Chinese people. It will be. But that is only incidental. The weapon will be a weapon against the Government because the internal stability of that government cannot be sustained by an unfriendly Government in the face of general starvation." There speaks a humanitarian scholar in the great tradition inaugurated by the "author" of Swift's Modest Proposal!

If this book is a portent, we may be witnessing the end of the end of ideology. Both the heroic myth of the Olympian disinterested scholar and the more homely image of the multiversity as a kind of academic supermarket are roughly handled by all contributors. Taking a sideswipe at "the narcissistic obsession of modern literature for the self," Louis Kampf rather stridently abuses independent scholarship as "a mask for the commercial activities of the academic bureaucracy." Deprived of its roots in normative judgment, political science degenerates into mere system maintenance and adaptation, according to Christian Bay; in the limp jargon of value-free social science, even the revolutionary passions inspired by a Fanon or a Guevara can be neutralized and classified for the computer as the expression of "anomie interest groups." Sumner Rosen demonstrates how "commercial Keynesianism," like Freudian revisionism, emasculates a seminal theory and neatly evades the necessity to consider painful realities.

As befits his discipline (philosophy), John Wilkinson contributes the most elegant, astringent and convincing of the essays on individual academic specialties. It is also the most depressing. Wilkinson shows how "the civilization of the dialogue," upon which democracy depends, is gradually being subverted as more and more research passes into the control of "mission-oriented" agencies, to the extent that (among other disasters) "nearly all the top twenty multiversities are arms factories which would have staggered the imagination of Herr Krupp or Sir Basil Zaharoff." Wilkinson's one glimmer of hope is the continued survival of such dialogue-oriented bodies as the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, of which he is a member.

The panaceas of other contributors inspire less confidence. Roszak himself is eloquent about the exemplary "humanitarian meddling" of the 18th-century philosophes and encyclopedists, but his attempt to translate their particular style into the terms of 20th-century academic life is not entirely convincing. Staughton Lynd's call for the historian to accept the existential role of prophet, creating scenarios not of what will but what can be, is a moving one, but this is certainly not a model of their primary task which even all radical historians would accept.

Though I was about as well disposed a reader as any author or publisher could wish when I began The Dissenting Academy, I must confess that the cumulative effect of many (not all) of the essays was to arouse fears that disillusion with orthodox scholarly methods is driving some academics close to a dangerous irrationalism—a mirror image of the aberration that brought us to this pass. Yet I had to agree with the critiques of the present mode of pseudo-objectivity.

Consequently, it was a relief to read the three lectures in The Morality of Scholarship, which confront exactly the same problem in a less polemical spirit than the Roszak essays. It seems to me that Northrop Frye comes close to resolving the apparent dilemma in his lecture on "The Knowledge of Good and Evil." He begins by asserting "the principle, which is also a moral principle, that every discipline must be as scientific as its subject matter will allow it to be, or abandon all claim to be taken seriously." After some cogent illustrations of this need for intellectual detachment, Frye goes on to argue that the virtue of impersonality becomes the vice of indifference as soon as its context becomes social rather than intellectual. Scholarship must be tempered and directed by "what we may call, with the existentialists, concern . . . something which includes the sense of the importance of preserving the integrity of the total human community." Concern "has nothing directly to do with the content of knowledge, but . . . it establishes the human context into which the knowledge fits, and to that extent informs it."

To my mind, Frye's formula enables us to diagnose every intellectual disease described in The Dissenting Academy without jettisoning man's 2,500 painful years in pursuit of objectivity. It also offers an active and positive ethic for the scholar. In the last resort, however, concern is a civic rather than a purely academic virtue. A man's profession is only part of his life, and scholarship cannot by definition be a substitute for higher loyalties. Some great scholars have been very bad men. The last words of Frye's lecture may serve also as the last words of this review: "The scholar as man has all the moral dilemmas and confusions of other men, perhaps intensified by the particular kind of awareness that his calling gives him. But qua scholar what he is is what he offers to his society, which is his scholarship. If he understands both the worth of the gift and the worth of what it is given for, he needs, so far as he is a scholar, no other guide."

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

It has been said that Peter Nichols' A Day in the Death of Joe Egg (Brooks Atkinson Theatre) is about the breakup of a marriage that has produced a spastic child. If this were all there was to it, I doubt that I should find the play interesting or even tolerable. It would be clinical and much too special.

The child, the sight of which we are more or less spared, serves as the play's fulcrum. But to confuse the device with the theme would be grossly to misunderstand it. Its value and fascination lie elsewhere.

The child's deformity (a stupidly callous doctor in the play speaks of it to its mother as a "vegetable") should be seen as the misfortune of a particular marriage. But many marriages are weighed down and sometimes destroyed by terrible burdens. In Camus' The Plague the epidemic which quarantines a town is employed as a symbol for all pervasive evil; its story consists of the various reactions to evil. In Joe Egg the child who plagues the marriage of Bri and Sheila is the peculiar burden they have to bear; the play's scheme drama-

The story of Asia's "gateway"

A HISTORY OF BURMA Htin Aung

A native Burmese scholar recounts the exciting history of his nation — a country nestled between giants — which has been, from kingdom to colony to today's independent state, the "gateway" to southeast Asia and China.

$12.00 at better bookstores

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
440 West 110th Street
New York, N. Y. 10025

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

VOL. XII, No. 1 WINTER 1968

STEPHEN A. SHAPIRO

The Ambivalent Animal:
Man in the Contemporary British and American Novel

JAMES W. DALEY

Psychoanalysis, Science and Philosophy

ERNEST R. HILGARD

Creativity: Slogan and Substance

HENRY S. KARIEL

Toward a New Rhetoric of Social Reform

ANSELM ATKINS

Walker Percy and Post-Christian
Search

DAVID L. NORTON

Art as Shock and Re-beginning

CHARLES MITCHELL

Melville and the Spurious Truth of Legalism

Subscription Rates:

$1.00 for single copies

$3.00 a year (4 Issues); $5.00 for two years

Available from bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall,
Michigan State University,
E. Lansing, Mich. 48823

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413

Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

2-19-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

tizes the different kinds of adjustment the various characters make to it.

The situation is painful, but the play is a comedy: it provokes considerable laughter. It is an odd comedy: everything about it is wrong, its form is askew. It oughtn't to work. But it does. That is its originality.

The curtain is up as we enter the theatre, but instead of the stylization one might expect in that case, we see a fairly realistic setting. A musical combo ambles across the stage and disappears. Only the pianist remains visible throughout and, as the band's leader, repeatedly strikes up mild jazz riffs. Then Bri (short for Brian) appears, dresses down the audience as if it were a prep school class. Bri is a teacher. He then moves into the household setting and the play proceeds for a bit as a normal naturalistic piece.

Bri's address to the audience has set up a convention. From time to time, each of the characters (including the spastic girl) breaks away from the others and speaks about him or herself and the rest of them: for the most part, these monologues are quite funny. At the end of the play Bri, who has twice attempted to bring about the child's death, finally succeeds in doing so. He then abandons his unsuspecting wife.

Shocking or pathetic, you might suppose; not at all. One observes the play with eyes much more sardonic than tearful. But it is just in this, our impassivity, that the artistic victory lies. The method is not Brechtian. Brecht's soliloquies (usually songs) do not make any personal comments on the "story"—they stand apart from it—and function as the drama's oblique reflection. In Nichols' play the action would scarcely be intelligible if the characters did not explain their attitudes and behavior. For example, Bri tells us beforehand that he is going to leave his wife. Sometimes he and his wife enact past events necessary for exposition and then as actor-characters add further comment on what we have just seen happen, as if the whole episode and the play itself were a public demonstration.

Nichols intends the audience to take a cold, if you will a heartless, view of the matter. He demands no commiseration or identification with his characters: he wants you to regard them as phenomena—objects for the entertainment of your intelligence. He doesn't expect you to do anything about it: how can you? It's a show. Brecht wishes your understanding to rouse you to judicious steps of social consequence. Nichols might be following Coleridge's "law" which runs: "There ought never to be more pain than is compatible with co-existing pleasure, and to be amply repaid by thought."

Nichols' disposition is eminently contemporary and thoroughly English. It is at least as representative of England today as Osborne's Inadmissible Evidence. It is a new wrench to the proverbial British "stiff upper lip." In a larger sense Joe Egg makes a point about present middle-class life almost everywhere.

Bri is bright, he has a trace of talent as a Pop art painter, he has been coddled by his silly mother and by the mediocre comfort or middling discomfort of his run-of-the-mill circumstances. He has no feeling for his job. His nonchalance about his wife's premarital promiscuity derives as much from moral unconcern as from generosity of spirit. She has told him about her numerous affairs because they no longer count in her or anyone else's eyes. She's a nice enough person and she is good in bed: what more need he know or care?

Apart from their mutual worry about their sick child they share very little. What little leisure they have they hardly know what to do with except for the telly and the flicks, and he behaves as though he would be permissive if she had a little fling on the side. He has no real friends because he has no vital interests. The one thing he cannot endure is trouble. He isn't equipped to face up to life, which is always and everywhere centered in the puzzle and dilemma of suffering. He must run away.

We meet his mother: nondescript, proper, combining routine respectability with a built-in obtuseness in relation to life's "inconveniences." She is both niggling and correct with her "immoral" daughter-in-law. She dotes on her son, in fact he takes for granted and without gratification. Bri's friend is a tidy "Socialist" who wants to be helpful with mechanically rational advice while he mouths the clichés of the "advanced"; he thinks any situation can be taken care of by the perquisites of the welfare state. His semi-frigid wife is indifferent to everything but her own family's well-being.

It isn't British to complain. Like most of us today they have learned to snicker. They will not moralize: it is square to preach or to grow indignant. What Nichols implies but never declares is that the cream of this disastrous jest is that life is absurdly empty unless it is confronted and embraced in all its inherent anguish. Only in that way can living be good. But the rule of "common sense"—which the English are presumed to have in abundance—leads only to wretched farce.

The direction by Michael Blake—more and the performances are excellent. One cannot speak of "ensemble": the nature of the play's structure impedes the possibility of interplay. But as individual figures all of the actors are admirable.

Albert Finney as Bri is almost too large and powerful a personality—there is something “epic” about him no matter what he does—for the tormented mite Nichols has written. Yet his very stature as man and player raises him above the intrinsic pettiness of his role, of which a more literal performance might create the impression of a dimly small play. Playing Sheila with nary a hint of sentimentality, Zena Walker conveys the whole environment. Joan Hickson as Bri's mother seems a comically effaced effigy on a memorial to home and hearth. John Carson is the unflappable Socialist to the bone. And Elizabeth Hubbard as his wife, the impeccably but bloodlessly sensible helpmate and housekeeper, is perfect.

A sharp and perceptive play, A Day in the Death of Joe Egg makes a remarkably sobering evening in the theatre.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Kenneth Loach's Poor Cow is playing at three New York theatres: clearly it hits a responsive chord. What that may be is not easy to say, but I suspect that it is somehow connected with the quite erroneous supposition that the film is “real.” The claim to unflinching realism is made even before the title appears on the screen: a child is born, all wet and bloody, right out from between its mother's thighs. The virtue of such a scene, if it has any, rests on its actuality; we witness a moment of authentic human experience and, if we find that the onlooker role has been edifying, do not inquire into its artistic authenticity. But of course Carol White, who here plays the heroine, is not giving birth; it happened, sure enough, but it happened to someone else.

And so it goes with the whole picture. Nell Dunn, who wrote the novel from which it was made, and also Up the Junction, has a gift for documenting the underside of contemporary London. Her young whores and thieves and factory girls are dull, ignorant and squalid, shuffling through a routine so featureless, and suffering blows so catastrophic, that only numbness keeps them sane. Miss Dunn presents their speech and behavior with an appalling implacability that is the “art” of her work; she intensifies the meager content of her material by limiting the field. Erskine Caldwell pointed out years ago that the most banal scene takes on a kind of magic when viewed through a knothole. Miss Dunn knows the trick.

Mr. Loach does not. Instead of focusing down on the script, he tints it and fluffs it and fills its background with all kinds of “interesting” furniture and walk-on characters until it looks more like fashion photography than hard-core poverty. There is a rousing bout of cops and robbers (whereby the heroine loses her husband), a stern judicial scene (whereby she loses her lover), there is a hot embrace under a waterfall, there are sheep in a meadow, old women eating ice cream cones, a voyeurs' photography workshop (“Can we have it just a bit more off the shoulder, Miss?”), the sociology of the pub and the cunning habits of the sturdy boy whose first moments we stumbled in upon at the opening and who thrives surprisingly on a diet of fried potatoes and neglect.

These matters are sufficiently photographic in a travelogue sort of way, but what the film is about is the life of a slum girl who is too indolent to work and incapable of making the grade as a prostitute because she persists in giving away her stock in trade. Miss White, all spruce and quick and with a new hair style in almost every scene, is obviously not that girl.

It requires genius to make drama out of vacuity (you must be at least as talented as Beckett), and I doubt that there was ever much chance for the idea behind Poor Cow. But the worst possible way to go about it was to tart up the script with pop jollification and the attendant fashions of subtitles and direct address of the audience, pretending that the result is either theatre or life. This is not a movie; it is a waxworks.

TELEVISION

JOHN HORN

The A.B.C. television network has announced that it would not cover the national conventions this summer from gavel to gavel. Instead, A.B.C. plans to telecast ninety minutes of nightly highlights. It is the first time since 1952, the first year of network television, that any of the three commercial networks will not telecast the Presidential conventions from beginning to end.

The A.B.C. move was dictated by a major cutback in its news budget after the collapse of the company's planned merger with the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation. A.B.C. will save an estimated $3 million by curtailing convention coverage for which, at the time of announcement, it did not have a sponsor. A.B.C. is a poor third in the three-way network competition for both audience and advertisers. C.B.S., second since 1960, does not yet

This Book presents a hard, inside look into the “Facts of Life” and Death, of our actions in Vietnam!

$2.95 (Paperback)

$4.95 (Hard Cover)

This book was commissioned and published by the National Committee of Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam

332 pages

David Schoenbrun, formerly Chief Correspondent for CBS News says:

“In the Name of America” discloses an American crisis and issues that must be faced by every responsible citizen.

To whom are the President of the United States and his subordinates responsible for charges of violating the supreme law of the land and thereby their oath of office? What can be done to restore the rule of law in America?

Any compromise on these issues risks the destruction of the principles upon which our society has been built.

The news dispatches of our activities in Vietnam, contained in this book do not make pleasant reading. Their cumulative effect is overpowering for they establish something few of us have known—that American conduct in Vietnam has been characterized by consistent violations of almost every international agreement relating to minimal standards of human behavior in time of war.

When we measure American actions in Vietnam against the minimal standards of constraint established by the Hague Convention of 1907, the Geneva Conventions of 1929 and 1949, and the Nuremberg Trials, our nation must be judged guilty of having broken almost every agreement to maintain standards of human decency.

“In the Name of America” is a Must!

Available at book stores, Regional Offices of the American Friends Service Comm., or use this order form.

Check or Money Order Must Accompany Each Order

Clergy ■ Laymen Concerned About Vietnam
475 Riverside Drive (Room 547) - New York, N.Y. 10027

Enclosed is $ _____ for Paperback copies ■ $2.95 ea.
Enclosed is $ _____ for Hard Cover copies at $4.95 ea.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

have its convention coverage fully sponsored; N.B.C., the front runner, does.

A.B.C.'s action means that this year's continuous live convention coverage may be television's last. These quadrennial shows have not been good journalism or good business; they reflect the anxiety of all three networks not to alienate either major political party. Now the gentlemen's agreement not to compete for the big audience during the conventions has been broken. If, as expected, A.B.C.'s regular or special early evening entertainment programs during the convention weeks run away with the major audience (local entertainment programs have always rated well against network political coverage), C.B.S. and N.B.C. will have to respond to the competition. Once a struggle for the big audience is started in what has been noncompetitive, public service time, the end is predictable.

There are those in television, journalism and politics who will not mourn the eventual commercial network abandonment of gavel-to-gavel convention coverage. Some argue that the networks don't really provide such coverage anyway, most of the time being spent by correspondents talking with one another or to potential news makers off the convention floor. Others point out the enormous duplicative waste and lack of viewer choice in having three networks at the conventions from oyez to amen. More waste is cited when the three networks fully cover conventions of little news value. The in-the-bag Goldwater and Johnson nominations of 1964, for instance, hardly required full, on-the-spot coverage.

Still others maintain that how the networks cover the conventions is their own journalistic business, but that a television seat at the conventions should be provided the nation's voters. Full convention coverage is a public service, not a journalistic decision. Free enterprise did not create the situation of three-network coverage of conventions; a tacit understanding among the networks did.

A.B.C. has acted cautiously, conservatively and unimaginatively in this matter. Its decision to provide ninety minutes of convention coverage nightly is a careful retrenchment designed not to offend the Democratic and Republican National Committees. If it had announced entertainment programming, interrupted by convention coverage when warranted by the news, it would have been professionally faultless, and would also have had better options. Some convention nights are so dull that a few minutes are all that are necessary.

The A.B.C. move does threaten to open again that family closet last unlocked by Fred W. Friendly when he resigned as C.B.S. news president two years ago because his network thought its interests better served by sponsored reruns of I Love Lucy than by unsponsored coverage of Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on Vietnam. Perhaps the Congress will finally be stung into facing the question of whether such an attitude is adequate to the task of keeping the American people informed when it sees its national conventions relegated to routine coverage on regularly scheduled network news programs.

LETTERS (continued from page 226)

a catharsis, when in fact the Dec. 6 demonstration Swanston discusses reflected the total breakdown of communication and trust between radicals and administration. The student-Left charge that the convocation was co-optation Shover dismisses as a kind of block on the way to the convocation. But Windmiller stated in print that one reason for the convocation was the need to avoid a violent confrontation between military recruiters and student activists.

Windmiller most recently led the academic lynching of Prof. John Gerassi for participating in the Dec. 6 incident. Gerassi's action resulted in his being fired by President John Summerskill over the head of a faculty committee appointed by the executive committee of the academic senate. The faculty committee decision—it has been widely leaked throughout campus—was to reinstate Gerassi 3 to 1. Windmiller's mystique of the autonomous university is not only unhistorical but is shattered by the presence of the military-industrial complex on campus. In leading Gerassi's dismissal, Windmiller obviously attaches more importance to the military standards he condemns in his article—power, obedience, centralization of authority—than the academic values he advocates: truth, skepticism, tolerance and mental discipline. Unlike other less liberal institutions which have barred military recruiters from campus, at State, ROTC and war recruiting go their merry way, the administration relying on PR from sympathetic faculty for a veneer of freedom.

The title of David Swanston's article, "How to Wreck a Campus," is tendentious to begin with. What kind of urban campus is it that had 11 per cent black student enrollment three years ago, and now has 3 per cent? SF State handled the Experimental College as other universities have: finances it, uses it and then pulls its teeth. Furthermore, it remains to be seen whether campus activists work without mass student support, since Summerskill recently acted as State College system henchman by signing warrants for the arrest of eleven students and one faculty (Gerassi) who participated in the Dec. 6 protest. All those under complaint are campus activists, out of over 300 involved in the demonstration. Swanston's description of what happened at State is simply blown out of proportion. He says that there are four versions of the Gater incident but earlier accepts Gater's own interpretation, whereas no one knows what happened in the newspaper office—a fact Swanston conveniently ignores, along with the presumption that accused are presumed innocent. If, Dec. 6 occurred as Swanston tells it, San Francisco police chief Cahill would have had to come on campus with uniformed police (plainclothes men and police photographers were ubiquitous that day). The quality of radical leadership at the college is very high; so high that radical organizations refuse any longer to be deceived by the administration. The split on campus is not between Left-Right but between the supporters and critics of Summerskill—i.e., between the advocates and opponents of liberal bureaucracy, exemplified by Windmiller's friend Summerskill attempting to sell his paternalistic methods of student council to the State College Board of Trustees. Summerskill pleaded before Reagan & Co. that his methods were more effective than other means of student control. He said he had worked to isolate radicals from other students by granting some demands and denying more substantial ones.

Common to all three whitewashes is the liberal myth of San Francisco State College as an island of freedom in an unclean world, personified by attentive President John Summerskill. If nothing else, the firing of John Gerassi and the signing of the twelve warrants indicate that SF State is not only in but of the world.

Richard Fitzgerald, History Department
Anatole Anton, Philosophy Department

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The Swanston piece on San Francisco State (where I teach) is the one really accurate piece of reporting and speculation I have seen. It is a fine and just report.

Kay Boyle

An Indispensable Guide To A Richer Understanding Of The Fateful Changes Confronting World Jewry Today

Midstream

A MONTHLY JEWISH REVIEW

Each month our readers are offered a thorough examination of the complex problems affecting Jewish life.

Recent issues have included these important contributions, which have stimulated widespread discussion:

- I.F. STONE RECONSIDERS ISRAEL by Marie Syrkin, Joel Carmichael and Lionel Abel
- THE CHANGING AMERICAN RABBINATE by Arthur Hertzberg
- TWO STORIES by S.Y. Agnon
- IDA KAMINSKA AND THE YIDDISH THEATRE by Harold Clurman
- MIDDLE EAST DIALOGUE—The Struggle for Peace
by Joel Carmichael
- THE RIFT BETWEEN ISRAEL AND FRANCE by Joel Marcus
- THE CIVIL WAR IN NIGERIA by Audrey R. Chapman
- RUMANIA'S RESISTANCE TO THE SOVIET UNION by Joel Marcus
- NEGRO—JEWISH RELATIONS IN AMERICA: Complete issue devoted to a symposium on this subject by 27 leading contributors. Since published as a book by Macmillan under the title "NEGRO AND JEW—ENCOUNTER IN AMERICA"
- THE BALFOUR DECLARATION 1917-67. An historical analysis
by Richard H.S. Crossman, M.P.

Special Introductory 1/2 Price Offer!

DON'T DELAY

Midstream is a must for every American desirous of understanding the critical issues of Jewish life in America, Israel and throughout the world.

MIDSTREAM 515 Park Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10022

Enter my subscription to MIDSTREAM at the Special New Introductory rate—1 year for only $3.50. (A 50% savings on newsstand price).

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP

☐ Payment enclosed

☐ Bill me

Friendly Dissuasion

NATHAN SILVER

Mr. Silver is an American architect who teaches at the Cambridge University School of Architecture. He is architecture critic of the New Statesman.

Cambridge, England

DEAR SIR: I was gratified at the space you gave to Stephen Zoll's review of my book Lost New York [The Nation, December 25]. Then I was stunned to see Mr. Zoll go on for most of his piece discussing things remote from the book's central objective, which was the presentation of a record, some souvenirs of lost architecture. I'm tempted to claim that the polemical message he finds in the book is a complete surprise to me, but since he has read my words as well as looked at the pictures, that's probably as useless as a smuggler looking innocent when a load of watches are discovered in his traveler's bag. Mr. Zoll heard the ticking among my souvenirs, and I may as well come clean.

Well then, I do believe that the right way for change to occur in existing cities is by changing the weakest elements. I even suggested a means test for old buildings: usefulness, with use measured, ultimately, by an appraisal of relevance of the particular human endeavor to the uniqueness of the place (just to take matters beyond a strictly functionalist or economic rating). These are rather romantic-sounding phrases, clearly conservative (no politics implied) in their nature. But though I put them tentatively, relevance of endeavor and uniqueness of place could well be the basis for some necessary community standards about fitness in urban building.

We can't pretend any concern about the man-made world and all the props and scenery of existence unless some values are asserted with respect for change—it is to be hoped that such values would also give their due to progress and enrichment, as well as protection against culture-shock. Behind this is my belief that continuity is not only expedient but essential in any existing city; all the long argument about what is or isn't useful then naturally follows. Continuity? Of course. And not only for nostalgia's sake. Re-uses of buildings aren't "against the logic of history," as Zoll says: for all its changing, New York—like most present cities—is predominantly a 19th-century city. Survival of so many old buildings in prosperous New York is at least circumstantial evidence of continuing vitality and good use. If the old-law tenements deny it, they always did—the brownstones, brick row houses and loft buildings affirm it. We haven't lost many of the old things we still can use. If we go on valuing them, why not identify and conserve them?

Le Corbusier in When the Cathedrals Were White, which I discussed and Zoll cites, found New York a nice place to visit because he was always surprised by the changes. From this Le Corbusier concluded that everything could and ought to be begun again: that the permanent condition of New York was change. But, save the master, it's a disastrously incomplete canon. The permanent "condition" of any existing place is both continuity and change. Failure to see the continuity part of things is a terrible blind spot that we have been inheriting for several generations now. And, to digress only slightly, the blind spot is currently manifesting itself in fields of invention and production other than urban building. A writer in a recent issue of the British magazine Design says this:

What do we see if we take a bird's eye view of our efforts, as engineers, architects, planners and industrial designers, to influence the recent course of human evolution? Taking as examples such things as cars, trains, electric [appliances], houses, dishwashers and the like, we see a series of products, services and buildings that are well suited to their markets but ill suited to the conditions brought about by their use.

The writer goes on to cite commercially successful cars which cause congestion and delays and a growing number of deaths and injuries, new housing developments inhibiting social contacts and creating loneliness, dishwashers too noisy to use in open plan houses, electrical appliances causing power cuts if used simultaneously, and so on. He concludes that present design techniques deal well with the situation that exists before a product is launched, but fail to take account of the situation that is created by the "new thing."

This difficulty is analogous, if not identical, to the problem that has come up in cities. Somehow the notion has taken hold that change is the only thing worth our concern and effort, so we have enthusiastically developed a planning machinery that is rigidly bent on replacement, instead of one that is exploratory and flexible. Even when it is operating piecemeal, the result is often a conflict where the ongoing environment is chafed and stung by changes, and these exasperated sites in their weakness fall victim to further change. The whole current process is a good example of the British writer's point about designs that are well suited to the market, but ill suited to make the best of the new situation. And the new situation, of course, should come about while being thrifty of resources—material and human—if it is to have true value.

When I mention "planning," I mean not only the work done by a bunch of professionals with zoning maps and T-squares but the schemes for all kinds of urban development. In New York most of the city is at the disposal of private owners, no matter how much

Election Year Special:

For a dime a week, join "the subscription list that reads like a who's who of Washington?"

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Controversy—not "consensus"—in articles like these...

"No more Nonsense About Ghetto Education!"
by Joseph Alsop.

"Nixon's Return Engagement"
by Gilbert A. Harrison.

"What Ails America?"
by Hans Morgenthau.

"Hitched to LBJ?"
by The Editors.

"Walt Whitman Rostow"
by Alex Campbell.

"Limits of the New Left"
by Christopher Jencks.

"Freak-Out in Chicago"
by James Ridgeway.

"Who's to be Born?"
by Robert Coles.

"Harlow in Hell"
by Richard Gilman.

"Pooh as GOP Candidate"
by Henry Fairlie.

"Scar-Spangled Banner"
by Stanley Kauffmann.

Continuing Coverage of
the Drug Scene
by David Sanford.

"Albee at the Crossroads"
by Robert Brustein

...and regular features like these

- TRB's weekly comment
on the Washington scene
- Stanley Kauffmann
on films
- Robert Brustein on drama
- Osborn, Mauldin, and
Feiffer cartoons

Newsweek said it, describing New Republic readers. Describing The New Republic itself, Esquire said, "it can still be counted on for meaningful outrage." The New Republic gets talked about, even by other magazines.

We'll probably stir up more talk this election year. Seldom have we had so much to be outraged about.

New Republic readers know that from now through November they'll get fiercely independent, often angry, opinion on LBJ, Nixon, Bobby, Rocky, Barry, Ronnie, Romney, and company—opinion they can get nowhere else. And they'll get behind-the-scenes reporting of facts they can get nowhere else, too. (Esquire went on to say about us, "Their sources are excellent, credibility high.")

Since, frankly, we'd like as many voters as possible to get as mad as we are, we are making what could be called a meaningfully outrageous Election Year offer—48 issues of The New Republic at half the usual subscription price.

If you accept this offer, you'll be covered through election day and into the all-important post-mortems. And not only will you keep on top of the campaign, you'll keep on top of all the other meaningful things going on—in Vietnam, the Black Power movement, our cities...in what's left of the anti-poverty program...as well as in the world of books, films, plays, art, and music.

Our hope is that you'll get mad with us. But if you get mad at us, judging from what Newsweek said about our subscription list, you'll be in good company. Either way, there never was a better time to start getting mad at somebody—about something important.

1/2 PRICE:

ELECTION YEAR
SUBSCRIPTIONS
48 Issues—Just $5.00—
1/2 Regular Yearly Rate

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Subscription Dept., Box 525
381 West Center St., Marlon, Ohio 43302

- ☐ O.K., New Republic, I'll join you this Election Year. Send the next 48 Issues (a full year's subscription) for just $5.00 (1/2 the regular subscription price; a saving of $14.20 on the newsstand price).
- ☐ Let me first see what gets everybody so excited. Send the next 18 Issues for just $2.00 (my check is enclosed).

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE
Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 28 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

"McCarthy in '68", "Reagan ■ Lassie in '68", "Dump Johnson in '68", "LBJ for Ex-President", "RFK in '68", "The Governor of Alabama is ■ Mother", "Draft Beer, Not Students", "Kill for Peace", "Stop the War", "Ban Napalm", "Give LBJ the Bird", "Make Love Not War", "Studying Causes Cancer", "Legalize Pot", "Incest Begins at Home", "Chaste Makes Waste", "Hands Off Tim Leary", "Make War on Poverty, Not People", "Sex Before Finals", "Apple Pie Makes you Sterile", "Melt General Hershey". King-Size bumperstrips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-N, Chicago, Ill. 60690

MAKE LOVE NOT WAR

Metal, 2 kinds/$2; Peace Bumper Strips, 12 kinds/$2; Pencils, 7 kinds/25¢-1; Hoffa for President ■ Impeach Johnson disc & rulers, 12/$1, 100/$5. Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151

PREVIOUSLY married and singles professional club meets at each others homes for socializing. BA/BS minimum requirement. This is not ■ money-making venture. Box 607, c/o The Nation.

IMPROVE YOUR ■ as much as 30 points in a few hours with these simple tricks, secrets and exercises based on actual tests. Amazing results! Satisfaction guaranteed. $2. Madison Grand Central Station Box 2296-N, N.Y.C. 10017

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

HIP AMERICANA — posters — postcards. For color brochure mail 25¢ to: AMERICAN NEWSREPEAT COMPANY, P.O. ■ 18214, San Francisco 93118.

"LBJ DARTBOARD GAME." A giant 14" solid cobra construction dartboard with LBJ's face as the target (or Reagan, Bobby Kennedy, Sigmund Freud, Nixon, Nasser, Wallace and DeGaulle) is yours for only $3.95 postpaid. Three precision brass darts imported from England are included for your bull's eye accuracy. Send check or money order to: TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-V, Chicago, Illinois 60690

NEW WINDOW LOCK—helps "burglar-proof" your home or apartment. Heavy gauge anodized aluminum lock fits all single-hung and sliding aluminum windows. Window ■ also be locked in partially open position for ventilation. Padding prevents marring. Easily installed. $2.98 ppd. R. H. Downs Company, Dept. N, 645 Second Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74¢ ■ line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

they are subtly influenced by government powers (back to that in a moment), and Zoll rightly devotes considerable attention to the economics of development. He views the increase of land value as the root cause of demolition. In my book I made an effort to consider all sorts of indications of potential change: neglect, fashions in land values, expendability, specialization, new technical and management requirements, changing cultural values. Barely half of my items are related to land appreciation, but I would gladly compliment Zoll's notion that this is the cause of present urban change if that was as far as he took it. (The proposition is at least arguable. Curiosity about this role of land appreciation in demolition has just led me to make a little content analysis on the buildings in Lost New York—buildings which I originally somewhat arbitrarily selected on the basis of ■ personal appraisal of merit or interest. I judged "land appreciation" as the main reason for demolition in sixty-six cases, with "any other reasons" accounting for sixty-one. Ten or more were in doubt. "Any other reasons" included all things that lost their uses most precisely due to factors other than, or in advance of, land appreciation, even if it could be claimed that land appreciation ultimately cleared the site. This seemed fair. "Land appreciation" was the overwhelming cause of replacement of houses and churches, but since a new use for the land almost always appeared first, this might be called the root cause. I favor mixed use, but to preserve mixture in the face of unequal economic power there could be a lesson here about the merits of persistent use zoning.)

Zoll goes much further, simplifying change as a classic conflict. He sees the buildings illustrated in Lost New York as "a heartbreaking list of casualties in the battle between the economic flux-mongers and the cultural order-doctrinaires." The orderlies in one camp at the doctrinaire flagpole are people interested in "imposing order," maintaining that "excellence should be immutable," concerned about the "morality of change." (I emphasize the categorical set-up words.) The other camp holds the fluxionaries, presumably a more progressive lot because while New York wantonly destroys itself it also (but as a result?) creates more jobs, a larger tax base and greater services for its citizens. The dichotomy is absurd, though I won't belabor it except to note that culture is not at all something you either opt for, or out of. Culture would prevail if either of Zoll's warring camps won. In New York especially, it is just safer to show concern rather than indifference. Culture is the meaning of Mumford's "in the city, time becomes visible," which doesn't describe secondary characteristics.

Developers do develop and Zoll equates their reflexes with progress, or at least justifies them by saying that "New York is a monument to money." Behind the progress equation lies the fallacy that continuity somehow obstructs change. His justification worries me even more. Economic growth has luckily been true for New York so far, though there are many signs that a shift is occurring and there are plenty of cities where growth has stopped. Financial incentive for development is no excuse for a laissez-faire attitude toward what sort of development takes place. At present (I quote myself), "government powers exist not only in overt planning, but covertly influence every property decision. . . . But proper application of powers is everything." Through our systems of zoning, taxes, building and fire and health regulations, rent control, planning and preservation laws, we already do indeed determine where land shall appreciate. The trouble is that the powers are contradictory where they could be uniformly in support of public policy.

There are plenty of historical examples of cities that prospered with intensive controls exercised over urban land. Medieval guilds imposed authority on vast urban tracts; London has resisted radical change partly because central land has been leased rather than sold. The merits or faults of these systems needn't concern us here: the point is that there have been and will yet be, many kinds of successful urban economic structures. To insist that an unregulated land market (if we could ever return to one!) would always be best for progress, economic advance or advantageous city form is about the same as saying that Victorian family life ought always to be the model for society.

Continuity and change, control and laissez-faire—my little marginal polemic in Lost New York boils down to a belief that individual goals and objectives in a city must not conflict with community goals and objectives, or else must be subordinated to them. I presented a case for some of those objectives; I think it's no good for Zoll to pretend that we haven't any community goals besides getting rich. If I read him wrongly about that, at least I wish he would have recognized the forces that do already manipulate urban land economics. We have them now. We might be able to rebuild the slums he mentions and obtain the mortgages he wants, harnessing economic enterprise in the bargain, solely by wielding those forces intelligently; at the moment it seems to me we are ignoring what they could do for us, and what they are doing to us.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1237

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Their early routes used to help sustain young America. (4,6)
- 6 The way of 24? (4)
- 10 Certainly not old wine for the Festival.
- 11 Beguile. (7)
- 12 The flag of the Irish? (4)
- 13 Spread them evenly, and with feeling.
- 15 Hazardous speculations during the late league's sessions. (7)
- 16 Did Southerners lack the main strength to lift one? (7)
- 17 Sharpened, or kept inside and given proper attention. (7)
- 20 During the musician's strike, it might sound rather wooden. (7)
- 22 It's possible to follow the thread in the air of such organs. (10)
- 23 Raised loaf, by the sound of it. (4)
- 25 From full to round? (7)
- 26 What it pertains to should be flowing wine. (7)
- 27 But he probably found his office less than paradise. (4)
- 28 We should go to the old city court to point such a seizure out. (10)

DOWN:

- 2 Doesn't sound as though it has high connections, but it happens every day! (3,4)

- 3 and 1 down It's just a question of responsibility! (4,7,3,5)
- 4 Contracts for crops? (7)
- 5 Not any place that is presently present.
- 7 The listener might give particular attention to the account. (7)
- 8 With 5, it might make the Navy tend to this occasionally. (5,3,3,4)
- 9 Acts traditionally elephantine? (9)
- 14 One of those we have read about turning unto a star. (9)
- 18 If one saw Hanoi so mendacious, inside wouldn't you find it offensive? (7)
- 19 Desired laughs, in a way, but not with encouragement. (7)
- 20 Less green. (7)
- 21 It should be spirited, perhaps with a twist of the market in one. (7)
- 24 Does the girl sound as though she's been on a Boston diet? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1236

ACROSS: 1 Toil and trouble; 9 Audubon; 10 Polymer; 11 Excess; 12 Rest stop; 14 Staples; 15 Cadge; 17 Somme; 19 Trowels; 21 Air lifts; 23 Parget; 25 and 8 Neck and crop; 26 Spinose; 27 Reverse English. DOWN: 1 Tragedies; 2 Induces; 3 Ambuscade; 4 and 22 Dunsinane; 5 Repression; 6 Unlit; 7 Limited; 13 Platitudes; 15 Cremating; 16 Eightieth; 18 Miracle; 20 Signori; 21 Aunt; 24 Isle.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

FROM PEKING & HANOI: Mao Tse-tung's "Quotations" & "On People's War," both famous little red books for $1.00. Ho-Chi-Minh's "Prison Diary," 75c. Subscription to Peking Review, 52 weeks, air, $4.00. Subscription to Vietnam Courier, 26 weeks, $5.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929-24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG.

A STUDENT-PROFESSOR UNDERGROUND versus a stupid, corrupt, suicidal, in short a dinosauran culture in Let Us Reason Together, a Novel of Election Year 1968. Dupont Press. Paperback $2. Box 685, Tallahassee, Fla. 32301.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

DEBATE THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE—pros and cons on the deployment of the ABM; 11 articles prepared by military and political experts. Pp. 169. Paper, $1.50; Hardbound, $5. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 5201 Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois 60615

EL GRITO—JOURNAL OF CONTEMPORARY MEXICAN-AMERICAN THOUGHT. Quarterly. Articles, short stories, satire, poetry, art, history. Limited supply of first issue remains. $4.00 year. $1.00 sample copy. Quinto Sol Publications, P.O. Box 9275, Berkeley, California 94719

SCIENCE & SOCIETY, An Independent Marxist Quarterly. Scholarly, timely analysis of the significant issues—Special Centenary Issue on Marx's CAPITAL—Winter issue featuring Latin America. Subscription $5, single issue $1.25. 30 East 20th Street, N.Y.C. 10003

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum. It has already been selected for an anthology to be published by Atheneum next Spring.

Single copies—15c

25 copies at 10c each

Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2 Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Is Mike Wallace 'Moonlighting'? "What does The NATION pay, fifty bucks?" he asked.

Here's the kind of thing we tap:

Mike Wallace on the Vietcong's superior fighting ability:

"The evident reason is that they are more strongly motivated; they feel a deeper sense of kinship with their top leaders, a deeper involvement in the cause for which they fight."

Ted Koppel ■ the GI in Vietnam:

"The time is perhaps long overdue for us to give up the naive assumption that the bigot from Bayonne, the dropout from Dayton, the hood from Hattiesburg and the plain, uninterested Marine from Montgomery have, in the long trip to Southeast Asia, been magically transformed into effective good-will ambassadors."

Jerome Wilson on Governor Rockefeller's Presidential potentials:

"As for foreign affairs—the State of New York of course has no foreign policy—for ■ period Mr. Rockefeller was a hawk on Vietnam, saying the nation should support its President. Now, he says that he does not have the information to form ■ judgment. This 'no position' on Vietnam is probably politically the wisest for an aspiring Presidential candidate. One can only surmise that this thought has occurred to Nelson Rockefeller."

We'll tap one of these books for you—free—to welcome you as a new subscriber to The NATION for one year:

- ☐ LBJ LAMPOONED, ed. Jules Feiffer
- ☐ AIR WAR: VIETNAM, by Frank Harvey
- ☐ HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM, by J. K. Galbraith
- ☐ Please enroll me for 1 year's subscription (48 issues).

I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me, free, the book I've marked above.

- ☐ Please sign me up for 6 months (24 issues). I enclose $6.

NAME

STREET

CITYSTATEZIP

Send to:

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

N 2-19

Other publications have lately become curious about why The NATION has given assignments to such talented TV newsmen as Desmond Smith (A.B.C.), Mike Wallace (C.B.S.), Gabe Pressman (N.B.C.), Ted Koppel (A.B.C.), and Jerome Wilson (C.B.S.) who, in this issue, gives our readers a searching appraisal of Governor Nelson Rockefeller's record in Albany. The answer is simple: we wanted to tap a new source of journalistic talent.

Why do these top TV newsmen write for The NATION? Is it perhaps because they must "moonlight"? Hardly. "What does The NATION pay, fifty bucks?" asked Mike Wallace when the WALL STREET JOURNAL inquired why he wrote for us (actually his stipend turned out to be a bit more than that). Obviously money isn't the motivation. As VARIETY ruefully observed, "It's clear that in many a case the motivation is the sheer itch to shake off the muzzles imposed by network news doctrine." But we think their motivation is a desire to talk to you, The NATION's readers. Newsmen like Mike Wallace and Ted Koppel and Jerry Wilson join the good fight in The NATION; but you are the real reason they're writing for us.

The good fight is now in

THE NATION

—why not join now?

LETTER FROM LONDON RAYMOND WILLIAMS

THE NATION

BURLINGAME
FEB 27 1968
LIBRARY

FEBRUARY 26, 1968 35 cents

THE PEACE CORPS
A DREAM BETRAYED

GERALD D. BENNETT

Americans for Democratic Action The Aging Men of Principle ROBERT G. SHERRILL

teaching the 'Pre-Baccs'

Headstart for College

LEONARD KRIEGER

THE WARREN REPORT and the IRRECONCILABLES

FRED J. COOK

21-1000 P-2-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
-LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

counterfeit

New York City

DEAR SIR: Upon reading the State Department's captured Vietcong document detailing how the Communists will control a future coalition government, one is reminded of an incident related in Allen Dulles' The Craft of Intelligence. There the CIA had the problem of how to evaluate a document brought to it by escaped East European military officers. The agency rejected the intelligence information on the ground that it contained the phrase "slave labor," which only an anti-Communist would use. The same thing can be said of the purported Vietcong document which incorporates such words as "our agents," and "men and equipment are infiltrated." Apparently the State Department has bought itself a tainted document such as Allen Dulles was warning about.

Ezra Chall

something like censorship

Clayton, Mo.

DEAR SIR: It is well and good to commend the N.E.T. network ("Something Like Courage," editorial, The Nation, Feb. 5) for its condensed version of Felix Greene's Inside North Vietnam.

One should keep in mind, however, that the choice of whether or not the program was carried still remained with the individual station. For the 2 million people served by the St. Louis affiliate, there was no opportunity to view the program. This writer was assured by the station's executive director, Robert C. Glazier, that NET Journal had been dropped during January because of the dated topical nature of some of the repeat programs. This seemed strange in view of the fact that as a matter of course the station carries about 20 per cent of its entire evening schedule on a repeat basis. . . .

Gorden F. Andrus

card of identity

Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: The lengthy letter by Tamaás Aczél, published in your issue of Jan. 15, deserves some comments just because it is so symptomatic of our times. Mr. Aczél comes out with unqualified praise for the Congress for Cultural Freedom and other conduit agencies of the CIA, and discerns "the best possible Agitprop tradition" in the activities of those who disagree with him on the merits of the literary patronage system of the CIA.

Indeed, Mr. Aczél must be familiar with the traditions of the Agitprop which he served for many years faithfully enough to receive one of those medals that the Hungarian Communist Party was wont to bestow on its dedicated minor party functionaries. Needless to say, an ex-Communist is entitled to express his opinion, but his opinion should be evaluated by us (the liberals who have never been Communists) with the necessary judiciousness. . . . It seems to be symptomatic: the ex-Communists supporting McCarthyism in the 1950s and the ex-Communists supporting the CIA conduit agencies at present.

John Kosa

correction

An error of transcription reversed the meaning in one sentence of Jonathan Mirsky's review of The Village of Ben Suc by Jonathan Schell (Jan. 8). The sentence should have read: "The man who takes most of the credit for the operation assured me, however, that Schell's account is accurate."

Editors

EDITORIALS

The Ice Jam Is Breaking

The Johnson Administration has managed to contain its opponents in a frozen, impotent attitude of protest which seemed to have little effect on public opinion. The result was confusion. The people were left with an uneasy feeling that somehow the country had been inveigled into a senseless war, but that being in it, we had to win. From the cumulative assurances of Johnson, Rusk, Westmoreland and countless press agents of high and low degree ringing in their ears, they were hopeful that victory might not be too far off.

The Vietcong offensive is now almost three weeks old, and fighting is still going on in the two most crucial sectors, Hue and Saigon. Not without reason, Max Frankel reports from Washington (New York Times, February 14) that "senior Administration officials are speaking in the most respectful tones of the strategy of the enemy commander, Gen. Nguyen Giap, North Vietnam Defense Minister."

What is more important than the military situation, however, is the political breakthrough in the United States, and the corresponding changes in Vietnam. The true situation in Vietnam is as yet unassessable, but some indications are already evident. The Saigon government has heretofore exerted only precarious control in some provincial areas, but, except for spasmodic Vietcong terrorism, has kept a fairly firm hold on the cities and provincial capitals. Now the government is secure in neither sector. The rural pacification teams have been called back to defend the cities against possible future attacks, and the effort to "win the hearts and minds" of the peasants has been given up for the time being, and maybe for good.

In the United States things are no better. When American troops are overseas, American politicians are always reluctant to criticize the handiwork of the Commander in Chief. They may squirm and grimace and otherwise make their distress plain enough, but words that could possibly be construed as casting doubt on the virtue and eventual triumph of our military endeavor stick in their throats; there is always another election.

The political disarray of the past two weeks is therefore the more remarkable. Sen. Edward Kennedy is back from Saigon with a tale of corruption that shocks even a young man brought up to face the political realities of Boston. Sens. Mike Mansfield and Thruston Morton have measurably raised the level of their protest, the latter notably referring to the "bland and probably inaccurate" statements of General Westmoreland (when a Senator sneers at a front-line general it may be said that the jig is very nearly up) and counting doves in the Senate. Senators Fulbright and Aiken, members of the Foreign Relations Committee and two of the most widely respected Americans in public life today, no longer even try to conceal their distrust of Secretary Rusk. Nor is the disillusion confined to events in Vietnam; the biting remarks of David G. Nes on the occasion of his retirement from the Foreign Service (political timidity in Washington, he said, blocked the taking of steps that could have prevented the Arab-Israeli War) were sensational in their implications, and failed to gain full public attention only because of the greater blunders coming to a head in Vietnam.

The central event in the recent breakup of Washington's reluctant coalition was Sen. Robert Kennedy's speech of February 8. The time has come, Senator Kennedy said, to take a new look at the war. Granted that the Vietcong will probably be unable to hold what they seized, granted that they paid a high price in casualties, the fact remains that half a million American soldiers (with the Seventh Fleet lying offshore and bombing at will) and 700,000 of our South Vietnamese allies were unable to protect a single city from the assault of an enemy whose total strength in South Vietnam could not be more than 250,000. The more men we have poured into South Vietnam (and now we are rushing another 10,500 into combat to allay General Westmoreland's quite justified fears) the worse our situation has become.

Senator Kennedy raised nine basic points, one after another. Military victory is not in sight. The pursuit of such a victory is not in our national interest. The progress we have claimed is illusory. The people of South Vietnam are not with us. The current regime is a liability, not an effective ally. Political compromise is the only way to extricate ourselves. Escalation is reducing the faith of other peoples in our wisdom and aims. The way to end the casualties is to end the war. Ninth and last, the Johnson Administration must tell us the truth, grim though it may be.

It had better start now. Delay can only make things worse, and they are bad enough already.

When the Bomb?

"There's an awful lot of soul-searching going on up here," a senior Democratic leader remarked to a Washington reporter. There have been reasons enough for soul-searching for a good many years, but one of them has forced its way into the news only in the past week or two. It takes the form of a question: If the war drags on, when, how and under what pretext will the United States, unable to win by conventional means, resort to nuclear weapons? The bombs are ready—hundreds of them stored in the magazines of U.S. aircraft carriers cruising in the Sea of Japan and the Gulf of Tonkin, hundreds more aloft in U.S. aircraft all across the world and in Polaris submarines under the sea. Our finger is ever on the doomsday trigger.

On February 5, it became known among scientists and engineers in the New York metropolitan area that a number of civilian specialists in nuclear weaponry, high-energy physics and allied fields had suddenly been detached from their duties at universities and corporations and dispatched on a secret mission to South Vietnam. Among the colleagues of these experts there was naturally a certain amount of guarded speculation. One theory was that the use of low-yield nuclear weapons was contemplated at Khesanh. A week later, on February 12, The New York Times carried a story on this development by Walter Sullivan, the paper's science editor.

On February 9, George Christian, Mr. Johnson's press secretary, assured the White House press corps that the

IN THIS ISSUE

February 26, 1968

EDITORIALS

258

ARTICLES

- 261 Americans for Democratic Action:
The Aging Men of Principle
Robert G. Sherrill
- 263 The Peace Corps:
A Dream Betrayed
Gerald D. Berreman
- 269 The Vietnam Dead
William Eastlake
- 270 Teaching the "Pre-Baccs":
Headstart for College
Leonard Kriegel
- 274 Letter from London:
Socialism's Crisis of Theory
Raymond Williams

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 277 The Warren Report & the Irreconcilables
Fred J. Cook
- 278 Letter (poem)
Milton Kessler
- 281 Theatre
Harold Clurman
- 283 Music
Benjamin Boretz
- 285 Films
Robert Hatch
- 287 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KEMP

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 9

President had not received any request from the Joint Chiefs of Staff for nuclear action. Charges to this effect, Mr. Christian assured the reporters, were false and unfair. The public will have to decide how much comfort it dares to take from this assertion, particularly in the light of a later statement from Gen. Earle G. Wheeler, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that he did "not think that nuclear weapons will be required to defend Khesanh." Sen. Joseph Clark was one of those not reassured by Mr. Christian's display of indignation. If North Vietnam gained the upper hand at Khesanh, he feared that the United States might be "tempted."

Are the surmises irresponsible? Hasn't this war been full of surprises, most of them unpleasant to the American side and damaging to such remnants of credibility as the Johnson Administration retains? Hasn't Mr. Nixon cried out at the disgrace of having a "fourth-rate power" "pirating" an American man-of-war? Doesn't the latest Gallup poll show that four Americans out of ten favor using force to get the Pueblo back, while only two favor further negotiation?

Now suppose that on top of all the frustrations and bedevilment the Johnson Administration has inflicted on the American people, and despite the written promises of victory by the Joint Chiefs, General Giap should pull something out of his hat, as he did in 1954? With U.S. air power in action it is scarcely likely that he can stage a full-fledged Dienbienphu, but he might cause a lot of trouble at Khesanh—or some other place where we least expect it. General Wheeler has given his technical opinion that Khesanh can be held without the use of nuclear weapons. But suppose he turns out to be wrong, as generals so often are? Will the Joint Chiefs who signed that paper, and Mr. Johnson who is running hellbent for that re-election, chivalrously refrain from using aught but TNT against an enemy guilty of the incredible atrocity of refusing to come to the negotiation table to surrender to Uncle Sam? Anyone who believes that could be sold Brooklyn Bridge.

Thar's Gold in Those Hills

Mineral King Valley is a 15,000-acre enclave of wilderness surrounded on three sides by the Sequoia National Park in the Sierra Nevada, halfway between Los Angeles and San Francisco. The valley, ringed by peaks towering above its 7,800-foot elevation, is one of the most beautiful primitive areas remaining in California.

The 60,000-member Sierra Club and other conservation groups have fought to have Mineral King incorporated into the Sequoia reserve from which it was excluded in deference to pioneer gold and silver mining, long defunct. A narrow, winding, partly paved, partly dirt road provides the only access to the valley, which is a summer take-off point for pack trains and hikers into the high Sierras. All this will change. The Walt Disney Enterprises, with the enthusiastic cooperation of two federal agencies and the reluctant approval of another, plans to convert this natural paradise into an Alpine Disneyland.

For nine months, Stewart L. Udall, Secretary of the Department of the Interior, opposed the development, which he said would "violate" the valley and create water and air pollution problems, but he finally caved in under pressure from the U.S. Forest Service and the Budget Bureau. These agencies support the development as beneficial to the area and as a revenue-producing plan for the government. Walt Disney Enterprises has promised to invest $35 million in the project and will rent the valley at an amount not yet determined. The Department of the Interior is preparing right-of-way agreements that will permit the state of California to build a 26-mile, two-lane, all-weather access highway, the key to unlocking the valley for commercial exploitation.

Orville L. Freeman, Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, which runs the Forest Service, insists that each phase of the development will be supervised to make certain that the aesthetic and ecological values of the valley are protected. The Sierra Club views such assurances with pessimism. It predicts that the development will draw as many as 16,000 visitors at one time into the narrow, 300-acre valley bottom, which would produce a population density greater than that of New York City.

The Sierra Club will ask Secretary Udall to reconsider his approval and may go to court in an attempt to stop the project. Success is not likely. Already land speculation has started in the little town of Three Rivers on state route 198 leading to the Mineral King road. The Disney operation, which has bipartisan political sanction, will mine more gold from the valley than was ever dreamed of by the pioneers. When big money is at stake, the natural heritage of future Americans always loses.

Arms for Latin America

We are engaged in a new and even more unconscionable wave of arms selling in Latin America. These are not the cast-off implements of World War II, or other second-hand goods, but modern, sophisticated jet fighters, tanks, communications equipment—everything needed for the most efficient mass-killing of military forces similarly equipped. Military aid has escalated almost exponentially in the past year. We are not alone in this deplorable enterprise; the French are competing vigorously.

The purpose behind all this hawking of military hardware is not obvious—few American operations in Latin America are. There has not been an authentic war between South American nations for more than a quarter of a century. Of course there is Fidel Castro, but he can just about manage to keep himself economically afloat with Soviet help, which seems to be doled out with increasing reluctance. Nor are such items as jet fighters serviceable for putting down guerrilla insurrections, which in any case are in a very enfeebled state in that part of the world. Such outbreaks as have occurred have totally failed to enlist popular support. The latest example was in Bolivia, a country about as poor and wretched as they come, but where Che Guevara, for all his charisma and military experience, went to his death in a hopeless fight against one of the weakest armies on the continent.

The fact seems to be that in Latin America, as elsewhere, we mainly seek influence—and always a particular kind of influence. We want to stand in with the well-heeled minority and the armed forces that protect them and their possessions. We are counterrevolutionary by instinct, but rationalize our stand in the name of law and order. A recent State Department pronouncement puts it succinctly, though not convincingly:

"Basically we support the Alliance for Progress. But you can't separate the military from the far larger area of economic and social change and improvement. The economy of a nation and the welfare of its people cannot progress in a climate of civil disturbance."

But where is the improvement, where the progress? The military are there for the precise purpose of preventing anything of the sort. The aristocracy and the dictators bleed the peasants, while the United States, with some European competition, sells the generals arms which they don't need but which give them a feeling of power and something to do with their troops, who are given training in the use of the new weapons.

The officers get training too, under the pleasant conditions existing at American bases. Each year the U.S. Southern Command, with headquarters in the Panama Canal Zone, enrolls more than 2,000 Latin American officers in U.S. military courses, ranging all the way up to the Command and General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth and the Inter-American Defense College in Washington. The School of the Americas at Fort Gulick in the Canal Zone has instructed more than 20,000 Latin military men, who take home with them the prestige of a village cop who has attended an FBI school on combating the nonexistent Reds of his neighborhood.

All this and much more has been documented by John M. Goshko of The Washington Post Foreign News Service, and inserted by Senators Fulbright and Morse in the Congressional Record. Prof. John J. Johnson, the Stanford historian and Latin American expert, says we are sticking with the ultimate losers—the top-dogs of today who will go down in the future social disturbances which American policy is breeding. This course has all the wisdom and foresight of an earlier policy established on the same premises: "Après nous le déluge."

AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION

THE AGING MEN OF PRINCIPLE

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

The threadbare but starched gentility of the Americans for Democratic Action hierarchy charmingly recalls those pukka British officers who insisted on ceremonial tiffin and cricket at their jungle outposts around the world as the Empire slipped away. The ADA's fading "empire" is that old coalition of New Deal alumni, independent liberals and labor leaders who were both frightened into defensive action by the Red Scare of the late 1940s and early 1950s and at the same time unwilling to desert the cause of liberalism for total safety. They took every precaution to avoid being called radicals, and nobody but

Humane Doctors: Inhumane Law

Medical research indicates that a woman who contracts German measles during the first three months of pregnancy runs a 50 per cent risk of giving birth to a deformed child. During an outbreak of the disease in 1965, nine San Francisco physicians performed a series of abortions, receiving approval in each case from a hospital staff committee (see "Abortion: Laws and Attitudes," The Nation, June 12, 1967). Under a California law enacted in 1872, the State Board of Medical Examiners brought charges of unprofessional conduct against the nine; after hearings, two of the doctors were publicly rebuked and a third was placed on probation for a year. This is the first time in the ninety-six-year history of the statute that action has been taken against physicians for openly terminating pregnancies in a hospital for therapeutic reasons.

The board acted with evident reluctance at the insistence of a Los Angeles physician who said: "I was interested from a legal standpoint. These doctors were saying they were above the law." Dr. Edmund W. Overstreet, vice chairman of obstetrics at the University of California Medical Center in San Francisco, expressed the majority medical view when he asserted that "violation of an archaic statute" is not unprofessional conduct. A survey last year of 748 California physicians revealed that 590 occasionally had performed such abortions. The nine physicians, torn between the law and modern, humane medical practice, are victims of a legal trap that defies both modern medicine and social reality. Last year, the California legislature liberalized the 1872 statute, which permitted abortions only to save the life of the mother. Among other grounds, the new law allows abortions when continued pregnancy would seriously endanger the mother's physical or mental health. The prospect of having a deformed child should certainly come within this category. However, the new law specifically omits German measles from the list of conditions that would make an abortion legal, Governor Reagan having said that he would not sign a bill in which the disease was included.

demagogues like Lyndon Johnson and James Eastland were so silly as to see them as such. It was an upper-middle-class, unimaginative, middle-of-the-road organization which, nevertheless, served as a useful rallying point in the fight against McCarthyism and for the leftover FDR-Truman ideas in the 1950s when the Democratic leadership in Congress was practically nonexistent. Survivors include. . . .

Why does one come away from the ADA Executive Board meetings held here over the February 10 weekend thinking in these retrospective, almost obituary terms? Because the ADA does seem almost dead—all the more so, curiously, because of this latest spasm of activity.

But give the ADAers their due. In a period that has established an almost permanent inconsistency between politics and principle, the ADA has (by a moderate majority) once again tried to combine the two via the candidacy of Sen. Eugene McCarthy. Forty-seven of the ADA board argued that the McCarthy candidacy is a waste of time, but sixty-five decided they would prefer to waste their time backing what the minority called a hopeless candidate than to support a hopeless war, even by indirection.

It was hardly an astonishing conclusion for a liberal organization to arrive at; and the tortured and ritualistic debate through which the ADA had to plod its weary way hardly testifies to much vitality of judgment. All day, the five-score delegates—high church liberals, all: Hans Morgenthau, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Rep. Don Edwards, Victor Reuther, Bayard Rustin and the like—harangued and exhorted one another to go in various directions, before voting on a resolution stating the most obvious of liberal positions (“We look with deep concern upon the effect of this [Vietnam] conflict on American policy elsewhere in the world,” etc., etc.), and endorsing a most orthodox and respectable candidate, Senator McCarthy.

There was a hang-up over “practical politics,” which in itself is a symptom of the ADA’s arterial condition, but this was eased slightly when, to the original resolution written by long-time ADA wheel horse Joseph Rauh, a tenderizing amendment was added by ADA president Kenneth Galbraith. I quote it in full because it tells everything there is to say, both good and bad, about the present condition of the ADA: “This position is taken in full recognition of the position of a part of our membership which does not agree. In their view, although it often involves deep disapproval of the Vietnam war, the greater danger to liberalism in our time is from the nomination and election of a reactionary Republican. Alternatively, as practical liberals they recognize the odds against a successful challenge to an incumbent President. These positions command our respect. Accordingly, the majority makes it explicitly clear that its action does not interfere with the liberty and conscience of those who dissent.”

That must have left LBJ tossing all night.

The opponents of the resolution mustered a wide variety of quibbles. Professor Emile Benoit advised that liberals should support the Vietnamese War because if we lost it with humiliation, a new wave of McCarthyism could come in its wake. Robert Nathan argued that passing the pro-McCarthy resolution now would only weaken the peace issue at the May ADA convention by inspiring the hawks to seek vengeance. Leon Keyserling, who later resigned, objected on a more basic principle: “A spoiled group of intellectuals who can claim less than 20,000 members nationally can be an effective force for pushing new ideas—200 or even 20 can do that—but it is silly for a group of that size to talk about dumping the President of 200 million people.” He wants the ADA to be a program machine rather than a political machine.

After the vote was taken, John Roche quit. Galbraith said this came as a surprise to him, but it came as a surprise to nobody else because Roche had been going around all day saying that if the pro-McCarthy resolution passed he was through. What else could he do? He was one of the founders of the ADA and has held top offices in the organization, but he is on the White House payroll now as jester in residence, his job seeming mainly to invent insults—in the nasty manner of a left-wing Bill Buckley—aimed at his old colleagues. He delivered a couple of samples at the board meeting: “By May, McCarthy may have retired to a monastery. Or he may give up politics for Lent.” Another: “This won’t kill the ADA. It’s virtually impossible to kill an organization. There is probably somewhere in the U.S.A. a committee opposing the Spanish-American War that still has an office and still pays an executive secretary.”

The epigrammatic departure of Roche raised the question—which eventually proved to be academic—of what action Vice President Hubert Humphrey would take. Galbraith said he hoped Humphrey wouldn’t quit and spoke of the ADA’s “continuous affection” for Humphrey, one of the ADA’s founders and, for many years, the personification of ADA standards in American politics. But Monday’s New York Times carried a statement from Norman Sherman, the Vice President’s press secretary, that Mr. Humphrey had quit the ADA three years ago. Being a politician, he had done it in a political way: by ceasing to pay his dues and allowing his membership to lapse. Americans for Democratic Action does not keep its books with the rigor of the American Automobile Association; you are not struck from the rolls for a seeming absent mindedness as to dues, particularly you are not severed if you are also Vice President of the United States. It is little wonder that Galbraith was still figuratively throwing his arm around “Brother Hubert” three years after Humphrey’s exit on tiptoes.

There will always be a lamp in the window for Humphrey, who, old ADAers are convinced, just can’t mean to be a hawk. Not long ago, when Joe Rauh decided to work for McCarthy, he went to Humphrey and told him what he was going to do. “He did not try to dissuade me,” Rauh recalls. “What he did was make a firm talk about how the war is right and how he believes in the war. When he had finished, I said, ‘I know you believe in the war, but I believe that if you were President of the United States you would have us out of the war in 90 days.’ And he said, ‘But I just told you, I believe in everything the President is doing.’ I said, ‘I think you think that and I believe you honestly believe that, but you don’t have the kind of independent judgment about that that you would have if you were President and unrestricted by the views of anyone else.’ He denied it.” But of course Rauh still didn’t believe him.

How much of labor will stay with the ADA after the McCarthy resolution is still not known. There were twelve important union leaders on the ADA board, and as of this writing nine of them, including Walter Reuther, are sticking. I. W. Abel of the United Steelworkers, Louis Stulberg of the ILGWU and Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers have quit; David Dubinsky, honorary president of the ILGWU, is keeping his position on the board. Jack Conway, who is ADA executive committee chairman, as well as director of the AFL-CIO’s Industrial Union Department, said he was staying in the ADA.

But the most talkative opponent of the resolution was Gus Tyler, vice president of the ILGWU, whom Rauh identified, with no supporting evidence, as "the White House's hatchet man." Since the board meeting was closed, newspaper reporters standing around outside were only too happy to listen to anyone who looked alive and Tyler took full advantage of this boredom, spending most of the day reciting his reasons for thinking McCarthy to be an "irrelevant candidate" who has made "America more hawkish than ever," has increased Lyndon Johnson's popularity, has "fractionalized the peace movement" and has "badly injured Kennedy." Tyler had asked the board, "Is it for this man that we lay our life on the line?" Furthermore, he said, McCarthy is "drifting from left to right," and he had statistics to show it—over the past nineteen years the Senator has had an average ADA legislative score of 92 per cent, but in 1967 it dropped to 62 per cent.

From 10 A.M. to 5 P.M., Tyler had periodically popped out to reassert that a pro-McCarthy vote would "smash the coalition" by driving trade unionists representing 5 million members out of the ADA; but after the vote was in at 5:30, he changed his tune. His fiery threats had been made in the shadowy hallways; under the TV lights he seemed to melt. Asked on camera if the unions would withdraw, he said, "I do not know what the unions will do. I come in a purely personal capacity."

If anyone in the ADA can be called a strongman, it is probably Rauh, who is generally credited with supplying the shoulder that really got the organization moving toward the McCarthy showdown and with blocking a worse compromise than was finally agreed on. His purpose was higher than mere contention. He was making an effort to restore some life to this organization which he loves. The ADA is middle-aged (the average age of the delegates to this meeting must surely have been close to 50). It is obviously tired. It is even more obviously Establishmentarian, with many of its leaders operating either as cronies or official advisers to the men that have created the current governmental stalemate. And it ran out of ideas several years ago. Not long ago, in a moment of rare candor, Humphrey remarked that the ADA had achieved all the goals it had been set up to achieve, leaving clear the impression that he felt it was no longer a significant organization. (If it is no longer significant, neither is he, because he rose in politics riding the same issues, vintage 1947, and he has offered few fresh ones since.) One reason for this decay has been the comparatively reactionary attitude of some of the member unions which, originally, supplied the money and the political savvy that the intellectual liberals badly needed.

If those old-line laborites wish to use the McCarthy fuss as an excuse to withdraw from the ADA, Rauh and his supporters will not much mind. He is fairly confident that peace organizations and other young-blood sources will supply replacements. Both Roche-wingers and Rauh-wingers agree that the McCarthy movement tends away from the national ADA cadre and toward the chapters, the rank-and-filers around the country. "If we don't pass this resolution," Galbraith said during the luncheon break, "we'll lose two-thirds of our members tomorrow." While the national cadre has a moderately high status, the chapters often have actual ward-level effectiveness. Some political observers believe that Stokes would not be mayor of Cleveland today except for the local ADA's support, and in Philadelphia, New York and other big urban centers the ADA organizational enthusiasm has been felt in local elections.

To gamble for new strength from the chapter rank-and-file may be wise, but it is also an act of desperation. The chapters are mercurial in their interests and energies. The dependable characters who have given the ADA its long-range appeal have been drawn from the intellectual elite that topped the national organization—a crowd that used to sound much like a bunch of old-school boys wearing the same ideological tie. With that unanimity now dissolved—in a 65 to 47 vote over something as basic as whether to support a peace or war candidate—the ADA no longer has either unity or an ideology at the national level. Reading the contested solution again, one cannot be sure what the ADA does have left.

The Peace Corps: A Dream Betrayed

GERALD D. BERREMAN

Mr Berreman is professor of anthropology at the University of California. His area of special interest is India. He lectured on that country to Peace Corps trainees at several universities, before dissociating himself from the Peace Corps in 1965 in protest against the war in Vietnam. Mr. Berreman is the author of Hindus of the Himalayas (University of California Press).

"The generation for which I speak has seen enough of warmongers, let our great role in history be that of peace-makers."

With these words President Kennedy seven years ago introduced the Peace Corps, a program which fired the public imagination and which has been widely acknowledged to be among the most inspiring accomplishments of an inspiring President. Its aim was to promote world peace by working to eliminate the root causes of war: poverty, ignorance, hunger, despair and, perhaps above all, the disparity between standards of living within and between nations. It would accomplish this by sending to developing nations, at their request, skilled Americans trained in the languages and cultures of the host nations. This was to be a people-to-people program; the Americans would be volunteers, unpaid except for subsistence allowances, expected to live insofar as possible as peers among those with whom they would work.

Today, the bright promise of the Peace Corps is badly corroded; the ringing phrases which introduced it have a distinctly hollow sound. True, 12,250 volunteers are working in fifty-eight nations, and nearly 15,000 others have completed their two years of service. But the signs of corrosion are many. The Peace Corps has been ejected from Pakistan, Guinea, Mauritania and Gabon. Demands for its ouster are proliferating, and its future is now doubtful in several nations, including Turkey where there were 590 Peace Corps Volunteers (PCVs) in 1965 and are now only 220. In the United States Peace Corps applications have declined precipitously. In 1967 they dropped 50 per cent at the University of California, Berkeley, which has been the largest contributor of applicants and trainees in every year since the founding of the Corps. Ray Holland, director of recruiting for the Peace Corps, reported in December that applications had declined 30 per cent nationally in 1967. Several important staff members have resigned recently, including Deputy Director Warren Wiggins and Associate Director Harris Wofford.

What happened? The Peace Corps began with high hopes and widespread good will. It attracted as volunteers some of the nation's most energetic and unselfish youth. They combined idealism and practicality to win the respect and affection of many of those among whom they worked, including some who had doubted their capabilities or motives. The Peace Corps appointed as regional representatives and staff members able and dedicated people from many walks of life, animated by the desire that this might be a successful moral alternative to war. Today such people are leaving or have left, and those who replace them are of a different mold. The directorship has passed from an imaginative New Frontiersman to a colorless cold warrior. The Peace Corps itself is worried about the high proportion of "bland" volunteers who, in the words of a New York Times report, "do not grasp the potential of such projects as community development."

The widespread disenchantment with the Peace Corps is not simply a phenomenon of that organization; it reflects the decline in public confidence at home and abroad in a government that pursues an unpopular and unjust war in Vietnam, supports every avowedly anti-Communist government that rears its head, regardless of what it does to or for its people, and is floundering in a deteriorating domestic situation closely linked to the international one. The most eloquent and convincing critiques of the Peace Corps have come from PCVs and returned PCVs themselves. Eight in Ecuador wrote recently a carefully reasoned "indictment of the Peace Corps," which was published in several newspapers. It began: "We joined the Peace Corps because we thought it would afford us a means of helping developing nations without imposing the United States' political and cultural values on them. . . . We were wrong. We now see that the Peace Corps is arrogant and colonialist in the same way as the government of which it is a part."

Recruiting director Holland acknowledged the problem in an interview reported in the San Francisco Chronicle of December 13, 1967. Commenting on the drop in Peace Corps applications, he said that there is "an increasing reluctance on the part of young people to become associated with the U.S. Government, which they see waging a war they cannot support." He may have been led to this conclusion partly by the fact that six months earlier more than 800 ex-PCVs had signed a letter to President Johnson, stating that in the context of the war in Vietnam young Americans would "be reluctant to participate at all in overseas programs of the Government," and conveying their conviction that "American policy is seriously undermining the contribution America can make toward achieving" the kind of world envisioned by the Peace Corps.

There are at least four major reasons for disenchantment with the Peace Corps at home and abroad, three growing from the corruption of U.S. foreign policy and the deterioration of domestic policy, and the fourth from the bureaucratization of the Peace Corps itself.

One of these directs no criticism at the Peace Corps as such, but regards it as a relatively minor and benevolent expression of an Administration whose major expression—the war in Vietnam—is directly opposed to everything for which the Peace Corps stands. The same government which is helping peasants become more productive farmers in India is defoliating crops and killing peasants in Vietnam.

Last October, twenty-four PCVs in Brazil, petitioning for a negotiated settlement in Vietnam, wrote to The New York Times that "there is an inherent contradiction in representing a Government which is engaging in a war while serving that Government in the 'Peace Corps.'"

The attitude of many of those the Peace Corps now seeks to recruit parallels the reaction of an acquaintance who talked with government officials in Vietnam a couple of years ago about the burning of villages by U.S. Marines. He was told, "Yes, but there is another, untold side to the war. The Marine band performs for the Vietnamese orphanages." This led him to ask himself, "When should the piccolo player quit the band?" And he answered, "Now." Many who see nothing wrong with what the Peace Corps is doing—who even find it laudable—simply cannot stomach the hypocrisy. They have decided that they will not play the piccolo, even for orphans, in the employ of an Administration whose main business is burning villages and making orphans. That that is the main business is suggested in the position paper opposing the war published in Ramparts magazine (September, 1967) by the Committee of Returned Volunteers, and signed by 659 overseas volunteers, 520 of them PCVs. It notes that "every two days the equivalent of the annual Peace Corps budget is spent for the war in Vietnam." In this context the Peace Corps is at best a poignant gesture; at worst a cruel hoax.

Abroad, these inconsistencies are seen even more clearly than in the United States. Peace Corps Director Vaughn demonstrated monumental insensitivity when he wrote in the Saturday Review last January that "a volunteer who has worked hard in Brazil for two years need not feel that his work there has been undone by what is going on in Vietnam, and I suspect that Brazilians feel there is virtually no relationship between what the volunteer has accomplished in Brazil and what is happening in Vietnam." The overwhelming evidence is to the contrary. Citizens of host nations as well as PCVs have increasingly pointed out the relationship—not just with the war in Vietnam, but with all U.S. foreign policy.

A second, related, ground for opposition to the Corps is the use made of it to divert attention from, or to excuse, less palatable aspects of U.S. foreign policy, notably the war. It is often held up to an outraged and fearful world as evidence of the peaceful intent of the United States. As a student commented, for this Administration to support and boast of the Peace Corps is as though Murder, Inc., were to sponsor an orphanage and point to this as extenuation for its other activities. In this view, the Peace Corps ceases to be merely an innocent concomitant of an insupportable foreign policy and becomes part of that policy. PCV Fred Lonidier (Philippines) drew attention to this when he wrote a letter to the Manila Times in November, 1966, asking "whether or not the Peace Corps is perhaps an expendable political gimmick kept in existence to give the lie to any challenges to Johnson's peaceful intentions."

There is hardly an official mention of the 1965 Dominican Republic uprising, in which U.S. Marines interfered heavily and brutally, that does not stress the benevolent role of a few courageous Peace Corps Volunteers who moved about on both sides of the fighting. Director Vaughn, summing up the first seven years of Peace Corps activity, describes that event as "perhaps their finest hour." Yet it was the Marines who prevailed. The Peace Corps thus serves as a sugar-coating, and a thin one at that, for the bitter pill of U.S. military policy.

It is clear that the Administration would like to divert domestic protest from the war and that it has attempted to use the Peace Corps as one means to do so. Vice President Humphrey, in October, 1965, said to the Peace Corps National Advisory Council that "Many of those who demonstrated [on Vietnam Day] are just sincere, idealistic youths whose idealism could well be channeled"; presumably away from the war, where their protest hurts, to more innocuous programs such as the Peace Corps where, thousands of miles away, they could devote their energies to helping peasants. This relationship between the Peace Corps and the war was made explicit by columnists Robert Allen and Paul Scott on October 14, 1965, when they informed their readers, approvingly, that former White House aide Richard Goodwin, at the Institute of Advanced Studies at Wesleyan in Connecticut, had a private mission from the Johnson Administration "to put a damper on the differences over U.S. Vietnam policy and channel this student protest effort into support for the administration's social programs," both at home and overseas.

The recurrent hostility of Peace Corps officials toward the peace movement is illuminating in this regard. Kirby Jones, desk officer for Ecuador, while recruiting on the West Coast in October, 1966, remarked that protest activity is "not really a genuine service. The Peace Corps offers active participation in things that are really happening," and he described the "electric climate" on the Berkeley campus as "phony, amateurish and superficial" as contrasted to the reality of the Peace Corps. Vaughn said in the Saturday Review: "... We are well advised to take a good long look at anything which arrogates unto itself the label of a peace movement by that or any other name. Is it studded with eminent signatures and famous personalities, long lists of names in fine print, and guest speakers? Having consigned most of my life to this cause, I know enough about the movement for peace—real peace—to say forget that approach." Vaughn, director of the Peace Corps since 1966, was described by Marshall Windmiller, associate professor of international relations at San Francisco State College, in a recent Pacifica Radio commentary as "a vigorous anti-Communist . . . who had helped to develop American counterinsurgency policy in Latin America," and was opposed for confirmation in his Peace Corps appointment by Sen. Wayne Morse who said "as Assistant Secretary for Latin American Affairs, in my judgment, he was grossly incompetent." Little wonder that enthusiasm for the Peace Corps has waned.

The recruiting literature is itself revealing, with its inept use of the rhetoric of protest—rhetoric which has admittedly failed to lure student activists to the Peace Corps. Terms such as "revolution," "agitation," "alienation," "free speech issue," have been much used, assuring the prospective volunteer that these terms have real meaning in the Peace Corps as contrasted to the sandbox of student protest. On the contrary, activist students have come to view the Peace Corps as a sandbox wherein the foreign policy they find abhorrent is tacitly or overtly endorsed and the status quo is perpetuated in the very societies where the Peace Corps does its allegedly revolutionary work.

This raises a third major source of disenchantment with the Peace Corps—the belief that it is neither an innocent adjunct to a corrupt U.S. foreign policy nor simply a diversion from that policy but that it is a direct agency of that policy. This conviction, originally expressed only in the anti-American press, has grown markedly in recent months even among PCVs themselves. It does not rest on the generally discredited allegations that the Peace Corps may be a cover for CIA activity. (Although Vietnamese journalist Tran Van Dinh, writing from Washington, asked pointedly in a recent column: "How, in an organized bureaucracy, does one agency not exchange information and ideas with another under the same command?") Rather, the conviction rests on pronouncements from within and without the Peace Corps about its aims. Charles J. Wertzel has pointed out that from the beginning Congress visualized it as a "weapon of American foreign policy against communism," and President Kennedy, in his speech outlining the Peace Corps program, spoke of the need for an antidote to the "missionaries of communism" abroad in the world. Hubert Humphrey, then a Senator, said bluntly in 1960: "This program is to be a part of the total foreign policy of the United States . . . to combat the virus of Communist totalitarianism." Director Vaughn noted in an address at Utah State University in December, 1966, that PCVs are "second to no other Americans, including troops in Vietnam, in performing service for this nation."

When in June, 1967, the Peace Corps fired a PCV in Chile for publicly opposing the Vietnamese War, and warned ninety-two others there of possible disciplinary action growing out of an anti-war petition, five PCVs in Ecuador wrote to The New York Times that "we have been ordered to support the war in Vietnam—with our silence at least." They pointed out that "now the distinction between the Peace Corps and other agencies of the United States Government has become blurred," with a resultant loss of confidence among those the volunteers came to help.

Peace Corps spokesmen have consistently gloried in attacks or criticisms identifiable as coming from Communist sources. They have seen them as evidence of Peace Corps effectiveness and have exploited them heavily in their press releases. Under Vaughn, cold-war language has become increasingly familiar. This orientation has alienated a large section of potential volunteers for whom the cold war is at once irrelevant and reminiscent of the McCarthy era. The Committee of Returned Volunteers showed considerably more understanding than official Peace Corps spokesmen when they wrote of the war in Vietnam "that the anti-Communist rhetoric used to justify our actions there obscures the fact that the basic division in the world today is between rich and poor." That same rhetoric generates in host countries the kind of response which leads to demands for expulsion of PCVs.

Two years ago, Professor Windmiller endorsed the Peace Corps as an effective agency for constructive change in the world, and one with which war protesters could ally themselves. He saw it as a healthy element in the otherwise sickly landscape of U.S. policy, and therefore to be nurtured. On November 16, 1967, he reversed this stand as he traced the recent history of the Corps, its emergence as an overt agency of U.S. policy under President Johnson, and the special role it now plays: "Its mission is the same as that of the American armed forces in Vietnam. It is a highly political mission: to support the governments that are friendly to us. . . . The Peace Corps therefore is not an instrument of change but an instrument of the status quo. Not a revolutionary organization but a counterrevolutionary organization. It is the advance guard of the Marines—counterinsurgency in a velvet glove."

The work of the Peace Corps is described in its own literature as constructive "social revolution" which "side-steps" conventional revolution to bring modernization to developing nations. Windmiller pointed out the inherent contradiction in this terminology. "Modernization in developing areas," he said, "is a political as well as an economic and social process. The Peace Corps never really confronted this difficult fact, and instead tried to be constructive without being political. It failed, and gradually became political; not political on the side of change but political on the side of stability and the maintenance of the status quo."

Conor Cruise O'Brien has described the position of the U.S. Government, and hence the Peace Corps, as being "in favor of social revolution, verbally, provided this takes place peacefully, and it exhorts parasitic ruling classes to inculcate social revolution, just as it exhorts Dr. Verwoerd to abandon apartheid. And with the same degree of success. Failing peaceful social revolution, it favors no revolution—combined with continued exhortation." The Mexican anthropologist, Guillermo Bonfil Batalla, has observed that "sometimes it looks as if those who work along the road of slow evolution intend to achieve only minimal changes, so that the situation continues to be substantially the same; this is, in other words, to change what is necessary so that things remain the same. Those who act according to such a point of view may honestly believe that their work is useful and transforming; however, they have in fact aligned themselves with the conservative elements who oppose the structural transformations that cannot be postponed in our [Latin American] countries." The Peace Corps is guided by that point of view.

This has not escaped PCVs. The position paper of the Committee of Returned Volunteers included the statement: "Although its name indicates a goal of serving the forces of peaceful change, we wonder whether the Peace Corps' effect has not at times been to impede rather than accelerate the movement into a future of greater abundance and full political participation."

The anxiety of Peace Corps administrators, lest the implied appeal for change be taken literally, is reflected in their fence-straddling recruiting poster: "Why join the Peace Corps? Not to change the world, but not to leave it the same either."

The fourth major cause of disaffection comes from within the Corps itself. Its idealism is frequently said to have been lost as it has become increasingly bureaucratized and increasingly tied to other agencies of the government. As the Peace Corps has grown it has become more a creature of its administration and less an instrument of its volunteers. As one veteran Peace Corps trainer put it, "it is dominated by its middle and top level management—its own international jet-set. At one time it was 'people'; now it is 'Establishment.'"

Part of the change for the worse is attributable to change in administration; especially Director Sargent Shriver's replacement by Jack Hood Vaughn in February, 1966, with resultant closer ties to the Johnson Administration. Vaughn's record in the directorship and the continuity of that record with his pre-Peace Corps performance substantiate this interpretation, as do the defections of key Peace Corps staff members during his time in office.

Windmiller, commenting on the deterioration of the Peace Corps under Vaughn, quotes recruiting literature that has shifted its emphasis from social service and idealism, to self-interest and personal advancement. As a consequence of this, the typical PCV has changed from an individual who wants to improve the world to one who is "essentially a conformist," who will do what the Peace Corps tells him to do because it will help him find a job or otherwise advance himself. Windmiller points out the evident preference for volunteers who are what Peace Corps literature has called "quiet mouth" Americans, who do not express opinions and do not get into arguments. This inference is given credence by Vaughn's Saturday Review article where, attacking anti-war movements, he asserts that "peace is a quiet passion," wherein "you bite your tongue 100 times for every time you speak a word." Evidently this is true for words of protest only; certainly the Peace Corps cannot be accused of having conserved words in its own praise.

The eight volunteers from Ecuador, in their indictment of the Peace Corps said: "Nearly everyone in the Peace Corps is aware that the organization exists for the American public—not for the volunteers, and certainly not for the countries where it works. Whenever a problem comes up, the staff's first question is: will this hurt our image? . . . The image that the staff seeks to maintain conflicts, in practice, with the work the volunteers want to do." The preoccupation with image has led to a credibility gap within the Peace Corps analogous to the gap which Americans have come to identify with policy agencies of our government. It includes suppression of political expression by PCVs, many of whom were recruited partly on the basis of their political awareness and with the promise that the Peace Corps would afford opportunity for its expression. At Berkeley, in 1966, Vaughn said the Peace Corps itself is "outside politics." "Asked if a PC volunteer would be relieved of his post if he spoke out against the war in Vietnam, he replied," according to the Daily Californian, "that PC volunteers are free to maintain any political position they care to." On June 30, 1967, the Peace Corps announced that Bruce Murray, teaching music in a university in Chile, was fired by the Peace Corps for identifying himself as a PCV in a letter protesting the war in Vietnam and published in a Chilean newspaper. Shortly thereafter, in a letter to The New York Times, ex-associate director of the Peace Corps, Harris Wofford, expressed his disagreement with the policy of curbing dissent in the Peace Corps. This policy has repelled potential volunteers eager to work for peace but unwilling to be muzzled in their statements or actions.

Political expressions by returnees are impossible to control, and even the views of those still within the Corps are proving difficult to curb, as the quotations in this article suggest. Francis Pollock made clear in "Peace Corps Returnees: The New World They See" [The Nation, July 3, 1967] that ex-PCVs are likely to become an increasingly irritating thorn in the side of the Establishment as they become increasingly organized. He quoted Vaughn's petulant comment on a letter to the President, criticizing the war and signed by 800 ex-PCVs (7 per cent of all returnees): "The letter was not spontaneous. I know it was done by outsiders." If ex-PCVs are that subject to manipulation, the Peace Corps is not nearly as successful as it claims to be in its selection and training programs.

A consequence of the greater concern with image than with effect in the Peace Corps has been what the dissenting Ecuador volunteers termed "a numbers game." "In this game, emphasis is placed on the quantity of volunteers, not their quality. A program for 100 volunteers is better than one for 50 even if only 25 are needed. As a result, the Peace Corps must recruit people with marginal skills to meet its quota and assign them where they are not requested or needed. The result of playing this game is obvious: waste of manpower and money."

The Ecuador volunteers described the ethnocentrism of the Peace Corps and many of its personnel as an "arrogance of power." "Semi-literate in its language, nearly ignorant of its culture, we still presume to teach Ecuadorians methods of thought and work that we have inherited from our North American past." The arrogance existed from the beginning. Rep. Henry Reuss of Wisconsin, advocating the Peace Corps in 1960, said "the people of the developing countries need economic assistance, but even more they can profit from exposure to the ideas of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln." But blatant ethnocentrism is not confined to the halls of Congress. Kirby Jones, Ecuador desk officer and program operations officer in the Latin American Division of the Peace Corps, himself a former PCV, wrote recently of the PCV's problems in the field: "Just as Americans are conditioned to take initiative, to respect the law, and to believe almost naively in man's limitless possibilities, Latin Americans are conditioned to the opposite. They tend to be disrespectful of authority, fatalistic concerning their future, dubious of their ability to control their destinies, suspicious of neighbors, desirous of any power or status symbol of their own, reluctant to attempt anything new, and blindly hopeful that something or someone will pull them out of their situation." As the Ecuador volunteers said, "it is an arrogance that is hard to escape."

The arrogance is manifest in the fact that Peace Corps programs emanate almost wholly from its own offices, with little influence from the host country. The Ecuador volunteers noted that "North Americans—not local people—possess both administrative control and the authority to devise programs. Not only has this attitude communicated itself to the Ecuadorians and caused many of them to resent the Peace Corps; it has also proved to be remarkably inefficient. For it blinds the organization's programmers to local conditions they need to understand, and deafens them to the opinions local people set forth about the best way to work here."

One, alone, of the Congressionally defined aims of the Peace Corps seems to have been fulfilled to a significant extent over the years, namely "to help promote . . . a better understanding of other peoples on the part of the American people." Whether or not they have done much for those among whom they have worked, PCVs have learned much from them. PCVs have returned in increasing numbers to this country, bringing with them a new awareness of other people, other values and other ways of life. In the long run this may have a healthy leavening effect on American society, most of whose members have not experienced other societies on a people-to-people basis. A certain empathy may result from the experience, and may be communicated to others. If so, this will have been the greatest benefit of the program. It is a fringe benefit—the same which rationalizes the "junior year abroad" program, for example—but it is worth something. However, it is hardly what host countries were led to anticipate or could be expected to seek and enthusiastically support. Moreover, the Peace Corps is an extremely awkward way to achieve that end. An overt "two years abroad" program that could be devised without the overriding commitment to "image" and to directed change would have the advantages without the concomitant international repercussions of the Peace Corps.

The American dream which generated the Peace Corps has been betrayed in the past seven years by the drift of the nation ever more deeply into a war which is antithetic to everything for which the Peace Corps would have to stand if it were to have a chance for success. The betrayal of the idea of the Peace Corps in this period is, therefore, the betrayal of the American people who voted for Johnson and Humphrey in 1964 as peace candidates. The orphanage languishes when its sponsors are preoccupied with murder, and their intentions are justifiably suspect.

In a different context, the Peace Corps might have spoken for the most humanitarian impulses in American foreign policy and idealism. In the context of war in Vietnam, the Peace Corps is unavoidably debased. Those young Americans who want peace and a better world have come increasingly to believe that their energies can be better used by seeking an end to the war than by joining the Peace Corps. For it is in Vietnam that the greatest human suffering is being experienced now, much of it at the hands of Americans, and it is there that the most suffering might be alleviated by American initiative.

Jack Hood Vaughn says in his Saturday Review article: "Some have suggested that the war is undercutting the work the Peace Corps is doing. But this is not so." He is almost alone in this opinion. As the war worsens, volunteers will continue to become scarcer and the Peace Corps will be evicted from more countries. What was advertised as a genuine alternative to imperialism will be more widely regarded as merely a euphemism for it. More and more people at home and abroad will regard the Peace Corps as a perversion of the original program. Its name will increasingly be identified with such grotesqueries of administrative newspeak as the "pacification" program in Vietnam.

Those who held high hopes for the Peace Corps must regret its failure to fulfill those hopes. In a very real sense they feel betrayed. It is not surprising that they are impelled to inquire into the reasons for that betrayal as I have done. But out of that analysis come a question and a conclusion more fundamental than the immediate causes of failure. The question is, could it have been otherwise? My conclusion is that the Peace Corps, as it was defined and structured, could never have succeeded; that it was never more than a dream.

The Peace Corps was foredoomed because it was based on a philosophy of moral imperialism which could not win the international trust and respect that success would have required. Ambivalence of purpose overlay this philosophy: ambivalence between a dream of the Peace Corps as a humanitarian agency of social and economic help for the needy, and the reality that, as a government agency, it was an adjunct to American cold-war policy. These goals were mutually exclusive. They were consistently confused in the minds of Peace Corps personnel and the American public. The war in Vietnam made their incompatibility clear; but it only emphasized and accelerated what power politics, international competition and the cold war would have accomplished in any case.

If a program of international social service and economic development is to have the confidence of host nations, and is to achieve even a fraction of the effect envisioned by those who originated and served in the Peace Corps, it must be an international undertaking from top to bottom—from administration, staffing, financing and policy making to implementation in the field. It will not be trusted or effective so long as it is an agency of a single national government, least of all a major power, for it will be identified with that government's self-interest. Inevitably, it will be heavily involved with its policies, unable to act without reference to them. This will assure its failure. The American experience with the Peace Corps and the war in Vietnam have made this conclusion inescapably clear.

THE VIETNAM DEAD

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronx People (Harcourt, Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), has recently returned from his second trip to Southeast Asia.

The dead were placed in the rear of the chopper, the wounded in the middle, and I was up front with the walking wounded. The chopper tilts too much getting off and the wounded move too much and you know it hurts. The climb is so steep the blood runs down the channels in the floor. The wounded try to hang on. One goes down. I try to help him up. We all slide on the blood and end up with the dead. The dead seem comfortable. We are taking ground fire now and I hang on to the dead. I am protecting the dead. The dead are protecting me. The chopper levels off. I leave the dead and crowd through the wounded. The medic tells me two of the wounded are dead. He points to them. They do not belong here he says. They belong with the dead.

I have reached the port gunner. He points down. Our tail is dragging the tall bamboo. We cannot get any lift. The dead are pulling us down. There are too many dead. The rotors above us go whack whack whack whack. Just above the silent jungle, whack whack whack whack. Into the jungle, whack whack whack. No, we are still airborne. Whack whack whack whack, still touching through the jungle fog. We cannot see much. See many flame trees. Could grab one. Cannot gain altitude. Will crash. Mountains ahead. Bank safely. Back to where we came from.

I look for landing zone. We had dropped cans of high explosives twenty minutes before to clear for landing. They were happy to get rid of the dead. They will not want the dead back. Whack whack whack whack.

There is a North Vietnamese soldier standing on ridge rock. Black beret, whitish uniform. We fire M-60. He fires a K-47 Chinese gun. Everybody fires. All happy to see one another. Bang bang bang bang, whackety whack whack whack. The chopper is still alive. The dead still dead. You do not worry about getting hit. Worry about the rotors getting hit. Whack whack whack whack.

We are back in our jungle LZ now. We begin to circle. I have the weird thought that our own troops will shoot at us if we try to land. We are supposed to take the wounded and the dead to the outside world. We are supposed to do our job. We are not supposed to take the wounded and the dead on a trip over the jungle. But we cannot get enough lift to get up and out of the valley. I remember a sign in the mess hall base camp: "The impossible is easy if you have someone else to do it for you." But on the ground they have done their job. The results of that job were in our chopper, the wounded and the dead. The LZ looks abandoned now. One of ours rises up from a camouflaged foxhole and waves us away. They don't want the dead back. No one wants the dead. The wounded could be patched up and maybe stand guard. The dead are dead. The dead keep us from getting out of the valley with the live. The dead are a horror to their buddies, a problem to the generals, and tears in the States. The dead are not popular.

Now another American soldier rises up and warns us away. Now another and another. The unwanted dead. We could drop the dead down through the tree canopy jungle. The way the dead would slide gently it would not be a big plop, like dropping them into our cleared LZ. It would not be so rude. It would not reveal our failure. No one would see us. But the dead talk. They talk gently now, subdued in our chopper, quietly at the base in Chu Lai, Danang, Saigon, then home. Who will listen to the voices of the dead? We did. They told us to drop them through the tree canopy jungle and escape with the living. The wounded man said: I am as good as dead. Get rid of us all and make it out. I said, we will all make it out. He said, the dead are lucky, they don't have to take any more shit. I said some encouraging platitude and he smiled a bent smile and touched me and I welcomed this communion with the dead and the medic put him in the rear with the others and we began to throw out all the shit, the ammo and the C-rations, the helmets and the guns. The M-16 breaks like a shotgun and we dropped one piece here, one there, something for everyone, and the ship picked up some altitude and we were up and out of the valley with the dead.

TEACHING THE 'PRE-BACCS'

HEADSTART FOR COLLEGE

LEONARD KRIEGEL

Mr. Kriegel teaches English at the City College of New York, and is currently working on a novel.

The City College of New York Pre-Baccalaureate Program was begun in September, 1965, with 109 students taken directly from New York City's ghettos. In large part the creation of Dr. Leslie Berger, a clinical psychologist who had been with the college since 1961, and Dr. Bernard Levy, at that time director of the college's School of General Studies, the program is an experimental attempt to take young men and women who possess high school diplomas but who ordinarily would not be admitted to the college out of the ghetto, offer them financial help and psychological guidance as non-matriculated students, and then absorb those who are successful into the college's degree-granting program.

By September, 1967, City College's program had grown to include almost 500 students, not counting those who had already dropped out or had passed from the pre-baccalaureate to the baccalaureate stage (a point reached when a student possesses an average of B- or better after thirty credits, or C or better after sixty credits). Similar programs are now in operation at Hunter College in the Bronx, Brooklyn, York and Queens colleges, and others are being set up at the Baruch School of Business and the Park Avenue branch of Hunter. Dr. Berger himself is now at the 42nd Street headquarters of the City University of New York, in charge of the entire Pre-Bacc Program. The Alamac Hotel on Broadway and 71st Street has been taken over as a dormitory for some of the students and, beginning this term, will also be used for additional classrooms. At present, there are more than 2,000 students in the program and, according to Dr. Berger, by 1974 or 1975, the program should be capable of accepting 3,500 students a year, with a total pre-baccalaureate enrollment of 10,000.

I taught a freshman English course in the City College Pre-Bacc Program last semester. It was one of the classes in the program especially designed for the Pre-Bacc students; in other cases they attend courses in the regular college curriculum. It had been three years since I last taught a section of freshman English (in the academic world, one measures success in terms of how far one can remove himself from freshmen—or, for that matter, from students in general). I was in the program at the request of a colleague, Leo Hamalian, who believes as I do that tenured members of the college English Department should teach in the program, especially those who believe that the future of City College is inextricably bound up with the future of the Harlem community.

I confess that I entered the program somewhat hesitantly. Not only was it the kind of teaching that carried no status within the department (a group of younger teachers had been hired to work exclusively with Pre-Bacc students); it was also the kind of teaching that would test my endurance, my patience and my talents as a teacher as nothing I had previously taught had done. Fortunately for me, and for my students, I found the Pre-Bacc teaching staff a remarkably dedicated and helpful group.

I learned a great deal in those early weeks. For instance, I now have a much better idea of what T. S. Eliot's Sweeney means when he says to Doris, "I gotta use words when I talk to you." For if to me the art of writing is no more than the formal organization of language into coherent sentences and the subsequent organization of coherent sentences into coherent paragraphs, to the majority of black and Puerto Rican students it is simply an additional confirmation of failure and ineptitude. For these students, language was far more of a threat than it was a promise, and this despite the richness of the language of the streets. From their point of view, my job was to teach them how to make the words drip with the fat of bureaucracy and to tie them together with the formal invisibility of structures designed to rigidify the soul.

I met my fourteen students (Pre-Bacc classes are smaller than regular freshman English classes, which average twenty-four students) on September 14. Although I had been warned of what to expect by my colleagues in the program, I immediately set about the task of discovering what their problems were. I knew that most of my students had already passed a remedial non-credit course designed to eliminate the most glaring grammatical and syntactical errors.

In six years of teaching full time at the City College, I had never before taught a class with more than two black faces in it. But the class I now stood before had eight Negroes, four Puerto Ricans, one Mexican girl, and a young Jewish mother of two children. I introduced myself, spoke about what the course was designed to do and about our texts, and gave my students their first writing assignment. I then asked them to write a description of Canova's Perseus Holding the Head of Medusa, which had been unveiled at the Metropolitan a week earlier.

If my purpose really was to discover their problems, I succeeded far better than I had planned. To begin with, at least five of these students didn't know where the museum was—and most of them had been born and "educated" in New York. And so I was initiated into the educational box in which ghetto students find themselves. On the day on which the papers were due, a Puerto Rican boy entered my office with a remarkably ornate story of how he had been unable to get to the museum. It was with a shock that I realized that going to the museum frightened him. Not knowing how else to handle it, I told him to bring the paper in the next day or else not to bother coming to class. Fortunately, I hit the right key. He brought the paper in the next day and, by the end of the term, was the second best student in the class.

The night I spent reading that first batch of papers was probably the single most discouraging evening I have ever spent as a teacher. I had expected the grammatical errors and the errors in syntax. I had not expected the kind of paper which began, "When I see in this statue it is the white man holding the head of the Negroe." Virtually all of the papers contained, along with the mechanical errors, this kind of thing. Those that didn't were invariably banal.

About a week later, a 27-year-old former bricklayer in the class came to see me in my office. He wanted to speak about something troubling him. "I'm dropping history," he announced.

"Why?"

"I don't know enough." He shook his head, then shrugged. "Listen, I sit there and these kids. . . . Man, they talk about Freud and Marx and I sit here and I don't know what the hell I'm doing. I never heard of Freud before last week."

"Some of it's talk," I suggested. "It doesn't mean they've read Freud either. Look, I was an expert on Marx when I was 18. But I didn't read him until I was 21."

He shook his head again. "I feel so ignorant. You don't know what it feels like to sit there." We spoke for another fifteen minutes and I finally convinced him not to drop history (I suspect he had convinced himself and merely came to me for confirmation). I suggested a few books he might read. And from that moment on, he became the class for me.

There is one student, in some classes two, to whom a teacher speaks. And he hopes that he can connect with the rest of the class through that student. I was now talking to Wiley Owens, and hoping that the other thirteen members of the class were listening. I wasn't sanguine about their prospects. After that first paper, I jotted down the names of those students I expected to fail. Eight out of fourteen; not very encouraging. During the next few weeks, I discovered that their chief problem was not grammar or syntax, formidable as such problems were; it was rather to permit themselves opinions. This was true of all the students. Poverty teaches one to tread carefully, and no one, certainly no white professor, was going to convince them in a few weeks that they were entitled to bring the quality of their experience and the amount of their information to bear upon the issues confronting them in their lives. Not, at least, in public.

I soon discovered also that not all the problems were theirs. Their teacher had a problem in accepting the idea that their goals weren't really different from those of their white peers. I suppose that what I wanted were students who were going to set about the job of remaking America. What I found were students who "want in." Almost without exception, these students wanted what their white contemporaries had—and they wanted it, significantly enough, at a time when so many white students are turning their backs on it.

For the first half of the term, at least, success was in the air. Curiosity was a luxury, and the civil service beckoned. Most of the girls in the class reminded me of girls with whom I had gone to college. "Teaching is a good job for a girl until she gets married." Few of them were disturbed about the presence of Dow Chemical on campus, which became an issue for the rest of the college. Unless issues could be framed in terms of race, they were, for the most part, indifferent or apathetic. "I want in" is a far more traditional American motivation than protest. Stereotypes can be turned on their heads, and it may just be that Lyndon Johnson knows this America better than any white radical does. In any case, we are not going to be saved by some updated version of a WPA Spirit of Black America, all muscle, bone and fire.

Of course, opinions may differ as to how one gets "in." The contrast hit me most markedly when I went to hear Nat Hentoff and Dan Watts, the editor of The Liberator, discuss the role of the black writer in an emerging revolution. At one point, a student asked, "What should a black student do in a white school?"

"Burn it down!" Watts answered. A few snickers from the audience, almost all of which was black. "Look, what black people in this country have to do is get a piece of the action. And the way you do that is to point a gun at Whitey's head until he gives. There's no other way."

Then I went home and took out my latest batch of papers. I had assigned an "open theme," and with Watts's rhetoric still ringing in my ears, I turned to my first paper, the work of a rather pretty, shy young girl from Bedford-Stuyvesant. It began, "Of all the different ideas, I think that the very best, aside from Father's Day, is Mother's Day."

That was the first week in November, at a time when I was still discouraged. Grammar and syntax had improved, but most of my students were still writing terribly pedestrian papers. About a week later, their papers began to change in tone as well as style. Quite suddenly, they were students, interested in discovering what they could, aware of Vietnam, the unrest on campus, aware now of a world filled with possibilities as well as threats. The young girl who had written so glowingly about the "idea" of Mother's Day came to me at the end of November to ask whether she could do her research paper on Malcolm X. "He used to embarrass me," she explained. "I used to hate him because I worried what people would think when he finished talking. But then, a few weeks ago, I read his Autobiography. And you know, Professor Kriegel, that man . . . he was beautiful."

On November 11, I drove up to Tarrytown to attend a staff and student workshop at the converted estate of a former tobacco magnate. There was something deliciously American, almost surreal, about these ghetto youngsters being ushered politely to their rooms with that meticulous cool possessed only by headwaiters and house managers. "Jesus, you ought to see the rooms,"

I heard one excited student say to a just arrived friend. It was a fine weekend—good food, ample drinks, a magnificently symbolic setting, some useful workshops for teachers in the program throughout the City University system, and just the proper spicing of revolutionary rhetoric.

The Saturday afternoon panel was especially interesting. Ten Pre-Bacc students from the college discussed their reaction to the program. Nervous at first, they began to open up about what they liked and disliked under the firm guidance of Addison Gayle, a young Negro writer who teaches in the program at City. As I sat in that audience, listening to these students, I had the very uncomfortable feeling that, however unconsciously, they were beginning to perform a collective role that had somehow been mapped out for them. For the most part, their barbs were reserved for the psychological counselors. Two students mentioned their sense of inferiority before the counselors. "You can't open up your heart to a man who you know is your enemy," said one young militant. "I want to be accepted as an individual," said a young girl.

I suppose that what disturbed me about the panel is what disturbed me about these two remarks—that they could have been voiced by any white student at the college. In fact, they could be voiced by almost all students, black and white, from Harvard to Harvey Mudd. Perhaps the indictment that struck me as most pathetic was one student's lament, "They don't care." Now the kind of counseling to which these students are exposed leaves me less than satisfied, and my own students were beginning to complain about it in private. But while I have my doubts about the efficacy of what is being done, it seems to me that the problem is that the counselors care too much. They identify with what they cannot really feel. One of my own students was later to complain, "I have problems with my work. I want help. For the first time in my life, I'm really beginning to read. And then, I go into the office with these two other students. I want to talk about what I'm doing. But we always wind up talking about that race business. Man, I know how real it is. Who knows better? But I have other problems, too."

"That race business," I knew, was on the mind of every one of my Pre-Bacc students. One of the reasons for the existence of the program, undoubtedly the major reason, is the militancy now seizing the ghetto communities of New York. But it takes an exceptional student to hold on to his sense of militancy and racial identity, on the one hand, and the demands made upon him by a system which he views with a mixture of suspicion and desire on the other. This is not an intellectual problem. If I learned nothing else during the semester, I learned that what Nat Hentoff had written about ghetto kids possessing "as much potential as middle-class children" remains miraculously true for many of them—even when they are adults.

But education is one thing, and fusing the demands made by a college curriculum to the demands made by ghetto street life is another. Wiley Owens was able to do it, but he had been out in the world. He had served in the army, he was married, he had worked as a bricklayer: he knew what it was like, he knew the prices he had paid, and he had begun to discover what it was he wanted. But most of my other students, like most of the students on that panel, felt this conflict between their aspirations and their backgrounds. "I want to play the numbers as well as have the knowledge you have," said one student on that panel. It is a desire I believe I can understand, if for no other reason than that I can still remember how desperately I wanted to retain the shrill Jewish street life of Jerome Avenue and Keats's sonnets.

Unfortunately, the day comes when one has to choose, and it seems to me a lie to pretend otherwise. You can afford to be nostalgic about a ghetto only when you have left it. The fact that these students, especially the black ones, also had to choose between their militancy and their desire for "the knowledge you have" accounts for why a goodly number have already dropped out of the program. It is an extremely difficult problem to handle. America is a cruel country; it thrusts choices on us. And it seems highly unlikely that America will permit the fulfillment of aspiration and the retention of militancy and racial pride. It will permit the illusion, not the reality. The day may come when the student is going to find black ghetto life too drab, too dead, too meaningless for him. And if it does, he is going to be faced with the problem of breaking the umbilical cord or dropping out of the world of Whitey's culture.

Once they had begun to find a voice, I faced the problem of forcing my students away from abstractions. The function of the humanities is inevitably—and this is especially true at a time when humanism is facing the consequences of all its past compromises—to pull the individual back to a sense of self as well as a sense of other. "I know about you," said a pretty black student on that panel, as she stared out at this audience of teachers and administrators, more than half of them white. "My mother put the wax on your floors." It is, of course, just as simplistic for her to assume that she can create an abstraction out of white people because her mother waxed floors as it is for me to expect all black students to be politically conscious because their mothers, too, waxed floors. Possessed of my own very real working-class credentials, I know enough about hard physical labor to realize that it provides insight only into fatigue.

What I suspect existed in that student, and in most of the students on that panel, was as much the desire for rhetoric as it was the desire for revolution. And while rhetoric may lead to revolution, it may also—and in America such a possibility seems far more likely—absorb just those energies that would ordinarily be devoted to creating meaningful change. A number of students on that panel vehemently insisted on their right to define themselves in terms of color. But they were just as vehement in denying that they could be understood in terms of color. They object to the inherent racism in our society which enables a teacher of history at City College to begin the first class of the term by asking, "Will all of the Pre-Bacc students stand up?" And since nine out of ten Pre-Bacc students are black or Puerto Rican, they have become what one student accurately labeled "specimens rather than students."

Without pushing the Pre-Bacc Program out of proportion to its achievements or aims, it is one of the few hopeful signs in what is called "higher education" that I know of. Despite Berkeley, despite William Arrowsmith's perceptive and much needed indictment of the humanities, despite the condemnation of the corruption of the academy by the young and a few of their over-30 elders, the fact is that American colleges and universities have managed to remain remarkably unaffected by the cries in our midst.

The City College of New York, which built its reputation as one of the country's finest undergraduate institutions by serving residents of other ghettos, stands in the heart of Harlem. But it protects itself from Harlem with a wall built out of "academic standards." What is so hopeful about the Pre-Bacc Program is that it has already dented that wall. And it promises to break it down. I do not know what percentage of my students will emerge with degrees from the college. I no longer particularly care. "You've got to understand," a student said to me just before the term ended. "When I came to this school, I figured that if I could get one year . . . just one year . . . of Whitey's college, I would be changed. And you know, I am. Man, they made me hungry. And it's not the money any more. I want it all. Even to be a poet. Man, I want that, too."

There are problems in the program, including certain signs of tension between black and Puerto Rican students. The black students at the college, both Pre-Bacc and matriculated, have framed a sense of community which the Puerto Rican students do not yet possess. I sense, among many of the Puerto Rican students, a belief that they are at the periphery of the program. Another danger is that the program might become a mere siphon for ghetto frustration rather than a way of breaking through the barrier of "academic standards" which are neither academic nor truly representative of intellectual ability. This is something that ghetto residents will simply have to guard against in the future. One thing mitigating against it is that the chancellor of the City University, Albert Bowker, has wholeheartedly supported the Pre-Bacc Program from its inception.

Teaching in the program affected me in an area I had not at all expected. It taught me to affirm once again that very intellectual tradition I had begun to doubt. Shakespeare, Melville and Milton are mine once again, perhaps in a way that they never were before. Teaching freshman English with a group of students who began as semi-literates has given me more insight into that tradition than such academic plums as teaching in the honors program or in the graduate school. When the term ended, I went down to Cocoa Beach, Fla., where I saw my first black road gang. A few hundred yards down the road from where those prisoners were working there was a shopping center, its neon modernity structured, its cleanliness antiseptic. On the shopping center billboard, in bold green letters, I read: "See Stalin's Limousine—Help Crippled Kids—Thursday Friday Saturday." Ellison tells us that we are invisible to one another. Watts tells black students to burn the college down, and City College, we all realize, is no more than a momentary metaphor for this America. But metaphors are haunting: they sometimes turn into realities. Ellison knows the virus and I am beginning to think that Watts may really think he has found the cure. And so in desperation I seize upon a line from Melville who, despite the color of his skin, was one of their spiritual forebears, too. "Kings as clowns is codgers—who ain't a nobody?" Melville, I tell myself, knew how limited the choices are. With that in mind, I look forward to meeting again those twelve out of fourteen students who successfully completed the course

LETTER FROM LONDON

SOCIALISM'S CRISIS OF THEORY

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

We are now in the fourth year of Labour government in Britain; in the normal course, there are still three more years to go. This experience has taught us a good deal about the relations between capitalism, social democracy and socialism. For the Labour Party is still, on paper, the largest social democratic party in the world. Its narrow victory in 1964 and its substantial victory in 1966 were seen by many people, in Britain and elsewhere, as a major opportunity for democratic and Socialist reform. Given the fact that the only other major versions of socialism were occurring in very different historical circumstances—orthodox communism in Eastern Europe, revolutionary national liberation in the ex-colonial world—it was natural for many people in Western Europe and the United States to see in Labour's parliamentary victories their own kind of future. There are, of course, unique factors in the British situation, but the record is still one of general importance.

And then the first thing that must be said is that the Labour government is now deeply alienated from its own party. The degree of opposition, bewilderment and frustration inside the Labour movement could hardly be overestimated. At the national level, this appears in the parliamentary crisis, in which more than twenty Left MPs are being disciplined for abstaining on a vote of confidence. It appears also in the direct confrontations now taking place between the government and the largest trade unions, which are under Left leadership. These events make the headlines, but behind them is the more serious and more long-term erosion of support, among party workers and members.

What kind of crisis is this? There are three main interpretations. First, the ordinary official line: Labour took over a bankrupt Britain, and the only way to carry through social reforms was to restore the economic position. The theory underlying this version goes back, essentially, to an argument in the 1950s, and the men associated with what was then seen as the revisionist line are now, after the latest government changes, in charge of economic affairs: the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Roy Jenkins, and the president of the Board of Trade, Anthony Crosland. The argument is that Britain is no longer a capitalist society; that the welfare state, the managerial revolution, and the acceptance of indicative economic planning have outdated traditional Socialist demands; that the business of a Labour government is to direct such an economy efficiently, and out of the resulting growth to improve education, to liberalize institutions, and to promote equality. If the choice then has to be made, in a crisis, between the growth and the social benefits, the solution seems obvious: the benefits can come only out of the growth; therefore a Socialist government puts the economic measures first—and must be bold in doing so, against the naive outcries of old-fashioned Socialists who want to create social benefits "out of nothing" (redistribution rather than growth).

The second interpretation is a variant of the first. It is associated with another leading member of the government, Richard Crossman, who in the 1950s sometimes opposed the revisionist line. His argument has been that Labour inherited not only a bankrupt economy but a backlog of imperial and military commitments, from which withdrawal was bound to be slow but was necessary. The roots of the economic crisis were in this imperial hangover. The latest decisions, to withdraw from east of Suez and to reduce military expenditure, mark, he has argued, the beginning of a post-imperial phase in which Britain can find new goals. At the same time, government direction of the economy, including especially its prices and incomes policy, marks a stage in the inauguration of socialism: the economy is being planned and brought to public account. Since each of these transitions is painful, the government has lost support and confused the party, but now at last the direction is clear.

Before taking up the third interpretation, one should note the grounds on which the Left in the party has opposed the two former lines. There have been various stages of this, but opposition to military expenditure, especially east of Suez, and criticism of deflationary policies intended to maintain a fixed parity of the pound sterling have been notable. Now, with the east of Suez withdrawal announced for the seventies, and with the pound sterling devalued to a power parity, these points of opposition are compromised; they tie in quite readily with the Crossman version. The other bases of opposition—that the prices and incomes policy is just a mystifying name for control of wages, and that cutting social benefits is irrelevant to economic recovery—are of course incompatible with either version; it is on these points that the Left MPs are now sticking.

The confusion is obvious, and yet is understandable. The crisis has been of a kind that required from Socialists a new theoretical account of advanced capitalism, and of the British situation in the world. This was very difficult to achieve, and the weakness of the Left is directly related to its delay in doing so. We have all had to learn through the turns of a crisis that required short-term reactions, which then often became outdated. The disappointment, bewilderment and anger of Labour supporters needed no organization; it was quite spontaneous. But the Left is now learning that spontaneity is not salvation; the most likely result of the government's loss of support is, after all, the return of the Tories, and the indefinite postponement of Socialist advance of any kind. That, perhaps, is the real crisis of social democracy.

The only authentic theories were indeed of the Crosland or Crossman kind: that capitalism had been tamed, and could be finally outdated by gradual social reforms; that the imperialist phase was ending, and the only problem was to be rid of the hangover. When such versions were applied to the real world, the experience was bitter and harsh; but there was then a gap between the consciousness of continuing exploitation and violence, and any effective response in the social-democratic tradition. All that could be fought was a skirmish, moving from this point to that.

It is at this point that the third interpretation is beginning to establish itself. It is a point reached by many Socialists, including myself; its main statement was the May Day Manifesto, which is being reissued in an expanded version by Penguin in a few months. Basically, it defines a new stage of capitalism and a new kind of imperialism; it relates the policies of the Labour government, and the confusions of its supporters, to the transitional character of these new social forms.

Take the case on new capitalism, as related to the British economic crisis. The argument of the third interpretation is based on the emergence, through technical change, of larger economic units, which need a new kind of control of both markets and labor. This requires a new kind of relationship with the state: the building of new institutions, both for indicative economic planning and for the control of labor and material costs. At this point, what is seen by Crosland and Crossman as a post-capitalist society, offering the opportunity for state participation in economic growth and reorganization, is seen by Socialists as a new stage of capitalism, into which social democracy can be assimilated. What are the crucial tests, in actual policy? That the larger economic units, formed through merger and take-over (now often promoted and assisted by the Labour government), are capitalist units can hardly be doubted. Though heavily dependent on the state for markets and finance, they are in private hands and are producing for private profit. The wages policy, actively pursued by the government, is now causing an actual reduction in the standard of living of wage earners. In that sense, any claim that this strategy is Socialist, in purpose or in detail, fails.

Waite, The Sun (London): Ben Roth

But the strategy can be understood only in an international context. Basically, it is related to the economic success of the much larger economic units of the United States corporations, and the more effective planning of markets by the European Economic Community. To compete in this capitalist world, the advanced capitalist option seemed inevitable in Britain, since competitive failures produced recurrent balance of payments crises, and eventually devaluation. Some years ago, an essential strategy was adopted: to build larger capitalist units in Britain, and to join the Common Market. This meant breaking down certain old capitalist structures in Britain, and getting the trade union movement under control. As the competitive situation got worse, this policy became more and more open. At the same time, it was continually thwarted: by the de Gaulle veto; by union resistance, in very costly strikes; by the exposed position of an over-valued currency and the special vulnerability of sterling as an international banking and trading medium. The costs of the policy mounted, and the latest measures, which amount to a very severe deflation, marked a peak.

Meanwhile, the ideology which had supported them, of a tamed capitalism, also collapsed. What had been the distinctive social democratic elements—improvement of the welfare state, progressive social equality, full employment—had to go. We now have severe cuts in the health service; in the standard of living of the poorest 7 million; in education and in school construction, in housing, and the highest postwar level of unemployment. These are the costs of a capitalist solution by a backward economy, and the competitive position is such that we shall be unusually lucky if, even at this cost, the economic situation can be restored.

At this point, the military cuts become relevant. It is clear to everyone that the margin is so narrow that the projected increases in military expenditure cannot be afforded. Moreover, the essential strategy of withdrawal to Europe had already been decided on. In that sense, the east of Suez withdrawal was foreseen and inevitable. But Britain is still committed to participation in a military alliance led by the United States; its military expenditure in Europe and the Mediterranean is still heavy; commitment to NATO is reaffirmed. When the real figures are looked at, the cost to Britain of this military commitment will, by 1970, still be of the order now being borne. What is being cut will be balanced by the general escalation. And it remains probable that the commitment, as now redesigned, will, in the critical years ahead, still be an intolerable burden on an already desperate economy. The United States will probably have to choose again—as it has been choosing—between Britain as a less effective military partner and Britain as a collapsed economy.

There is an alternative Socialist policy: immediate reduction of the military commitment and nationalization of overseas private assets, which are in fact more than enough to liquidate Britain's crippling international debts. This is the real meaning of the crisis of social democracy, because either measure, and especially their combination, would provoke an international and internal conflict of major proportions. They would involve withdrawing from NATO, and the effective nationalization of the banking system; and both to be accomplished from a position not of strength but of weakness. Faced with this choice, the Labour government has decided to pay the costs of a capitalist solution, as the easier option. But in doing so, it has cut itself off from its own political base, and is in effect ending, under pressure, the moderate social democratic future on which it was built. As long as the social costs could be afforded, the compromise solution of transforming capitalist society by cooperation and gradual reform was plausible. The hard fact now is that the social costs cannot be afforded, and so the basis for the Labour Party, as it has hitherto existed, is crumbling.

There is no immediate alternative of a Socialist kind. The Conservatives will in due course come back, and will pursue essentially similar policies without the same internal political difficulties. The crisis is already changing its shape. The crucial struggles will be between a government of either party and the trade union movement; for when the withdrawal to Europe and entry into the Common Market have eventually been achieved, this conflict will be the only remaining obstacle to effective stabilization as a second-rank capitalist power. It is a major obstacle. Twice already, in the strikes of the seamen and of the dockers, a single major dispute has been enough to provoke crisis in a knife-edge economic situation: the deflation of July, 1966, followed the seamen's strike; revaluation followed the docks strike. The unions are still strong and some of the most important are militant; moreover, they are getting neither their immediate demands in wage increases, nor their political demands in full employment, an improving welfare state, extended education. It will be a very tough struggle indeed.

I write as one who grew up in the social democratic tradition and as a Labour Party member and worker for most of my life. What I now see shaping up is the uncomfortable conclusion that social democracy, in its traditional forms, was the theory of a rich and protected society, which allowed room for serious social advance within its inheritance. As the inheritance disappears, and Britain is competitively weak and exposed, the theory and its forms begin to crumble. What Crossman says is a brilliant rationalization; a last optimistic kick. What Crossland says is a deeper rationalization, for in the increasing severity of the crisis the social objectives are in effect dropped (the postponements have been too many and too regular, and nobody now believes in the happy land of 1970).

An advanced capitalist solution is of course possible; the unions may be contained or defeated. But the society that would then emerge—of education redrafted as industrial training, of selective welfare services, of the acceptance of a margin of unskilled poor and unemployed, of membership in a capitalist trading community and a military alliance of the rich nations against the poor of the world—would not be salable as social democracy. It is already the active ideology of the British Conservative Party and its counterparts in the other lands of the advanced industrial West. It would not be stable, internally and especially internationally; any effective challenge to it would be more explicitly Socialist and revolutionary, and in the confusion of traditions would for some years be isolated.

That is the hard future some of us now foresee. Under pressure, and in the confusion of any society in which a major political tradition is ending, we are working to change ourselves and our organizations, so that our response and our struggle will be as hard as they need to be.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Warren Report & the Irreconcilables

SIX SECONDS IN DALLAS. By Josiah Thompson. Bernard Geis Associates. 323 pp. $8.95.

ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT: The Warren Commission, The Authorities & The Report. By Sylvia Meagher. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. 477 pp. $8.50.

FRED J. COOK

Mr. Cook is the author of many special articles for The Nation. His latest book is The Plot Against the Patient, an exposé of hospital malpractices and overcharges (Prentice-Hall).

Each new probing book into the assassination of President John F. Kennedy brings America a few steps closer to an inevitable moment of confrontation with the facts. The issue for the country is much larger than the personal tragedy of Dallas that prostrated so many Americans and still haunts the minds of men. For, to be charitable, the Warren Report is today almost universally regarded as something less than satisfying, but if its lone-assassin thesis is truly invalid, the alternative is shocking. In that event, we are brought face to face with the theory of a conspiracy—a conspiracy that succeeded and whose perpetrators are still at large.

These two new books by Josiah Thompson and Sylvia Meagher force even the reluctant (Max Lerner is an example) along the path that leads to the second conclusion. Vastly different in approach and method, they marshal an array of new and little known facts that make belief in the lone-assassin conclusion of the Warren Report virtually impossible. Mrs. Meagher is noted for her comprehensive knowledge of the huge mass of Warren Commission testimony, investigative reports and exhibits. Her first book comprised an index of this material, and in her second, Accessories After the Fact, her central thesis, which she demonstrates time and again in specific instances, is that the Warren Commission throughout its investigation employed a double standard: any detail, however specious, that supported the one-assassin theory was given the commission's official imprimatur as fact; any testimony, however seemingly credible, that conflicted with this conclusion was ignored or rationalized out of existence. Thompson, assistant professor of philosophy at Haverford College, takes a different approach. He concentrates on the deed itself, on the record of what actually happened in those six seconds in Dallas. He studies minutely all the photographic evidence, obviously the most factual evidence, and he endeavors by dispassionate, scientific analysis to relate all other evidence to this undeniable pictorial record. The result in both cases is hard to reconcile with the conclusions of the Warren Report.

Most readers will probably learn for the first time from Sylvia Meagher's book that the precise assassination method used in Dallas was spelled out in detail for authorities nearly two weeks in advance of the event. Before the trip to Dallas, President Kennedy had gone to Miami. Police there were worried about security, for an informer told them that, while attending meetings of extremist groups, he had heard repeated talk about an assassination attempt. On November 9, 1963, Miami police got their informer to inveigle a hard-core member of one of these extremist groups into a conversation that was tape recorded. According to the Miami police, he "said that a plan to kill the President was in the works. He said Kennedy would be shot with a high-powered rifle from an office building, and he said that the gun would be disassembled, taken into the building, assembled, and then used for murder." The tape recording contained this direct quote: "They will pick up somebody within hours afterwards . . . just to throw the public off."

This tape-recorded blueprint matched in virtually every detail what actually happened thirteen days later in Dallas. "To dismiss this extraordinary advance description and warning . . . as mere coincidence requires nothing less than a complete suspension of critical judgment," Mrs. Meagher writes.

The man who was picked up "within hours" after the assassination in Dallas was, of course, Lee Harvey Oswald. An Italian-made Mannlicher-Carcano rifle, which Oswald had purchased from a Chicago mail order house, was found on the 6th floor of the Texas School Book Depository, where Oswald worked. Witnesses reported seeing a rifle protruding from a 6th-floor window, seeing the indistinct figure of a gunman there, hearing shots fired from there. Three shells from the Carcano were found on the floor near a 6th-floor window; President Kennedy had been wounded at least twice, Gov. John B. Connally, Jr., of Texas, at least once. It all seemed pat. Three shots, three shells, three wounds—and Oswald the lone gunman. So Dallas police decided almost instantly, and the FBI and the Warren Commission went along with their verdict.

Yet Thompson points out that there was from the start very persuasive evidence that only two shots, not three, could have been fired from Oswald's gun. Two of the ejected shells bore markings that only could have "been produced by the chamber of Oswald's rifle," according to the FBI, but the third lacked any such identification. Furthermore, this third casing had a badly dented lip which would have prevented it from holding a cartridge. This dual evidence—the damaged casing, the lack of the kind of identifying marks left by Oswald's Carcano after actual firing—certainly indicates that Shell No. 3 was not loaded and fired on November 22. There is one further addendum. The handling of this evidence by Dallas police was most peculiar. The two casings that bore the appropriate firing marks were turned over to the FBI instantly—but not the third, black-sheep casing. It was not until November 28, after the FBI had specifically demanded it, that the Dallas police surrendered this most suspect of shells. The whole sequence strongly suggests that here, at the very beginning, was a flaw in what was to become the Warren Commission's case for the lone assassin. The commission simply had to account for three shots being fired—and here was evidence that only two shots could have come from Oswald's gun.

Contradictions multiply. The Warren Commission, in developing its lone-assassin case, ran headlong into the timing imperatives resulting from a movie film of the assassination taken by Abraham Zapruder. The Zapruder film seemingly established this fact: if the shot that first wounded President Kennedy and the shot that struck Governor Connally were separate shots, there had to be at least two gunmen. The reason: the fastest trigger fingers the commission could find could not get off two shots in the time interval between the wounding of President Kennedy, as recorded on film, and the wounding of Governor Connally. So the commission concluded that Governor Connally, his wife and all other witnesses who testified that there were two separate hits were wrong, and to reconcile the apparently irreconcilable, it developed what became known as "the single-bullet theory." This postulated the following sequence of events: the first shot hit the President in the upper back, came out his throat after passing through only soft tissues, rushed downward into Governor Connally's back, traversed his body, shattered a rib, fractured his right wrist and gashed his thigh. It has always been difficult to reconcile this construction, in which the Warren Commission puts its faith, with what one sees on the Zapruder film. This shows President Kennedy definitely reacting to his first wound at frame 224 (the frames are individual pictures on the rolling movie strip), and it shows Governor Connally turning his head, twisting his body and acting perfectly naturally for almost a full second afterward. The commission rationalized away this visual evidence by arguing that the Governor may have had a delayed reaction to his wound.

Thompson does great damage to this comforting theory. As a researcher, he had one great advantage. He happened to be employed as an adviser by Life, and Life possessed the original of the Zapruder film, which few persons have seen. The film in the National Archives in Washington, the one used by the FBI and the Warren Commission, is a copy of a copy—and so not nearly so clear and sharp as the original Thompson was privileged to study. Thompson found this: the Governor's mouth opens in what appears to be an exclamation in frame 236. "Then, suddenly, in Z238 his cheeks puff and, in succeeding frames, his mouth opens wide—he gives the appearance of someone who has just had the wind knocked out of him." Thompson cites medical evidence to show that this reaction, the result of the compression of the chest wall and an involuntary opening of the epiglottis followed by a rush of expelled air, would take place within a quarter to half a second after impact. The logical conclusion that can be drawn is that the President and the Governor were hit by separate shots—and if they were, there had to be more than one assassin.

Now comes confusion. The autopsy performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital on the night of the assassination confused the situation it was supposed to clarify. The pathologists in charge were not specialists in forensic medicine; they had not dealt with hundreds of gunshot cases as have the medical examiners in our largest cities. Furthermore, they were not aware until after they had finished their autopsy that doctors at Parkland Hospital in Dallas had found a wound in the President's throat at the level of the Adam's apple, a wound that had been obliterated by the tracheotomy performed there. The result was that the autopsy failed to establish beyond question the single most important thing it should have established—the trajectory of the first shot that hit the President.

The trajectory, as any police reporter knows, is all important in determining where a given shot was fired from, whether a suspect could have fired this shot or whether it would have had to be fired from another location by someone else. Not too much could be deduced from the fatal head wound because it was so massive, but the first shot through the body should have settled vital issues. It did not. As an FBI report later disclosed, the pathologists probed the President's back wound for a depth of about 2 inches, found it closed off, and concluded that the bullet had probably fallen out of the back during treatment at Parkland. Learning that a whole and remarkably undeformed bullet had indeed been found on a stretcher in Parkland, they decided that was it. But the next day they learned of the wound in the President's throat; they had already observed tissue damage that had seemingly been caused by a bullet's passage; and so they revised their findings, concluding that the bullet that had caused the back wound had passed out through the throat. The wound, however, was never probed in its entirety, establishing a trajectory, nor were the tissues dissected, the final and necessary procedure for the skilled forensic pathologist.

From all of this there has stemmed a mare's-nest of rumor, speculation and argument. Thompson adopts the thesis that the first bullet penetrated only a couple of inches and that this was indeed the nearly perfect bullet, known as commission's exhibit 399, that was found on a stretcher in Parkland. He explains the throat wound by theorizing that it was caused by a bone splinter from the final head shot, angling down and out the throat. The trouble with this thesis is that it conflicts with the photographic evidence on which Thompson bases his book. The Zapruder film does not show the President arching his back or slapping at a bee sting in his shoulder; it shows him raising his clenched hands, his elbows almost at shoulder level, as he appears to be trying to claw some strangling thing out of his throat. This reaction occurs some four seconds before the final head shot. Thompson tries to reconcile the conflict by arguing that we do not know precisely how a person would react to a 2-inch back wound, the kind of dubious rationalization to which the Warren Commission itself was so addicted.

Some of the confusion about this first shot stems from the small size of the throat wound. The appearance of this wound led Parkland doctors to believe that it was an entrance wound, not an exit wound; and, since there is usually a

LETTER

So they too lecture us on how to live and feel.

Well, they're right, I guess.

*My sickness, this halting monolith of sullen dust I scrape and shave; today, this face, these stalled eyes,
a mother could not make them weep.
The world passes a doomed face.*

*It is quite different here this time,
and not surprising, after everything.
Blind, angry, haunted, my windows call and drench me in my chair; the air is dead and deep, the breath of my own blessing falls.
These friendships die of love. Fired, we move again, we move again, again. . . .*

*O now, there, about us, silent, innocent, in their own sweet dreams I pray for them,
the leaves, our broken days, descend and gather.
O I'm tired, wife, my mind is late October in the ditch.
Forgive me, I will not call. Live, live, while I'm away, and David, Paula, fair Daniel,
my father Arthur, my mother Elizabeth, take care;*

and you, wife, you are a good woman, you have nothing to be ashamed of, do you hear, nothing to be ashamed of, no matter what I've said.

MILTON KESSLER

difference between the two—entrance wounds are smaller and neater, exit wounds larger and more jagged—some critics have argued that the President was shot from the front, not the back. In an effort to clear up some of the confusion, I talked to Dr. Milton Helpern, the New York City medical examiner, who is nationally recognized as a foremost authority in his field. Dr. Helpern has been highly critical of the Bethesda autopsy and is inclined to believe that the President and Governor Connally were wounded by separate shots. But he is also impatient at some of the uninformed speculation.

"It's nonsense to draw any conclusions from the FBI report of what went on during the autopsy," he says. "You sometimes don't know where you are yourself during an examination and what you took for an exit hole may turn out to be an entrance wound. You cannot always tell. The pathologist himself, faced with a case in which there are multiple wounds, may be at sea for a time until he has followed the thing through and worked it out."

Dr. Helpern emphasizes that a bullet passing through a body has to leave a track—but not a tunnel. "It's not the same thing as drilling a cylindrical core," he says. "When a bullet passes through soft tissues and muscles, the track often collapses. It is not like a bullet hitting into skull, into hard bone, where it leaves a definite core that you can follow. When tissues collapse, you cannot always probe the wound. Sometimes you have to work and try to realign the muscles to get a probe through. If you can't, you have to do it by dissection, tracing the passage of the bullet through the tissues. Always you should verify by dissection."

It becomes apparent that there was no special significance in the Bethesda pathologists' finding that the back wound was closed off after a 2-inch penetration. Such closing of the bullet track is to be expected in soft tissues, and it does not rule out the possibility that the bullet did pass completely through the body and out the throat. The FBI's scientific analysis of the President's clothing leaves little doubt that this is what happened. Fibers in the back of the coat and shirt were bent in; those in the front of the shirt were thrust outward. Dr. Helpern believes, in addition, that other autopsy findings regarding the bruising and damage to tissues as the bullet passed fully support the conclusion that this was indeed the bullet track.

Since the best evidence establishes so much, where does this leave us in deciding the trajectory of this first shot? The Bethesda pathologists placed the back wound 14 centimeters (5½ inches) down from the point of the mastoid bone and the same distance in from the point of the right shoulder. When one lines up this back entrance wound with the throat exit wound, one comes up with a bullet traveling in "almost a straight line, even perhaps a little upward," Dr. Helpern says. He adds quickly, however, that this would not rule out a shot from Oswald's window, traveling at a downward angle of more than 17 degrees, if the President were leaning forward when he was hit.

The trouble is that he was not leaning forward. The Zapruder film shows him sitting upright, waving to the crowd, and Thompson demonstrates, by analyzing other films taken from different angles, that the President was perfectly erect at the instant the shot was fired. The indisputable film evidence would seem to vitiate the leaning-forward hypothesis, which is the only way the angle of this first shot can be reconciled with the course of a bullet fired from Oswald's gun.

The finding is basic because the Warren Commission's whole lone-assassin case rests on the assumption that this first shot was fired on a downward trajectory, and this assumption became in turn the basis for the seemingly indisputable logic on which its single-shot theory was based. The logic was expressed in the question: If this bullet did not go on and hit Governor Connally, what happened to it? It was going downward, it was not found in the car; ergo, it must have hit the Governor. This was the reasoning that led C.B.S., in its reconstruction of the case last summer, to support the single-bullet theory. This shot, it argued, had to go somewhere.

True, but when one realizes that the President was sitting in the back seat of a limousine elevated several inches so that he could be better seen by the Dallas crowds, when one realizes that the trajectory of this first shot was on a level or even slightly rising plane, then it becomes apparent that this bullet, after wounding the President, did not have to touch anything else in the car. And it becomes apparent that the bullet was fired from a different location than Oswald's 6th-floor aerie.

In analyzing the final and fatal head shot, Thompson adopts a thesis that is being increasingly embraced by critics of the Warren Report. This is that the President was struck by two almost simultaneous head shots at Zapruder frames 312-313. The Warren Commission held that one shot struck the President in the rear of the head, fragmented and blew out the right side of his skull, causing a massive wound. The Zapruder film, however, raises doubts. It shows the President's head starting to move forward, apparently under the

"A rare and painfully honest record of what it meant to be Asian during World War II." — Book-of-the-Month Club News.

BREAK-THROUGH IN BURMA

Memoirs of a Revolution, 1939-1946

Ba Maw

Independent Burma's first Head of State

This autobiographical account of Burma's long struggle for independence from British rule reveals the intense nationalistic longings of a people under colonial power—emotions often underestimated by today's decision-makers. In Breakthrough in Burma Dr. Ba Maw presents a vast panorama of the men and events that made up the drama of the war years; no other Southeast Asian leader has published a comparable description of the events of the period. It was at that time that "the seeds of the Burmese future were sown" and we must now face the realization that a knowledge of the wartime story is vital to an understanding of Burma today and indeed, to a complete perception of today's events throughout Southeast Asia.

$8.75

Yale University Press
New Haven and London

force of the shot from the rear, at frame 312. But then in the next and succeeding frames, this motion is reversed, and the President's head and the whole upper part of his body whips violently backward and to the left. Thompson has demonstrated more vividly than anyone else the startling conflict of forces visible here, and he concludes that the backward wrench could only have been caused by a second bullet striking almost simultaneously with the first—a bullet fired from the wooded knoll to the right and in front of the President.

Both Thompson and Mrs. Meagher add one other surprising discovery. They have found in the National Archives an autopsy face sheet not included in the Warren Report. Prepared by pathologists at the autopsy, this diagram shows the entrance hole in the back of the President's skull, and from this an arrow is drawn illustrating the course and thrust of the bullet. But this arrow goes, not to the right in accordance with the commission's theory that this shot blew out the right side of the skull, but to the left. And Thompson demonstrates by some close medical analysis that this charted course agrees perfectly with damage found inside the left part of the President's brain and skull. Such a reconstruction, of course, leaves unexplained the massive wound on the right side of the head.

Where does all this leave Oswald? If he was not the "lone assassin," he was certainly a figure in a plot. After all, his Carcano was found hidden on the 6th floor of the depository and bullet fragments identified as having come from it were found in the front of the Presidential limousine. But was Oswald gunman or "patsy"? We may never know with absolute certainty.

There were witnesses who testified that they saw two men behind the 6th-floor windows of the depository just before the shots were fired. The Warren Commission decided they were all mistaken. But Thompson reproduces frames from an 8-millimeter movie film taken by one Bob Hughes. Hughes was looking directly at the front of the depository building as the motorcade swung into Elm Street below it; and, though he stopped taking pictures about five seconds before the first shot, the last 88 frames on his roll show what appears to be a human figure peering from the window next to the sniper's nest. Thompson demonstrates that the boxes of books stacked behind the window could not have created the appearance of the head-and-shoulders outline of a man because the boxes did not come up that high.

The indications of conspiracy multiply. The most startling single attention-calling incident is the Odio affair. Sylvia Odio, a 26-year-old Cuban émigrée who was active in anti-Castro movements, was living in Dallas in late September, 1963, when three men came calling. They told her they were members of the anti-Castro underground and claimed to be friends of her father, a political prisoner in Cuba. Two of the men appeared to be Cubans or Mexicans; the other was introduced as "Leon Oswald."

The day after this visit, Mrs. Odio testified, she received a telephone call from one of the visitors, a man who had called himself "Leopoldo." He told her that "Leon Oswald" was a former Marine; that he was a crack marksman; that "Oswald" felt President Kennedy should have been assassinated after the fiasco of the Bay of Pigs; and that "Oswald" was "loco" and the kind of man who would do anything.

Two months later, when Mrs. Odio heard of the assassination of President Kennedy, she fainted. When Oswald's picture was flashed on television, both she and her sister identified him positively as the "Leon Oswald" who had visited them in September with "Leopoldo." Investigation showed that Mrs. Odio had discussed the September visit with her doctor a few days after the event. There was also a letter from her father showing that she had written to him, inquiring whether he knew the three visiting men. And one of the counsels for the Warren Commission conceded that she had supplied details she could not possibly have known had the incident not happened.

How then could this occurrence, with all its implications, be shoved under the rug? In late August, 1964, the Warren Commission asked the FBI to investigate the Odio affair more thoroughly. In a little more than two weeks, the FBI, which in months had produced nothing further on the matter, came up with a handy explanation. It reported, just as the commission was winding up its investigation, that it had located a man named Loran Eugene Hall who said that he and two companions were the men who visited Mrs. Odio. One of his associates, Hall said, was a William Seymour, who looked much like Oswald. Jumping to a rapid-fire conclusion, the commission labeled the whole episode as a case of mistaken identity. After the commission disbanded, the FBI located William Seymour. He denied that he had even been in Dallas in September, 1963; denied he had ever had any contact with Sylvia Odio. Subsequent FBI interviews with all the parties concerned resulted in the complete collapse of the "Hall-Seymour" version that had enabled the Warren Commission to avoid recognizing the telltale odor of plot.

If, then, there was a plot, just what did it involve? Mrs. Meagher's researches point strongly to an involvement by at least some elements of the Dallas police and to a shadowy Oswald connection with federal agencies. Dallas police insisted to the Warren Commission that right up to the moment of the assassination they had never heard of Lee Harvey Oswald. Yet in a memorandum drawn up by the detective division on the afternoon of the assassination, they had revealed knowledge of an old and obscure address of Oswald's. They listed him as living at 605 Elsbeth Street, an address that did not appear in any of the records of the Texas School Book Depository. In 1962 and early 1963, Oswald had lived at 602 Elsbeth Street, and instant police knowledge, not quite precise but close, of this old address would seem to indicate an awareness which the Dallas force had denied. Allen Dulles, former CIA chief and a member of the Warren Commission, evidently appreciated the significance of this detail and asked police to find out just how the Elsbeth Street address had crept into their records. This information, if it ever was supplied, cannot be found in the voluminous records in the National Archives, Mrs. Meagher reports.

The Dallas police involvement with Jack Ruby, the slayer of Oswald, is more suspicious. It has been well known from the start that Ruby was intimate with many members of the Dallas force, but Mrs. Meagher builds a startling case. She emphasizes that here was a man known for his brutal passions. He liked to beat up people, including girls who

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 2-26-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State..... Zip No.....

After Oswald had defected, after he had visited the American Embassy in Moscow, after he had denounced his country to American officials there and declared he meant to tell the Russians all he knew about the American radar system—after all this, Oswald was treated with a consideration and even a positive deference that seem incredible. State Department regulations provide that “lookout cards”—red warning flags—must be made out and kept on file in such cases. One Harvard professor whose patriotism has not been questioned, but whose views were considered wayward by the FBI and the State Department, was subjected to a close and constant check when he went abroad—but not Oswald, the self-proclaimed turncoat. Mrs. Meagher demonstrates that at three separate stages of Oswald's foreign Odyssey, “lookout” cards should have been filed against his name. In two of those instances, State Department regulations make the filing of such warning data mandatory. Yet not a single smudge was placed opposite Oswald's Added to all this are the previously admitted facts concerning the FBI's contacts with Oswald in Dallas. Oswald was known to FBI agent James P. Hosty, Jr., whose name, car license plate number and unlisted telephone number, Oswald had jotted down in his notebook—a fact that the FBI initially concealed from the Warren Commission, as Edward Jay Epstein disclosed in Inquest. There was, too, a report that was given considerable credence by Texas officials, who passed it along to the Warren Commission, that Oswald was serving as a paid informer for the FBI. The report apparently originated with reporter Lonnie Hudkins, whose source was the Dallas sheriff, a man who was in a position to know. The Warren Commission circled around this item most gingerly, never questioning Hudkins or his source, and it finally accepted the word of the FBI and CIA that neither agency had ever employed Oswald. This implicit faith in the sanctity of official disclaimer does not dispel doubt. As Mrs. Meagher writes: "The possibility of a clandestine

It is a puzzle which continues to remain unresolved.

An "intellectual" resistance to Miller exists in certain circles. It sometimes reduces itself to a snobbism which seeks to deny him stature because he is not the equal of more or less acknowledged "masters." My position, as far as this goes, is that Miller, Williams or Albee do not have to be "as good as" supposedly or admittedly superior dramatists to be extremely valuable to us here and now. (Long ago I hazarded the opinion that though O'Neill's "mind" or literary skill was not to be compared with, let us say, Sartre's, the American was the far better playwright.) In his book The New Music, Aaron Copland makes a similar point: "... Although we do not have a Stravinsky or a Sibelius in our midst, we may still be developing composers who are destined to contribute something to the world's music. . . ."

ALFRED · A · KNOPE

A flaw more tellingly found in Miller's work is that his plot devices and characters do not measure up to the scope of his intentions: Willy Loman, for instance, cannot represent the American tragedy to which Death of a Salesman aspires. A parallel objection might easily be raised in regard to the New York cop and his brother, the successful "Park Avenue" surgeon, who are the antagonists of The Price. One thing that Miller's critics fail to take into account is that his plays nearly always strike a vital chord in the public conscience. Eminently indigenous in tone and attack, they affect large audiences not only here but abroad. I am not suggesting that popular appeal is the criterion of excellence, though it is a mistake to disregard it altogether. I am chiefly concerned with the reason for Miller's ability to move American and many foreign audiences; to discover the relation of this capacity to his message.

The Price is a compact play; its action is largely retrospective. It begins a little lamely—though direction at the outset may cause this impression—but, after a highly amusing but seemingly irrelevant interlude involving a Jewish secondhand furniture man, the play plunges to its core which entails a conflict in the two brothers' attitudes and patterns of behavior.

The minutiae in the practical argument between these two men are not particularly arresting or memorable. No matter: I was stirred and given food for reflection. I wanted to join the debate both on the issue raised and with Miller himself.

What is at stake are two modes of thought and action: crudely put, the idealistic and the pragmatic, or to put it in another way, the ethical and the efficient. The older brother, Victor (aged 50), has sacrificed the possibility of a lucrative career because he felt obliged to support his father, ruined by the depression, as much defeated in spirit as deprived of material goods. Victor becomes a policeman. His brother Walter abandoned both father and brother to pursue the medical career which has made him a rich man. When after seventeen years the brothers confront each other, the long-standing tension between them reveals itself. Victor is suspicious of Walter, and Walter's effort to assure his brother of his abiding affection soon explodes into resentment against him for refusing to accept either his tenders of fraternal feeling or his offers of monetary assistance, as well as more promising employment.

Walter, endowed with the sharper intelligence, finally blurts out the apparently crippling truth: Victor's years of sacrifice were futile; the father for whom he felt duty bound to give up his opportunities was not an admirable man. Worse still, there never had been any real love in the family. Victor has been a misguided fool and is now a failure. Any sustenance Victor may get from the notion that he is somehow more virtuous than Walter is nothing more than a loser's rationalization.

We are caught up in the struggle because a degree of its force comes from the fact that it is part of something that has seethed in the author's spirit: he is both men. But far more significantly it is part of our American tension. We have all been brought up to respect the religious and national ideals of brother love and devotion to parents, while we are daily shaped to selfishness, to self-aggrandizement, to Success.

Since the audience as well as Miller find themselves in this dilemma, the play strives for and achieves the balance called maturity. Both men appear to be right. Walter's clinching thrust resembles Bernard Shaw's admission that if in his youth his mother's poverty or illness had interfered with his writing he would have let her starve to death rather than discontinue it. (In this connection, it is worth remembering that though Shaw never professed any great love for his mother, he took generous care of her all her life.) Walter therefore is the "victor" in his own and perhaps in our eyes. But neither he nor we can fully accept this.

Each man makes some crucial choice in life and each pays the price of that choice. The bitterest failure lies in an unwillingness to pay. But in interpreting Miller's play it is not sufficient to conclude at this point. We should be able to view Victor as superior to Walter. Victor is unable to refute Walter's accusation of failure. What neither seems to understand is that men do not "do good" only for the other's sake but for their own. They are moved by their convictions, the stuff of their human fiber, self-respect, which demand satisfaction of their inner being. Morally speaking, it should be of secondary importance for the brothers that their father was probably undeserving of filial devotion; it matters a great deal that Victor acted as he did because the man was his father and needed his help. For the one who feels this impulse the action is a moral imperative. It is the best in us which declares it.

This is probably not rational and certainly not logical. Then so much the worse for reason and logic! If one denies the profound validity of Victor's ideals and sentiments, the result is chaos; anything goes, and there is no further use in declaring anything right or wrong.

All this, in the humblest terms of rather commonplace people, is what Miller implies at a time when most of us pretend to think of such convictions as "square." It is his persistence in uttering these sentiments when they have become "dated" that constitutes one of the chief sources of Miller's hold on audiences. For though they fly in the face of practice and the evidence of our daily human traffic, they are deeply rooted in us and only total annihilation will extirpate them.

The fact that many of our fundamental ideals (such as are contained in the Mosaic law or the Sermon on the Mount) are virtually impossible of fulfillment hardly diminishes their value. They are guides, beacons in the dark, disciplines by which we maintain our sanity, our spiritual health.

Victor, being less intelligent and less articulate than Walter, cannot say this in the play. Victor's wife, who quite understandably desires the advantages of Walter's world and is almost on the verge of a break with her husband because of his obstinacy (the fruits of which are obscurity), is the one to be "converted," to recognize and even take loving pride in her husband's character and course. This seems to happen near the final curtain when she tells Victor that he need not take off his uniform and put on a respectable suit as she had bid him to do earlier because she didn't believe he ought to "advertise his salary."

Miller doesn't want to press the point of the wife's change of heart; it might strike us as a "happy ending" or a facile preachment. Without delivering a "verdict," he has stated the issue and depicted its drama in strong bursts of feeling. He has perhaps done the wise thing. Still I regret that the challenge of the play which I have defined was not made a bit more explicit and inescapable. Without a full comprehension of both the issue and the dramatist's judgment, the audience may be left with not much more than a fond recollection of the Jewish furniture man, Gregory Solomon, who exemplifies a healthy accommodation to life without problems—the "average man" in his most pleasant aspects—both a nuance in and a diversion from the central theme. The play ends with his laughter: he has taken no sides, he is free of any moral burden, and we too may be so relieved.

The Price is Miller's most modest play—not as some will insist his "best"—but as such it stands far above many cleverer ones. But, the sophisticated may ask, does the play offer something new? To this let me answer with Chekhov: "I come more and more to the conclusion that it is not a question of new forms and old forms, but that what matters is that a man should write without thinking of forms at all, write because it springs freely from his soul," a maxim which may mislead but it is nonetheless worth treasuring. So is Miller.

Pat Hingle as Victor, the play's most difficult part, the virtuous but by no means dumb goof, is entirely convincing. His is a solidly honest performance. Arthur Kennedy plays Walter, the rather more grateful part, with fiery trenchancy. Kennedy is another of the fine actors our theatre has sacrificed to Hollywood. Kate Reid is altogether sound as Victor's wife—the least realized part in the play—though she tends to force a bit in listening as silent witness to her husband's and brother-in-law's duel. As Gregory Solomon, Harold Gary, with little rehearsal, avoids the "comic relief" aspect of his role: he does a good job.

A visible and important "performance" which may go unnoticed is that of Boris Aronson's setting. It consists of furniture sculpturally disarrayed; it speaks of a sturdy, old-fashioned, shattered and discarded, but somehow still impressive home.

MUSIC/ Benjamin Boretz

Music journalism survives through the continuous propagation of compositional "movements," endlessly contending in mutual exclusion and hostility for some ultimate "supremacy," the achievement of which creates, for a brief Hegelian moment, a new Establishment that is, in its turn, opposed and overthrown. In this, our journalists are the victims of their own dedication to hyperbole and generality; for they are left unable to describe a musical work except as a type, a pawn in an ideological conflict whose "outcome" is the only evident substantive issue. And since works are so regarded, they are described only in terms of their most immediate "typical" characteristics, whose significance apparently lies only in their contrast with some other, contending "school." Perhaps this tendency results also from the considerably greater ease of describing a composition in terms of what it is not than in terms of its unique realization of particular musical ideas.

But those aware of musical development at the level of the musical work itself are unable to understand the meaning or the possible implications in such a "political" view of their field. It seems, in particular, a confusion of the significance of a composition within the musical literature with its relation to the personal career of its composer. For it is otherwise impossible to imagine what it would mean for a work, as a work, to "oppose" some other work, to "replace" some previously composed music, to "rebel" against something in another body of music, or to "deny" the validity of some previously formulated concept of musical coherence. Of course, composers may—verbally—do those things, but all a composition can do is assert some musical data which taken together produce some particular relations of "events" and, ultimately a particular musical entity. That the existence of some work in the literature invalidates some previous work in the literature is absurd on the face of it; indeed, it is hard to see what effect a new composition could have at all on something already composed. And why the idea that the function, historically, of a new composition is to extend, diversify and enrich the scope of the existing musical literature—which then "changes" only in its deepening of perspective and experience—why this idea seems less obvious or less attractive to the journalists than their perennially one-dimensional world of gladiatorial triumphs and humiliations is incomprehensible indeed.

The problems thus posed for the non-musician seriously interested in becoming musically informed and enlightened are particularly vicious, since the nature of the information conveyed to him by his local newspaper and national magazine—usually his only sources of musical awareness—not only tends to omit all the important aspects of the matter but actually tends to construct contexts for musical perception that are in effect permanent barriers to the infiltration of significant concepts.

To begin with, an immediate consequence of the journalist's inability to distinguish beyond the dichotomies of typicality and novelty is his bifurcation of almost all serious composition (which rarely manifests its uniqueness blatantly) into either supine "imitation" of one of his repertory of going "schools" (which come in every shade of garde) or mere incomprehensibility. In this context, originality emerges as a pure matter of presentation: a "new sound," an unprecedented mixture of media, an outrageous juxtaposition of musical contexts, familiar and/or unfamiliar, a program-note style, an unusual disposition of performers vis-à-vis one another or the audience,

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

PROGRESSIVE LABOR

No Negotiations
U.S. GET OUT OF VIETNAM NOW!

*Oppose Debrayist
"Resistance"*
FROM PERSONAL TO SOCIAL REBELLION

Building Among Workers
NOTES ON BASE-BUILDING

Mehmet Shehu Writes
PEOPLE'S WAR IN ALBANIA

Caseworkers' Write
NYC WELFARE WORKERS UNION

Harvard Students Report
FREE SPEECH AND THE WAR

PL, national organ of the Progressive Labor Party, offers Marxist-Leninist analysis from the factories, campuses, from rebellious ghettos and the impoverished farms. Future issues include:
US Labor Movement—Where is it Going?... Refuting Imperialist History... The Beginning of the Korean War... Notes on Base-Building... PLP National Convention and more.

PROGRESSIVE LABOR Dept. N
G.P.O. Box 808, Brooklyn N.Y. 11201

I am interested in receiving...copies of PL at 50¢:

... sub(s) to PL at $2.50 yearly

... PLP East newspaper Challenge at $2 yrly

... PLP West newspaper Spark at $2 yearly

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State..... Zip.....

or some announced far-out means by which otherwise nondistinctive musical events have been selected by either composer or performers. Fundamentally, this situation seems to arise because our journalists have not been trained in the musical language and concepts of their time (if indeed in any), so that their actual discriminative abilities may largely depend on such extra-contextual clues. But in any case, the curious result is that music that has some verbally describable distinctiveness, or a "characteristic" idea of presentation that can be immediately perceived on a single hearing even without benefit of a score, becomes the immediate compositional foreground of the journalist's world, even where the musical differences observable among such pieces are negligible. And—by the same token—the image projected of the relative significance and influence of contemporary composers is often ludicrously at variance with the facts universally accepted in the profession.

It is precisely here, too, that the unsuspecting reader is most seriously victimized, most inexorably deprived of any hope of developing a reasonable awareness of his own. For the journalist's judgments and opinions, however in conflict with professional consensus, are customarily presented as facts in themselves; and since the criteria for their formulation—or even the notion that there are, can, or ought to be criteria—are never presented, the reader-listener can never grow beyond simple dependence on his expert's next set of opinions. Moreover, the journalists seem not to regard it as in any way part of their responsibility to offer their views in the perspective of professional opinions, or indeed to provide any informational link between their readers and the music profession. Whether or not they would, in their present state of musical education, be able to provide such a link is a moot point; but the simple solicitation of guidance from the large pool of proximate professionals (particularly in the New York region) would at least obviate the factual gaffes that have become the most noteworthy characteristics, for musicians, of journalistic music criticism.

But an intense belief in the virtues of amateurism has always characterized, in particular, the music policies of The New York Times (the Tribune, on the other hand, from the days of Gilman, Thomson and Berger, to those of Rich and Salzman, was exceptional in its tradition of professionalism). The recent results, in simple categorical errors of musical description appearing regularly in the Times, have been almost beyond belief. As a particular example, the applications of the words "total organization" and "serialism" (especially "post-Webern serialism") have consistently lacked any connection with whatever minimal reality musicians can ascribe to such general categories. Thus we have been told that Elliott Carter's recent piano concerto was a typically twelve-tone work in the Schoenberg line (it is actually "serial" in a special sense, but not in the least "twelve-tone"), that Peter Westergaard's Mr. and Mrs. Discobollos was typical post-Webern serialism (even though its surface most resembles diatonic Stravinsky), that both Richard Rodney Bennett's new Symphony No. 2 (commissioned and played by the Philharmonic) and his opera The Mines of Sulphur were equally typical of the same "school" (even though the Symphony was most notable for its movie-music "Amerikanisch" surface, with big "twelve-tone tunes" much more characteristic of, say, Rieger than of Webern, while the opera was obviously Berg via Britten, with the Wozzeck and Turn of the Screw associations almost embarrassing). Further, Harold Schonberg declared in a recent Sunday column that "Nobody really cares much for totally organized serial music," which must stand more as Mr. Schonberg's definition of somebodiness than as a cognitive statement about the world, since it defines as "nobody" some musicians (e.g., Stravinsky, Krenek, Milhaud, Copland) not otherwise so identified.

Even more curious is the use here of the phrase "total organization" as though it were something special in recent music; for music has always been "totally organized" in that every pitch, dynamic, timbre and contour had a meaningful function; recent music has simply multiplied the independence and dimensionality of such function. In Mr. Schonberg's terms, one would have to assume that dynamics and instrumentation in, say, Mozart are disorganized or chaotic, or that coherence and rationality are musical evils. And finally, one read in a review by one of Schonberg's colleagues that a "post-Webern serial" work (Henry Weinberg's Second String Quartet, as post-Schoenbergian and Carterian as music could be) was composed in a way that was frequent "half a dozen years ago." Here, the pure misrepresentation of musical fact (made evident by the most cursory glance at contemporary compositional output) pales before the extraordinary implication of the antiquity of "style" involved: imagine Beethoven being criticized for writing the Ninth Symphony in the old tonal system that not only he had used six years earlier, in the Seventh, but that was essentially the same as that used by Bach as much as a hundred years earlier!

Yet it would have been almost trivially simple for these writers to have learned from the professional literature that the concept of "serialism" in no way predisposes music to any particular surface characteristic that can be perceived on first, or any casual, hearing; and that in its fundamental sense it is as meaningfully applied to Stravinsky's Petrushka as to his Requiem, to Scriabin and even Debussy as to Babbitt. But again, the professional literature offers no insights to these critics; characteristically, they read it ad hominem, as manifestations of attitude rather than as sources of cognitive insight and information. And the actual views of composers themselves are similarly represented only as trivial, contentious (and equivalently "valid") oppositions; Babbitt is never mentioned or quoted without being balanced by Cage, as the two sides of a slightly ridiculous conflict, and there is no concept of what either of them represents in himself except as the contrafactum of the other.

Under these conditions, it was perhaps inescapable that the journalists, having created a musical world-image to suit themselves, would begin to place themselves in it as protagonists, to take it upon themselves to legislate its future under the guise of reporting its development. The subtlest turn has come about

SANDY DENNIS · KEIR DULLEA · ANNE HEYWOOD
AS ELLEN MARSH

Between Ellen and Jill came Paul...

IN D. H. LAWRENCE'S
THE FOX
—symbol of the male—

Screenplay by LEWIS JOHN CARLSON and HOWARD REICH · Produced by RAYMOND STROSS · Directed by MARK RYDELL
Color by Deluxe · From CLARIDGE PICTURES

VICTORIA / THE festival A WALTER READE THEATRE
B'WAY @ 46th ST. · JU 6-0540 157th St. at 5th Ave. · LT 1-2323 in connection with some of the examples quoted above: first, the removal of cognitive content from "serialism" establishes it as an epithet; then, in an extraordinary metamorphosis of critical function, its demise as a compositional resource is predicted (particularly extraordinary for a predictor who never knew what it was in the first place); then, it is applied indiscriminately as a pejorative to anything disapproved of; and finally, its end is proclaimed in a burst of counterfactual triumph ("the way a lot of music was composed half a dozen years ago." . . . "Nobody really cares much for [it]").

But by far the most remarkable manifestation of this attempt at musical thought control, even from a purely journalistic point of view, has been the record of the Times's music department with regard to the coverage of new-music performance events in New York. For since the death of the Tribune (which was notably conscientious in this regard), musical events in New York have been defined, publicly, by what is reported in the Times. And in the absence of the possibly embarrassing corrective of the Tribune, the attrition has been astonishing. During a recent week, for example, while several minor recitals and the revival of an insignificant Verdi opera were covered, the third New York performance ever—and perhaps the best—of Elliott Carter's Double Concerto, a work not only of major significance but of unparalleled international réclame among recent American music (given at Juilliard by the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble), was unmentioned. And during the current season, there have been no notices of such major new-music series as the Columbia Group for Contemporary Music, the Composers' Showcase, or the venerable Composers' Forum. The events omitted seem so clearly to contain works that would be labeled "serial" by the Times staff that it seems almost as though what was predicted by Mr. Schonberg—non-interest in serialism—is being made to appear to come true in the form of the disappearance of news of such activity from the paper.

Whatever the Times's purpose, its principal victims are its misinformed and uninformed readers; compositional activity, unlike conventional concert activity, has never derived either benefit or damage from newspaper publicity. And the few informational functions still served by the Times are being replaced by several independent publications sponsored by the musical community itself, notably the Newsletter of the American Society of University Composers and the Contemporary Music Newsletter being published by three metropolitan university music departments (Columbia, N.Y.U., Princeton). What remains to be provided is the awareness of what constitutes true musical news; new compositions and new performances embodying unique and original imaginative ideas. Any further concerns over the camps in which they arise I leave to my speculative-philosophical newspaper colleagues; my next column will be devoted strictly to news.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Raucous, rude, hortatory, repetitious and largely formless, Peter Brook's Tell Me Lies resembles a benefit night, with performers of various celebrity doing their thing for the cause. The garish colors, mod styles and assertive camera angles ally the work to the current poster culture; the picture swings to a rock beat with memories of Brecht-Eisler. It is very up to date and very angry; the subject is Vietnam.

The basic cast of this experiment in indignation is a group of young (for the most part) members of the Royal Shakespeare Company (Mr. Brook has adapted it from his Royal Shakespeare production, US), but through it move a number of people, unidentified but appearing in their own person. Thus, the doctor who passes around an anti-personnel missile at a kitchen coffee gathering is indeed recently back from North Vietnam; that is Stokely Carmichael talking with sardonic bitterness above the hubbub of a frugging party, and the Establishment types sitting on a sofa and "weighing" the "alternatives" are in fact Establishmentarians—Ivor Richard, Tom Driberg, Kingsley Amis.

The talisman of the film is a news photograph of a burned child; its method is to mix vaudeville turns with news clips of demonstrations, tormented musings of cast members and extended conversations in search of "understanding." The effect is honest, high-minded (a little self-consciously high-minded), irrelevant and in the end irritating.

It is irritating because to American viewers the sense of guilt so eloquently expressed is entirely peripheral (guilt, like sorrow, can be "shared" only by equals). It is true that Mr. Wilson's government has "gone along," but that makes these young Britishers no more than passive accomplices of a passive accomplice. The crime of Vietnam is not committed in their name, they are not asked to do the killing or to pay the bill. There is a transposed quality about their agony of conscience: it becomes a luxury of profound concern. They have no draft cards to burn, they do not face the alternative of complicity in abomination or exile. It is unfair, of course (and the levels of villainy are scarcely comparable), but it is difficult not to wish that their dreams were haunted by Rhodesia.

If, by feeling responsible at some remove, the creators of Tell Me Lies had been able to generate some new strategy for understanding and resisting the Vietnamese War, their collaboration would have been welcome. But, quite understandably, they have nothing of the sort to offer; and their style of anger, driven to obscenity and scatology by the insultingly transparent hypocrisy of the Johnson Administration, seems as though copied from the outbursts on this side of the Atlantic.

Tell Me Lies is perhaps sent to support our resistance, but it does not have

A DISTINGUISHED STAR!
A BRILLIANT FAUSTUS!

COLUMBIA PICTURES PRESENTS THE BURTONS PRODUCTION

DOCTOR FAUSTUS

RICHARD BURTON
THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY DRAMATIC SOCIETY

ELIZABETH TAYLOR

(Music Composed and Conducted by MARIO NASCIBENE Adapted for the Screen by NEVILL COGHILL Screenplay by RICHARD BURTON and RICHARD McWHORTER Directed by RICHARD BURTON and NEVILL COGHILL Technicolor)

AMERICAN PREMIERE NOW

THE Baronet
A WALTER READE THEATRE
59th St. at 3rd Ave. • EL 5-1563-4

that effect. The absolute powerlessness of the opinion it represents in England to shorten the war by one hour (what long-time effect it may have on the name of the United States is another matter) merely emphasizes the sense of virtual powerlessness that weighs down the anti-war movement here at home. These performers look just like our resistant youth, they talk just like them, and clearly they make no difference at all to life and death in Southeast Asia. But here at home, a difference has somehow to be made, and the cause is not helped by the arrival of volunteers to the ranks of outraged impotence.

Say what you will against communism, it seems to be fertile soil for the cultivation of irony. Here in the West we do what is presumably our best with things like How I Won the War and The Graduate, but conditions are so permissive and resources so affluent that, in effect, we are boxing with pillows on our fists. Behind that curtain, they are in much tougher fighting trim, jabbing at the weak spots in the total society with such deft strategies as Daisies or the current Love Affair, by the young Yugoslav director Dusan Makavejev. It is nervy work and I am not at all clear how they get away with it—perhaps by being too small and quick and witty for the monolith to get a square shot at them. Communist administrators are no more eager than their Western counterparts to make themselves publicly ridiculous.

That agility also makes a problem for anyone reviewing Love Affair. The scenario of this lighthearted shocker, subtitled "The Case of the Missing Switchboard Operator," flows like mercury, but its structure is nevertheless complex, and the danger is that the spirit of the piece will be killed in the process of spelling it out.

We may start with a few premises, noting, however, that the generalizations apply by no means exclusively to Communist societies: (1) officialdom tends to be puritanical; (2) citizens of Peoples' Republics are subjected to a good deal of edifying instruction; (3) a sense of humor is a trait not conspicuous among bureaucrats. And overriding these is the supposition that, however stubbornly the theoreticians may cling to the doctrine that virtue resides in the state, the people (being people) know that the joys and sorrows of their own lives are what count.

Mr. Makavejev posits a love affair—between the aforementioned phone operator and a shy bachelor, a Stakhanovite among rat catchers. The girl is Hungarian—a statement which appears to produce in Yugoslavia an effect similar to what you might get by mentioning Copenhagen in the bar of the Yale Club. She is sexy, and says so with a frank smile. Thus her relationship prospers with the master rather, and is the more endearingly private for being interrupted from time to time by fragments of a popular lecture on the reproductive process, delivered by a zealous professor who discourses on copulation, plain and fancy, to the accompaniment of a weirdly pornographic slide collection and in a style of unemphatic enthusiasm that would be more normal, if not more suitable, for at talk on oral hygiene or the mothproofing of rugs.

Alas, the idyl is to end in homicide, so a second instructive intrusion on the main script is a guided tour of the metropolitan crime lab, including views of intimidating weapons and objects in bottles. And as the affair reaches its climax there appear, more and more insistently, the most disconcerting flash-forwards. The contrast here is between the pathos of violence and the complacency of its detection. Finally, the girl's body, laid out on a stone drain board, with the instruments of her dissection neatly marshaled on her belly, becomes a counterpoint to that same warm and silken nakedness flung wantonly before the love-trapped exterminator. Mr. Makavejev is playing rigorous semantic tricks with words like "flesh" and "body"; Love Story is not a film that solicits hedonistic reverie.

But I think the purpose of the shock is to make certain that the audience stays thoroughly awake; the main thrust of the picture lies elsewhere. For example, the couple exchange their first embraces in full view of a television screen from which massed thousands brandish their banners and raise the thunder of their voices. They get, you might say, something worth cheering about. And for example the official photograph of the dedicated rat catcher, surrounded by the trophies of his skill and receiving the thanks of the sanitary top brass, gives an impression distinctly more two-dimensional than does the tender, solicitous, but (to a Hungarian girl) gratifyingly demanding lover we have come to know in his nonprofessional hours. And the tragedy of the film conjugates no moral relevant to the ethics of revolutionary selflessness. It is not a case of Socialist fidelity to honor and duty traduced by bourgeois (and foreign) revisionism; it is once more that damned pinch of human perversity whereby the most possessive men seem fated to give their hearts to the most indiscriminately generous girls. These lovers make a dreadful mess of their happiness, but the point is that the mess and the happiness are of their own making—and no thanks to the state, for all its benevolent didacticism and fatherly supervision. This impish, rather wicked comedy is one more assertion through art of the supremacy of the individual over the machinery of the state. The degree to which it is true is the measure of our freedom.

In addition to his narrative instincts, the director of Love Story is blessed with an elegant sense of cinema. His people uncover themselves with the defenseless simplicity (produced by most sophisticated guile) of home movies; his scenes have the sensuous charm of utterly mundane objects perfectly absorbed by their surroundings and their uses. Makavejev makes the installation of a bathroom shower an adventure in aesthetics, the workmanship is so deft, the use of space so gratifying. It is not a photographic style that calls much attention to itself, but in retrospect one appreciates the reliable toughness of its texture.

The girl is Eva Ras; the man, Slobodan Aligrudic.

PUBLICATIONS

Highly praised by James Anderson in the International Journal of Religious Education, W. F. Luder's latest book is

A NEW APPROACH TO SEX

It exposes the fallacy of the so-called "New Morality," and offers a positive alternative. $1.85 cloth; $.85 paper. Farnsworth Books, 112 Wetherbee Rd., Waltham, Mass. 02154

WILLIAM WINTER COMMENTS: Liberal weekly newsletter analyzing and commenting upon the international scene. Editor is William Winter, dean of West Coast analysts. $6.00 year; $1.00 ten issues. Box 817N, Sausalito, Calif. 94965

DEBATE THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE—pros and cons on the deployment of the ABM; 11 articles prepared by military and political experts. Pp. 169. Paper, $1.50; Hardbound, $5. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 5201 Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois 60615

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1-$4. Send for free catalog. Fybate Lecture Notes, Dept. N, 2440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS!

ALL change of address notices, orders for subscriptions and other correspondence, should be sent to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue,
New York, N.Y. 10011

Crossword Puzzle No. 1238

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Is the first aim a plea for the man of the house? (13)
- 10 General privilege given? (5)
- 11 Rare, rather rare. (9)
- 12 Exaggerates how certain utilities might argue with certain commissions. (9)
- 13 He's serious about starting to reveal the state of Germany. (5)
- 14 Even a simpleton with debts can be frugal. (12)
- 19 Shoots in scattered fashion on part of the golf course. (Probably not part of the regular course!) (5, 7)
- 22 Standards correlative to writing. (5)
- 24 Describing those who might not hear of the unusual feats done. (5-4)
- 25 Shakespeare or Petrarch? (9)
- 26 See 21 down.
- 27 The state of Europe without common defense? Not good form to describe it! (13)

DOWN:

- 2 Reduces what some players come to in rising waters. (6)
- 3 Have guests in harbor? (9)
- 4 A word of warning before a little drink? Promise? (9)
- 5 What the bird on Hallie's grave does.
- 6 The old doctor one clings to. (5)

- 7 Everybody has to have more than one, and can store the answer in it. (8)
- 8 Shining silver down here? (5)
- 9 Pass a short time with a certain amount of comfort. (7)
- 15 What sailors had to do running around the room? (9)
- 16 On wearing this, one is obviously European. (9)
- 17 This tag is on wrong, naming a kind of muscle. (7)
- 18 Digging in for hard times? Do this. (8)
- 20 Cuts off straggly beards. (6)
- 21 and 26 The descriptive writer might be, and sees it with a flash! (10)
- 23 They might be folded each night. (5)
- 24 For a while, at least, it should be charming. (5).

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1237

ACROSS: 1 Milk wagons; 6 Lane; 10 Newport; 11 Wheedle; 12 Iris; 13 Vehemently; 15 Guesses; 16 Embargo; 17 Honored; 20 Marimba; 22 Spinnerets; 23 Bred; 25 Rotund; 26 Rhenish; 27 Eden; 28 Usurpation. DOWN: 2 Low tide; 3 and 1 down Who's minding the store; 4 Gathers; 5 Nowhere; 7 Auditor; 8 Every now and then; 9 Remembers; 14 Astronaut; 18 Noisome; 19 Derides; 20 Maturer; 21 Martini; 24 Lena.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

PERSONALS

Searching?

It's not enough to just "know thyself." COM/PAIR, the "people-matching-people" of Princeton speed your research. It's a way to meet a truly interesting match. National, international clients. $10.00 fee payable when you return questionnaire. Request free questionnaire from COM/PAIR Systems. NR9, 194 Nassau, Princeton, N.J.

COM/PAIR SYSTEMS, Inc., Dept. N
194 Nassau St., Princeton, N.J. 08540

© Copyright 1966 COM/PAIR Systems Inc.

"McCarthy in '68", "Reagan & Lassie in '68", "Dump Johnson in '68", "LBJ for Ex-President", "RFK in '68", "The Governor of Alabama is a Mother", "Draft Beer, Not Students", "Kill for Peace", "Stop the War", "Ban Napalm", "Give LBJ the Bird", "Make Love Not War", "Studying Causes Cancer", "Legalize Pot", "Incest Begins at Home", "Chaste Makes Waste", "Hands Off Tim Leary", "Make War on Poverty, Not People", "Sex Before Finals", "Apple Pie Makes you Sterile", "Melt General Hershey", "King-Size bumperstrips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-N, Chicago, Ill. 60690

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE
Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mallorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 28 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

WE HAVE BEEN BETRAYED—Our '64 vote was for Peace—Impeach Johnson, recall war supporters; also HOFFA FOR PRESIDENT and WASH OUT WASHINGTON on 6" ruler and 1-1/4" wood discs. 12/$1, 100/$5 (circulars, balloons, bumper strips, telephone dialers, etc.). Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151

"LBJ DARTBOARD GAME." A giant 14" solid cobra construction dartboard with LBJ's face as the target (or Reagan, Bobby Kennedy, Sigmund Freud, Nixon, Nasser, Wallace and DeGaulle) is yours for only $3.95 postpaid. Three precision brass darts imported from England are included for your bull's eye accuracy. Send check or money order to: TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-V, Chicago, Illinois 60690

INTENTIONAL COMMUNITY based on co-operation and experimentation. Write: Twin Oaks, Rt. 4-N, Louisa, Va. 23093

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

The good fight as it's waged in The NATION: last week, this week, next week.

Last week in The NATION:

"Some Americans would bring their evening cocktails to the roof and sip drinks and munch on cheese and crackers and Gibson onions as they pointed out particularly sensational aspects of the fire fights. . . . A Norwegian correspondent wondered aloud how many women and children were burning up in the hell's inferno these bombs ignite."

—Thomas W. Pew, Jr. "Saigon from a Rooftop"

This week in The NATION:

"The ADA's fading 'empire' is that old coalition of New Deal Alumni, and independent liberals and labor leaders who were both frightened into defensive action by the Red Scare of the late 1940s and early 1950s and at the same time unwilling to desert the cause of liberalism for total safety. They took every pain to avoid being called radicals, and nobody but demagogues like Lyndon Johnson and James Eastland were so silly as to see them as such."

—Robert G. Sherrill

Next week in The NATION:

"According to the President, peace in Vietnam entirely depends not on the most powerful society of the world but on one of the smaller, weaker ones. . . . We may well find that we shall continue to drift: instead of a firm chorus of intellectual dissent there will be only isolated and conflicting squeaks which will cancel one another out. But in that case we must not be surprised if what is increasingly called anomic action, based simply on wholesale rejection of the present, continues to suppurate among the young, the poor, the underprivileged. What characterizes this action is lack of ideas."

—J. P. Nettl

Join us for the year ahead:

- ☐ I'll sign up for the year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me, free, one of the following books (check one):
- ☐ LBJ LAMPOONED, ed. Jules Feiffer
- ☐ AIR WAR: VIETNAM, by Frank Harvey
- ☐ HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM, by J. K. Galbraith
- ☐ I'll try you for a half year (24 issues). I enclose $6.

NAME

STREET

CITYSTATEZIP

Send to:

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

N 2-26

The good fight is not a confrontation of Lucifer and angelic hosts. It's not to be fought or won at a stroke. (Or by divine or diabolic design.)

Part of it is a group of American conquerors sipping cocktails on the roof of the Eden Roc while they watch the bombing of the suburbs of Saigon. (As the Argives, long ago, watched Troy burn, not knowing what awaited them at home.)

Part of it is the good men and true of Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) trying to sweeten the bitter pill of their endorsement of Eugene McCarthy for President so that Vice President Humphrey would not resign. (Humphrey later pointed out, through his secretary, that he'd already resigned from this traditional liberal group three years before.)

Part of it is also thinking men who know that it matters how the ball bounces, when that ball is this, our world. (And who know their thought must lead to more than protest.)

These concerns—the aggressive war fought by our country, the decay of liberal thought in our country, the death grip of failing ideas on our country's future—are illumined in the kind of reporting you'll find in The NATION—last week, this week, next week.

This, we submit, is the battle of our time.

The good fight is now in

THE NATION

—why not join now?

FORMOSA MARILYN YOUNG

THE NATION

MARCH 4, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
MAR 4 1968
LIBRARY

Are Intellectuals Obsolete?

J. P. NETTL

LBJ's Riot Commission

THE FACT-FINDING CHARADE

SHERWOOD ROSS

5-21-68R PL5-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010
NEGOTIATION BOARD

Little Watchdog the Dollar Warriors

SANFORD WATZMAN

ANTHONY BURGESS on Giacomo Joyce

DANIEL STERN on Anaïs Nin

EDITH ANDERSON on Bertolt Brecht

NEWSPAPER NEWS

LETTERS

Tokyo demonstrations

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Perhaps Albert Axelbank ["The Marchers of Tokyo," The Nation, Jan. 8] has been a bit too close to those 300 political demos he's observed in Japan. The Japanese political demonstration is well organized, like most things in Japan: the numbers are impressive, the noise is unified and the signs are as big as 10 feet wide. . . . But those demonstrations are considerably less effective than he makes them out to be. I wonder why liberals such as he . . . support the misconception, prevalent in America since the demonstrations in 1960 against Eisenhower, that the vocal Left is politically effective in Japan.

Let's start with 1960: Mr. Axelbank says that those demonstrations "did bring down a government." Rather they were a factor in an internal shift within the Conservative party which has been in power since the occupation. That has been the most the demonstrations have done The noisier demonstrations are mostly those of the students, and are recognized by most observers in Japan as little more than the transitory cries of university students before they join the conservative establishment. . . . The student demonstrators are indulged in Japan; they do not even get the reaction the American ones get. The fact is that in the face of these demonstrations the Conservative party has retained power and has given more and more support to the U.S.'s Asian policy

Demonstrations against America will continue in Japan, but nuclear submarines will continue to call there

Emanuel Schreiber

P.S. From December, 1965 until March, 1967, I served as a clinical psychology officer in a U.S. Army hospital outside of Tokyo. From April to September, 1967, I did psychological research with educated young adults in Tokyo. During that time I was involved in the organization and activities of Vietnam Summer-Japan, a protest group composed of foreigners.

Japan

Joplin, Mo.

DEAR SIR: I have read and reread W. Macmahon Ball's "Japan in Asia's Future" [The Nation, Jan. 15]. It is written out of thinking and not by dictation by our men in Washington.

W. A. Seiler

responsibility in science

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: The reference in your timely editorial "Scientists as Citizens" to the Society for Social Responsibility in Science [The Nation, Jan. 22] was gratifying—but not entirely correct in its implications. The SSRS has never, as an organization, spoken for any action, political or otherwise, beyond calling on individual scientists and engineers "to recognize a personal responsibility for the anticipated consequences to society of their work and to exercise their profession always for the benefit of humanity."

Esther Milner

correction

We regret that a line was inadvertently dropped from Michael B. Folsom's review, "Some Versions of the Proletariat" (Feb. 12). The sentence should have read: "He [Swados] ranges a decade and more out of his way to take one last swipe at the 'hacks and has-beens' of the Hollywood Left. . . ."

Editors

EDITORIALS

Violence

We derive much of our popular entertainment from it. Our pre-eminence in the world is based on it. We have so much of it that we can afford to export it and still make our streets and homes unsafe. And the peak market in violence is still ahead. By all indications, next summer will see "crime in the streets"—the Negro insurrection—put down with more brutality than in previous years.

Of course we have no monopoly on violence in its strictly military form; in this respect we could not compete with Imperial and Fascist Germany, for instance, in the 1866-1945 period, which began with the attack on Austria and ended with the execution of some of the more prominent Nazi war criminals. Nor could we compete in genocide, although in Southeast Asia we are beginning to acquire some modest proficiency in that art. Yet in our own way we are exponents of violence as the answer to a multitude of social problems.

How did we become so? There can be no simple answer, but an interesting suggestion is made in a review by Thomas Lask in the February 20 New York Times of Wesley Craven's The Colonies in Transition 1660-1713 (Harper & Row). Professor Craven notes that every colonist was armed. He did not depend on a royal garrison for protection, but on his own musket and that of his neighbor. This may account, Lask suggests, "for the violent strain that runs through our society today"; it must be added that our immigrant population did nothing to dilute the propensity.

Whatever the origins, violence has now become our paramount national problem. It is both the easy way out and no way out at all. Very little is being done to prevent next summer's riots; the main emphasis is on putting them down with overwhelming force. (See "The Fact-Finding Charade" by Sherwood Ross, p.306.) At the same time, the politics of violence is to be exploited to the utmost. With unconvincing sorrow, the President predicts violence for many a summer, the next one being the most crucial for him. Properly nurtured and applied, violence can generate votes. Mr. Johnson can portray himself before the election as a peace-loving man who did his best to forestall violence, but with a heavy heart and heavy hand put it down without quarter when it came.

The international complications of our reliance on violence are approaching an asymptotic curve. In our issue of February 26 we referred editorially to our exports of the most modern and lethal weapons to Latin America. One result, in Guatemala, has been acute embarrassment—or worse—to a respected Catholic religious order, the Maryknoll Fathers, who are said to support more than 1,000 missionary priests and brothers in Central and South America from their headquarters in Ossining, N.Y. The role of the Church in the current Guatemalan civil war came to light when two U.S. military and naval attachés were murdered in January in broad daylight in an embassy car on a Guatemala City street. (See "Why They Shoot Americans" by Norman Diamond, The Nation, February 5.) It then developed that this was only the latest of a series of retaliatory assassinations, with the Left seeing the American military as allies of the Right, which is certainly not far from the truth. Ever since the overthrow in 1954 of President Arbenz, who was regarded by the CIA as a Communist sympathizer, Guatemala has been an incipient Vietnam south of the Mexican border. It was asserted at the time that Arbenz had been ousted by a right-wing CIA-Catholic coalition; that is what the Maryknoll Fathers have now inherited.

According to the National Catholic Reporter (January 31 and other issues), two Maryknoll priests, the Rev. Thomas R. Melville and the Rev. Arthur Melville, brothers, and Sister Marian Peter, all in their 30s, were sent to Guatemala as missionaries; they then held nothing resembling revolutionary views. They found there a population three-fourths of which showed nutritional deficiencies, an illiteracy rate of 41 per cent in urban areas and 82 per cent in rural areas (96 per cent among Indian women); they found 2 per cent of Guatemalans at the top of the social pyramid living in luxury, and most of the others in squalor. And they found the natural concomitant—violence. As another Maryknoll priest, the Rev. Blase Bonpane put it, "Violence is institutionalized in Guatemala. We don't talk about whether there will be violence; there is violence. The life is violent. . . . The way the government relates to the people, and the way the army relates to the people, is violent." He added that the United States supports the ruling oligarchy because we do business with the 2 per cent elite, and because we are taken in "by the cry of anti-communism."

The testimony of Father Bonpane is important because he remains a Maryknoll priest in good standing. The two Melvilles and Sister Marian sided openly with the guerrillas. They were ordered back to the United States, came as far as Florida, then returned to Mexico and apparently to their Guatemalan guerrilla associations. To make matters more complicated, Father Thomas Melville reported his marriage to Sister Marian, whereby they are both automatically excommunicated.

As for Father Bonpane, he was sent to Hawaii by the Maryknoll headquarters and obeyed his orders. What he said en route can scarcely have been comforting to the heads of the order, however. "I see a pre-Vietnam [in Guatemala]. I see napalm. I see Green Berets, and I'll continue to scream about it. I am opposed to it. I am not infallible, but I will not sit by." He thinks the United States should "clear out" of Guatemala. "Then we'd see what a real people's revolution is. We have intervened too many places, too many times."

Which animated the dissident clergy more—social injustice or violence—must remain an open question for the moment. The rightist forces are organized in groups like La Mano Blanca, which are accused of killing at least 3,000 peasants suspected of collaborating with Communist-leaning guerrillas, such as the Fuerzas Armadas Rebeldes (FAR). This is reported by James Nelson Goodsell, the Latin American correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor (February 8). In the mid-January wave of terrorism, more than fifty persons, including the U.S. military attachés, were killed. The FAR

IN THIS ISSUE

March 4, 1968

EDITORIALS

290

ARTICLES

294 Formosa: "Solidarity of Gloom"

Marilyn Blatt Young

297 Little Watchdog of the Dollar Warriors

Sanford Watzman

300 Are Intellectuals Obsolete?

J. P. Nettl

306 LBJ's Riot Commission:
The Fact-Finding Charade

Sherwood Ross

BOOKS & THE ARTS

309 Portrait of the Artist
in Middle Age

Anthony Burgess

309 Keeping the Light Out
(poem)

Douglas Lawder

310 The Restoration of Brecht

Edith Anderson

311 Princess of the Underground

Daniel Stern

313 The Shriek & the Sheik

Jack Leavitt

314 Nation Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

315 Art

Max Kozloff

316 As I Read My Good
Friend's Book (poem)

Lewis Turco

317 Theatre

Harold Clurman

318 Films

Robert Hatch

319 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 10

partisans say the violence was sparked by the brutal murder by right-wing terrorists of Rogelia Cruz Martinez, a former Guatemalan beauty queen who had long sympathized with Communist guerrilla groups.

Where it will all end, God knows. But one thing is certain: the Guatemalan violence which the United States initiated in 1954 has failed of its purpose—as violence has a way of doing. It has not put down social uprisings in the streets of Guatemala City, and will not put them down in the streets of Saigon, Santo Domingo, Newark or Detroit. Until we learn that lesson (and there is no sign that we are doing so), worse is to come, both at home and abroad.

International Bugging

Four weeks after the North Koreans seized the Pueblo, their reasons for doing so remain obscure. She was doing only what literally thousands of land stations, surface ships, submarines, aircraft, spacecraft (mostly Soviet and American but including also Canadian and other nationalities) do every minute of the 8,760 hours in the year, and almost always with impunity. Actually, on a petty scale, any civilian with a $25 short-wave receiver can participate.

On a grand scale, the superpowers are spending billions of dollars annually for equipment and personnel to record every variety of visual/audio communication, whether in the air or in the vacuum of space, or in the form of water-borne sound. There are thought to be some thirty U.S. intelligence-gathering ships like the Pueblo; others, such as aircraft carriers and their escorting warships, conduct electronic and sonar surveillance as a sideline, though at times as a primary mission. The Russians match this effort with one as massive, but they employ mainly fishing trawlers, some of which actually catch and process fish. By common consent, neither side engages in "jamming" or transmission interference; they just listen and record. And secrecy has been virtually discarded, with no more nonsensical stories about a U-2 having strayed halfway across the Soviet Union on a weather mission, or an RB47 jet having got lost in the Barents Sea, with navigational equipment on board which could have fixed its position probably within less than a nautical mile.

Let no one imagine that this expensive bugging has reached the limits of its capability. Thousands of electronics experts in the government, private industry and think-tanks are pushing the state of the art outward and upward. Laser types of radar are coming along fast, together with other esoteric devices that it is inadvisable to speculate about, lest an astute guess should provoke a visit from the FBI. Only two things are certain—the expense will keep on going up and the experts will not agree on what it all portends.

In the Pueblo case it should be noted that the North Korean "pirates" were comparatively gentle with ship and crew. The much larger Liberty, operated by the Navy for NSA, was shot up by the friendly Israelis with the loss of thirty-four U.S. seamen and another seventy-five wounded. Apparently neither the Pueblo nor the boarding party did any shooting, and the dead crew member may have been killed in an effort to demolish some of the ship's electronic equipment—which was probably no different from what the Russians (and the Japanese) can produce in substantially the same design.

The question remains why the North Koreans went to all this trouble, which after all entails some risk. The most likely theory is a combination of bravado and nervousness (which often go together). South Korea has 40,000 troops in South Vietnam while North Korea has none, a situation for which baiting Uncle Sam may compensate in some slight measure. North and South Korea are still at war, and if the South Koreans—as they claim—fear attack by the North Koreans, it would seem reasonable that the latter have as much cause for apprehension. South Korea has a population of 29 million against North Korea's 12.5 million; two American divisions stand at the ready with nuclear and missile equipment south of the truce line. The South Korean military oligarchy receives hundreds of millions of dollars for its prestige and protection.

The commando squad the North Koreans sent down to assassinate President-General Park Chung Hee has its counterparts in patrols which invade the North—and there are South Koreans who would not be sorry to see General Park done away with. Meanwhile, North Korean Maj. Gen. Pak Chung Kuk can sit across the table at Panmunjom figuratively thumbing his nose at U.S. Rear Admiral John V. Smith. Cyrus R. Vance has returned to Washington, leaving the South Koreans still in a state of high dudgeon. And LBJ can keep on racking his brains about how to rescue those eighty-two U.S. seamen.

The Failure of Intelligence

Aside from the complications introduced by the electrification of intelligence, as manifested most recently in the Pueblo affair, what has been happening in Vietnam points to a more fundamental weakness. It is not entirely new; by its nature military intelligence is a gamble in which each side hopes that the odds are in its favor. But since World War II there are indications of a general deterioration in the quality of U.S. intelligence gathering, evaluation and translation into action. The classic example is General MacArthur's reliance on General Willoughby's assurances that the Chinese would not counterattack as our forces approached the Yalu River. Through their Indian intermediaries the Chinese had plainly warned Truman and MacArthur, but fiction proved stronger than truth. The result was near-disaster.

We have been told again and again that we are winning the war in Vietnam. It is now abundantly clear that we are not winning and have no hope of winning. This is not to say that we can be driven out of South Vietnam by force; rather that we cannot impose our will on the enemy short of destroying everything we are supposedly fighting for. And until the Tet onslaught we did not even know how false our information was. Despite all that has been said and written, most of what we think we know about Vietnam and its people is an inversion of the truth.

Where does this leave General Westmoreland? We have said (and recent events confirm it) that he is in large measure a public relations type of general. So was Mac-Arthur, with his florid prose, his contempt for danger and his executive stance. But MacArthur had in addition extraordinary personal intelligence and command of a certain kind of statesmanship, as he proved in Japan after the victory in World War II. Westmoreland is not in that class. Trying to defend him, the President said we had known for some time that such an offensive was planned by the enemy. But if we knew, why were we not prepared for it? Or are sections of ARVN actually a fifth column for Hanoi? If so, how has that situation escaped us?

Two basic troubles stand out. One is that we have very little reliable contact with the Vietnamese people. The Saigon government, which is supposed to supply that liaison, cannot do so because it is an imposed, puppet government of military adventurers. The other weakness is that intelligence work against a guerrilla-type enemy requires techniques for which we are unprepared. The enemy's disposition of forces, and the other formal parameters of intelligence, are less important than his political state of mind and the intentions based on his political assessments. About these elements we know little or nothing.

The result is that we are now driven to the supreme folly of destroying the cities and towns of South Vietnam, as well as those of the North, by our superior artillery and air power. If this latest method of winning the hearts and minds of the people is successful, it will prove that the Vietnamese are as crazy as we are—but that is an assumption so perilous that one would think even President Johnson would draw back from it in dismay. Perhaps he is actually saying one thing and feeling something quite different: some of his recent photographs suggest it.

Trouble at the State University

Last fall Evan R. Collins, president of the State University of New York campus at Albany, assured the faculty: "This university will not tolerate any interference with academic freedom, either from outside or within the scholarly community." But a little later forty faculty members formed an ad hoc Teachers Committee for Draft Counseling (TCDC). "As teachers and responsible members of the academic community," they concluded, "we must help . . . young men obtain information on all alternatives, to the end that they arrive at a rational and emotionally satisfactory decision about their role, if any, in the Vietnam war." Twenty-seven teachers volunteered to provide counseling in an informal manner, eschewing any active advice to the students on what their course of conduct should be.

But the only legal alternative to being drafted is application for conscientious objector status. All other options, such as emigration to Canada, are either clearly illegal or, from an orthodox patriotic standpoint, of dubious legality and morally reprehensible besides. There must have been some faculty-student discussion of such matters, for soon charges of "disloyalty, treason and subsidizing subversion" began to resound on the floor of the State Assembly. Conservative Assemblymen demanded that the school administration crack down on the TCDC. Assemblymen Neil W. Kelleher of Troy and Elwyn Mason of Hobart, both Republicans, were especially vehement, with only Democrat Joseph Kottler of Brooklyn counseling moderation. Mason declared this was tantamount to "creating and perpetuating cancer in our university under the guise of academic freedom."

President Collins, though rumored to be unhappy about TCDC (wouldn't you be if you were in his shoes?) has so far refused to interfere. For their part, the TCDC members aver that "if history should judge our efforts in Vietnam to have been wrong [we teachers] want future generations to know who the 'good Germans' were. Until Congress provides some acceptable substitute for military service, we can expect groups like the Albany Committee to proliferate on campuses all over the country." The Nation hopes their numbers, and their fortitude, will increase. The latter will be needed as much as the former.

Cities in Distress

Recently The New York Times devoted a two-column lead on the front page to a $10,000 grant which the tax-exempt Twentieth Century Fund made to the City of New York, "in lieu," it said, of taxes.

The Fund's contribution does more than it may have had in mind to emphasize the highly privileged position of the foundations. The Fund said that the $10,000 represented the sum it would expect to pay in property taxes (if it paid them) on its building. Leaving aside the novelty of self-assessed real property taxation, it should be noted that the City of New York also imposes a municipal income tax, not to mention the state and federal income taxes. The point, however, is not the adequacy of the "in lieu" contribution. The Twentieth Century Fund is only one of an estimated 18,000 foundations, and—with only $27 million in assets—is not one of the really big ones. Total assets of U.S. foundations now exceed $20 billion, with more than one-third of that concentrated in the hands of about a dozen giants.

By any reckoning, this means a substantial loss of tax revenue at all levels. No one questions the social value of the contributions made by the foundations, and the principle of tax exemption is important and should be safeguarded. But about one-sixth of New York City's real property, the Times tells us, is now held in tax-exempt ownership. City revenues have increased, but expenditures continue to outpace income. Much of the cost of social change now falls directly on the cities. The demand for services steadily increases and so does the cost. Certain services are imperative, yet no one has suggested how cities can meet the steadily escalating costs of collective bargaining agreements with large and powerful unions of municipal employees. The need for a reshifting of tax revenue is evident, and the longer it is delayed the greater the likelihood that the principle of tax-exemption will have to be re-examined. All the more reason, therefore, why foundations and other tax-exempt institutions should offer "in lieu" contributions to the cities. But a glance at the comments which the Times obtained from foundation spokesmen is enough to indicate that there will be no stampede on the part of other foundations to follow Twentieth Century's example.

FORMOSA: 'Solidarity of Gloom'

MARILYN BLATT YOUNG

Mrs. Young is a student of Sino-American relations and author of a forthcoming book on American China policy at the turn of the century.

Vietnam so totally absorbs us that unless forcibly brought to our attention, as in the recent Pueblo crisis, other monuments to America's relentless pursuit of the cold war in the Pacific tend to be forgotten. Thus 50,000 American troops remain in South Korea (a "token" force we are told, though almost equal in size to the estimate of North Vietnamese troops fighting in the South), Japan has its share of U.S. bases, Okinawa is a colony of the Department of the Army in disregard of the sentiments of its inhabitants, and Formosa, our "floating fortress," preserves, as in amber, the Chinese civil war.

The Kennedy years provided so many major crises that it is hard to remember that Formosa, with its appendages, Quemoy and Matsu, was a key debating point in the 1960 campaign. Our commitment to defend those tiny outposts, should an attack on them presage an attack on Formosa (and how will it be possible to determine that at the time?), remains. Indeed the whole intractable problem of Formosa waits for us when we shall have done with Vietnam—or worse, while we are still mired there.

Few people talk about the island, few seem concerned with it. In the paradoxical effort to contain but not isolate China, some public figures (most recently, Governor Romney) espouse a two-China solution which would combine flexibility toward Peking with a determination to retain Nationalist China's UN seat. This formulation is rejected not merely by the Peking and Taipei governments but by the 11 million native Formosans—an overwhelming majority of the population of the island.

The goal of the State Department, insofar as its representatives see fit to confide in American citizens, is simple: don't rock the boat; support the heir apparent to Chiang's power, his son Ching-kuo; keep a weather eye out for "trouble" from the Formosans and guide visiting American Congressmen, students and teachers to a heartfelt enthusiasm for signs of economic progress.

Should a visitor happen upon the many evidences of a harsh police state, he is reminded that he is a guest of the country and that anyway the Chinese have never shown much aptitude for political democracy. If, rarely enough, contact is made with dissident Formosans, one is advised on how few they are in number, how questionable in purpose, how ultimately doomed by the growing unity between Formosan and mainlander, due to the open education system. Change is seen as both undesirable and unlikely. America's goal in Formosa is short-term stability in the frozen, mad logic of the cold war. Little is said of long-term stability. Indeed in the event of the death of Chiang Ching-kuo (and he is reportedly in bad health) the United States is without any policy whatsoever.

Formosa is a repressive police state in which, at last, Chiang Kai-shek has found an area small enough to rule with relative efficiency. Not that corruption is absent. It is all-pervasive, but it too is an instrument of control. The readiness to engage in corrupt activities would seem to be a necessary condition for power and a symbol of loyalty to Chiang. It is also a useful weapon should Chiang at any time wish to rid himself of a former ally. Denouncing a man for corruption serves the dual purpose of appearing virtuous and maintaining control. In addition, Chiang has at his disposal the secret police and a huge (some estimate 10 per cent of the population) system of minor informers. In large measure the people police themselves, convinced—by frequent and arbitrary arrests, executions and censorship—that silence is safest. But repression, though it may be a cause, is not the most salient characteristic of the island. Rather one is struck by a kind of heavy unhappiness just this side of despair. Everyone is unhappy. Mainlanders because they can't go home again and cannot accept Formosa as their new land; Formosans because they cannot rule what is their land. Nor, of course, are mainlanders encouraged to look on Formosa as theirs: all future expectations are supposed to lie in recovery of the mainland.

These divisions are not total and the regime's propaganda about growing harmony between the two groups might begin to approximate the truth were it not for the hard work done by the regime to perpetuate differences. Mainlanders suffer equally with Formosans the corrupt, authoritarian rule of the Kuomintang (KMT) party. Many, perhaps most, have resigned themselves, however miserably, to dying on Formosa. An alliance between disaffected mainlanders and the majority population would mean instantaneous collapse of the Nationalist government. For that reason, the regime does all in its power to prevent such an event, to maintain the mainlanders, as one Formosan put it, in their "solidarity of gloom."

When Henry Kao, as a Formosan and an independent, was elected mayor of Taipei in 1964, it was discovered that he ran ahead of the KMT candidate in mainlander neighborhoods. The threat of a united, anti-KMT constituency was obviously great. As a result, Taipei has lost the right to elect its own mayor; it is now a "special municipality," a dubious privilege shared by Nanking and several other cities unvisited by Nationalist politicians in almost two decades. Mr. Kao has been appointed mayor. He can be dismissed at the whim of the central government, he has lost his constituency and rumors are spread that he has joined the KMT. If that is believed, it will cost him the backing of virtually all Formosans.

Henry Kao's coalition was temporary in any case, produced for a specific election, because he led no party which could secure and hold voters to him. However, efforts to form an opposition party have been made—and smashed. The most notable case was that of Lei Chen, former editor of the banned journal Free China Fortnightly, who in 1960 attempted to organize an opposition party based on cooperation between liberal mainlanders like himself and Formosans. Lei was sentenced to ten years for his efforts, and few doubt the sentence would have been far harsher if his influential foreign friends had not intervened.

Formosans, who hold not one ambassadorship, whose chances of travel abroad are limited, and whose contacts with foreigners are hampered by linguistic difficulties (most Americans wish to learn Mandarin, the official language of both China and Nationalist-ruled Formosa; many Formosans speak it indifferently or not at all), are likely to fare much worse. It is difficult to discover who has been arrested, much less why. Arrests are rumored to have been made recently at the National University of Taiwan, but even to admit knowledge of this fact is to attract attention from the police. Therefore, silence is kept.

The government does not attempt complete repression. As in any police state, cautious discussion among intimates cannot be suppressed. What is forbidden absolutely is public communication about serious issues of any kind. Underground student publications appear now and then, but they are quickly seized and harsh penalties exacted of their authors, if they can be found. Moreover, the boundary between sedition and permissible criticism is deliberately kept obscure. As Chen and Lasswell point out in Formosa, China and the United Nations, "In undertaking a political activity, one has no rational way of estimating the probable consequences in terms of indulgence or deprivation." Indeed the arbitrariness of the law affects everyone, from the sidewalk vendor of black-market goods, uncertain if the protection money he pays the police will operate today as it did yesterday, to the university intellectual whose uncertainty about penalties induces apathy and silence. The one aspect of past Japanese rule universally mourned by Formosans is the dependable system of law, however harsh, it established and enforced.

Distrust is sown by planting informers, part time or professional, everywhere, so that no group feels safe in discussing any but the most innocuous topics. A professor relates how a concerned student humbly requested that he speak less openly in class. The student did not want to report the professor, but if he did not do so, someone else would—and report the student's lack of zeal for good measure.

Without the sustaining myth of return to the mainland, Chiang and the KMT would have no legitimacy whatsoever. The central government in exile allots to Formosa the number of posts and seats in the government the island would be entitled to in a unified China. Today, for example, Formosa is entitled to a mere eighteen out of 1,521 seats in the National Assembly. The KMT dominates the Provincial Assembly, which is in any case powerless, and the governor is appointed. Should it be admitted in any way that return to the mainland is a lost dream, the slim fabric of reason by which Chiang rules would be permanently rent. Thus the main enemies of the government are those who discuss the possibility of Formosan independence. This, even more than the "two-China" formula, is most feared by the regime.

Attempting, by an act of open courage, to break out of the impotence created by combined self and government censorship, a well-known Formosan political scientist, P'eng Ming-min, and two students drafted a cool and reasoned brief for Formosan independence in 1965. P'eng hoped that his statement could be circulated to friends and colleagues, mainland and Formosan. He knew the risks he ran, but felt that silence was death and that the plea for free and open debate among men of good will might galvanize the weak and unite the strong. The document, and its authors, were seized before even one copy could be distributed. The contents of the statement were distorted beyond recognition, and disseminated. One otherwise sympathetic mainlander insisted that the statement (which he had never read) was a violently inflammatory appeal to Formosans to massacre all mainlanders, to "push us into the sea."

Macpherson, Toronto Star

Again, through the efforts of foreign friends and such groups as Amnesty International, P'eng's sentence was relatively light: eight years in prison. One student was likewise sentenced to eight years, the other to ten. Perhaps as a result of further pressure, the government amnestied P'eng in November of 1965, but kept his students in jail. In the summer of 1966 their sentences were reduced by half. Although the government released P'eng it hoped to destroy him as a possible rallying figure for future political action by keeping his students in jail and handing out a story to the newspapers that he had confessed his guilt and thrown himself upon Chiang's infinite mercy. The confession story was a lie, and the effort to discredit P'eng has had only limited success. But many young mainlanders who consider themselves liberals believe the confession story and have written P'eng off. Perhaps they would have done so in any event; the sentiment for Formosan independence, in contrast to anti-KMT feelings, is slight among mainlanders of any age. On the other hand, the general suspicion in which the government is held by Formosans has worked among them to protect P'eng's reputation. He is, however, powerless. He lives in a state of semi-house arrest, his visitors are followed, he is for-bidden to teach. Punishment extends to other members of his family, an old and prominent one in Formosa, who have found it difficult to get credit at banks and are often harassed in other ways.

The vulnerability of the government to foreign pressure is apparent from the two important political cases of Lei and P'eng, whose sentences were reduced by pressure from abroad. A government which lives by myth is obviously half a public relations venture. Thus, with luck, even relatively obscure people can be saved. In the summer of 1966, for example, Huang Ch'i-ming, a Formosan graduate student at the University of Wisconsin, paid a brief visit to his family in Taipei. He was arrested and convicted on the charge of having attended meetings in Madison where "the problem of Formosa" was discussed. (In the Nationalist mythology Formosa, as such, cannot be a problem.) A story about Huang appeared in The New York Times. Pressure from some American universities and possibly from other officialdom followed, and Huang was retried (though an appeal had been rejected earlier). In a face-saving move, Huang received a three-year suspended sentence. In a sense it was a life sentence, for Huang will probably never be allowed to leave Formosa again.

The recent, and distressing, forced return to Formosa from Japan of a Formosan independence worker may be a sign of new trials and prosecutions. Some rumors now coming out of the island indicate that large-scale arrests are imminent.

For Chiang, the Chinese civil war is both a political necessity and a military fact. An estimated 25 per cent of his 600,000-man army lives in vast underground bunkers on Quemoy and Matsu. On alternate days propaganda shells are exchanged with the mainland—less than 2 miles away at its closest point. Americans are encouraged to visit Quemoy for a day of expense-free entertainment: briefings, a tour of the small museum, the opportunity to send one's very own propaganda balloon to China. From here and, presumably, other points the Nationalists stage their raids on the mainland, concentrating on sabotage and brief terrorist attacks by frogmen whose brave deeds are openly lauded in the press. Using American equipment and shielded by the Seventh Fleet, Chiang takes frequent occasion to demonstrate to Mao that he has not yet lost all hope.

While Formosans may fear that Chiang's desire to return to the mainland will involve them in a disastrous war, they realize how unlikely this is except in the event of a larger conflict between China and America. A more immediate anxiety is that, upon the death of his father, Chiang Ching-kuo will negotiate some kind of deal with Peking which would indeed return Formosa to the mainland, on Peking's terms. It is hard to find a Formosan who does not firmly believe that Chiang's son has already met with Communist officials. They dismiss the notion that this is merely an effort to blackmail America into firmer displays of support for the Nationalists. "He is a mainlander, after all," they insist. "He will never accept the permanent separation of Formosa from China." Nor would such a deal be inconceivable. As recently as 1965, China's Foreign Minister Ch'en Yi declared that cooperation with Chiang Kai-shek and his son was entirely possible, provided only that they "break away from U.S. imperialist control and be loyal to the motherland."

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

What of the other alternative, an independent Formosa with its own seat in the UN? Peking could then assume its rightful place in that body and on the Security Council. It will at once be protested that neither Taipei nor Peking would allow such a resolution. Taipei's wishes in this matter are, perhaps, irrelevant. The United States need not permanently enslave itself to every tyrant it has had the misfortune to support in the past. Peking's protest, and the form it might take, are more disturbing considerations. Yet it would seem that a friendly, nonaligned Formosa might please the Communists better than the present situation. In terms of world opinion, it would look very bad indeed for Peking to oppose by force the self-determination of the people of Formosa, provided this could be determined in a truly free and open way. A deal with Chiang Ching-kuo could possibly be made, though it is uncertain that the United States would ever allow it to be consummated.

The best case for such an arrangement is made by Lung-chu Chen and Harold Lasswell in their book. They approach the problem from every possible angle. Since Lasswell is no Sinophile, he is not oversensitive to Chinese convictions concerning the inviolable unity of their country, defined as conterminous with Chinese culture. Lung-chu Chen is Formosan, and his loyalties are clear. Formosa, they argue, has all the requirements for independence. Like the black ghettos in America it is already, in fact, separate. What is needed is to acknowledge that separation. They conclude that the "one China, one Formosa" policy, as distinguished from the "two-Chinas" formula, is the solution offering the greatest promise of clarifying and serving the common interest of the UN, the people of Formosa, the United States, and ultimately the people of mainland China."

At present the overwhelming majority of people on Formosa are being taxed without representation; they watch helplessly as 80 per cent of their government's budget is devoted to the continuation of a civil war in which they have never played any part, and in whose outcome, except as it affects their island, they have no interest. In the words of one Formosan leader, the Nationalist government amounts to no more than a "gigantic hoax . . . detrimental to the world order in general and Far Eastern stability in particular. Domestically . . . the government is no more than a cynical artifice" whose only function is to prolong the "dominance of the KMT minority over the 11 million Formosans." Should Formosa assume its place as an independent nation, it would make an "explicit declaration of de facto and de jure severance from past Chinese internal conflicts" and look toward the establishment of a "sort of non-hostile, if not friendly, relationship [with China], without which the life of Formosa as an independent political entity would be one of chronic precariousness. . . ."

The United States is, in large measure, responsible for the situation Formosans find themselves in today. It brought the KMT administration to Formosa after the war and has supported it militarily, financially and politically ever since—with a brief interruption in 1949-50. We have the power to effect a change, to support, for once, a politically oppressed majority before it attempts to gain its rights by slaughter. In the interests of long-term stability in the Far East, for a China policy that has some hope of success, American support for self-determination on Formosa would seem imperative. But America has ignored imperatives before. It is, unhappily, more than likely that we shall do so once more.

LITTLE WATCHDOG OF THE DOLLAR WARRIORS

SANFORD WATZMAN

Mr. Watzman is a reporter in the Washington bureau of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Washington

The Renegotiation Board, an already crippled agency that polices war profiteering, will die on June 30 unless Congress renews its license to live. Though it will probably win another reprieve with less supplication than has been necessary in former years, because now more than ever it is needed as an adornment for the war budget, the issue is not merely whether this five-member independent board should survive but whether its former powers should be restored to it, so that it can really keep track of all the riches flowing from where the action is today.

The board is a small beast in the bureaucratic jungle, with low visibility on Capitol Hill, where it has few good friends and has frequently been ambushed by its enemies. A pariah of sorts, it can't roar for attention as other agencies do because (a) its absurdly small budget of $2.5 million a year does not afford a press agent or, to use the euphemism, a public information officer; and (b) like the Internal Revenue Service, it must take a vow of silence about the corporations it duns on behalf of the U.S. Treasury.

The board is sequestered in its own little office building, in a remote corner of downtown Washington. It was discovered there by its current champion, low-ranking Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez, a liberal Democrat from San Antonio, after a chance reference was made to it at a committee hearing on another topic. Gonzalez has since confessed to the House: "At the time, I knew nothing about the board. I have been pained to discover that the same is true of most of my colleagues."

The fact is that the agency is better known to lobbyists than to legislators. The former and their defense contractor clients, whose sales exceed $125 million a day, have felt the board's bite; they fear it still, even though the board has had many teeth pulled and been shrunk drastically in size.

In the wake of Korean War spending, the agency was recovering excess profits at the rate of more than $150 million a year; the figure for the last fiscal year was $15.9 million. Recurring amendments to the Renegotiation Act of 1951 have opened large loopholes in the law, and the board, violating all the laws of bureaucratic respectability, has been withering away. It had 558 employees in 1952 and 742 in 1953. It sank to 639 employees in 1954, 550 in 1955, 466 in 1956 and then by steady decline to 178 in 1967. These are total personnel figures, including board members, not the staffs only of the Washington headquarters but of the two regional offices as well.

On December 31, the agency published its annual Blue Book—a report to Congress which hardly anyone reads. It is terse enough, but the prose is hardly as stimulating as—and of course less comprehensible than—the latest communiqués out of Vietnam. Yet this particular Blue Book would have been especially meaty for the press agent which the Renegotiation Board lacks. For in it the agency, whose reporting runs two years behind because of the time it takes to receive and process contractors' filings, begins to lift the curtain on the costs of stepped-up procurement of Vietnam war materiel. The book is full of indicators that the profitability of defense contracts is escalating, with excess profits also surging.

What is meant by "excess profits"? In a free enterprise economy, the question is often asked and one would expect constant quibbling over it, especially since the renegotiation law is deliberately vague and flexible on the point. But the U.S. tax court has had no trouble with the term. It asserted bluntly in one case: "The word 'excessive' has a generally understood meaning. . . . It means more than is reasonable." And even the contractors, in their quiet and private dealings with the board, appear to have no trouble understanding the phrase. For the record shows that when the board has decided there was profiteering, the corporations agreed nine times out of ten (89.9 per cent of the time, to be exact), to refund money to the U.S. Treasury. There have been 3,375 such cases since the board was established during the Korean War; only 142 cases have been appealed to the tax court. The board has won seventy-one of these lawsuits, the court decreased the board's billings in forty others and the rest are pending. One case was that of the Boeing Airplane Co., which stormed into court protesting a finding of excess profits amounting to $9.8 million and slunk out owing $13 million—because the court took a closer look than had the board. (Only those cases that reach the court become known to the public.)

When the board asked Congress in 1966 for a new lease on life, ultimately winning a two-year extension, the House Ways and Means Committee publicly announced it "would be pleased to receive written comments from any interested individuals or organizations." But only foes of the board replied, including such powerful lobbies as the Aerospace Industries Association, National Association of Manufacturers, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Electronic Industry Association, National Security Industrial Association, American Institute of Certified Public Accountants and Machinery and Allied Products Institute. They insisted that the board serves no legitimate purpose and that it be abolished or further weakened. One reason that an independent agency is not needed to watch for profiteering, they added, is that the Defense Department was already doing this very thing itself as a consequence of the 1962 Truth in Negotiating Act.

This reasoning by the contractors is noteworthy because many of them had opposed a strong "Truth" Act, and because a series of Congressional hearings in 1967, notably those held by Sen. William Proxmire's Joint Economic Committee, disclosed that the Defense Department had never adequately enforced that law. For instance, it took five years for the Pentagon to agree last October, under fire from Proxmire and others, to implement the audit provisions of the "Truth" Act. It is understandable, thus, that defense contractors would rather deal exclusively with the Pentagon (the military half of the military-industrial complex), which had overlooked padded prices totaling countless millions of dollars, than suffer the curiosity of an independent Renegotiation Board.

But as the Vietnamese War was then heating up, the lobbyists deemed it prudent not to press too hard. A modus vivendi was reached when they tacitly agreed that the board be allowed to carry on for two more years at its existing level of limited operations. The consideration was that a study would be undertaken by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to determine, among other things, whether "this ancient and antiquated [board] meets today's needs"—a question posed by Rep. Charles S. Gubser (R., Calif.). The same joint committee had published an innocuous study on the subject only four years before. This is the background against which the impending debate will be held.

Corporations are required to file annually with the board if they hold defense or space contracts or deal with certain agencies such as the Atomic Energy Commission—unless the companies qualify for one of the numerous exemptions that have punctured the law in recent years. The filing is a report on that portion of the year's business with the government that remains covered by the Act. It resembles the corporation's income tax return, to which the board legally has access. In this sense, it differs from the accounting that a company is supposed to make under the Truth in Negotiating Act, which is enforced (when it is) on a contract-by-contract rather than on a broad annual basis.

The Renegotiation Act sets forth standards for determining excess profits; it is more liberal than the "Truth" Act in allowing costs to the contractor. Some of the criteria are (1) reasonableness of the profits netted on defense contracts, assessed against the normal earnings of the company; (2) the extent of financial risk assumed by the corporation and the inventiveness of its product; and (3) government assistance to the company in developing the product.

The board's finding of $15.9 million in excess profits in fiscal 1967 was down from $24.5 million the previous year. But the latest Blue Book warns that this comparison could be misleading. It asserts: "Because of the normal time lag between award of a contract . . . and the time required for processing a renegotiation case, the effect of accelerated Vietnam procurement is not reflected [by the $15.9 million]." The annual report also contains indicators which are more current and that point to fat in many Vietnam contracts. For instance:

Corporate filings are screened at board headquarters in Washington, where an overwhelming majority win quick clearance. But when profiteering is suspected, the filing is bounced back to a regional board for renegotiation of profits between the company and board officials. The Blue Book says on this point: "In fiscal 1967, 635 filings were thus assigned, as against 444 in fiscal 1966, an increase of 43 percent. Most of the increase occurred in the last quarter of the fiscal year, when the first filings reflecting the surge of Vietnam procurement were processed. This sharp increase indicated the beginning of an upward trend in the Board's workload."

Also suggestive was the fact that corporations reported $30.3 million in voluntary refunds and price reductions to the board, against $23.2 million in the previous fiscal year. Since these cases were not run through the bureaucratic mill, the contractor having elected to take a short cut, the voluntary figures are regarded as more current and a better reflector of Vietnam spending than the lagging official determinations of the board. Representative Gonzalez and other advocates of a rearmed Renegotiation Board see the voluntary refunds as a crucial element. This money flows back, they contend, because it looks better when the companies cough it up themselves than when they get caught with it later by the board. In fact, Chairman Lawrence E. Hartwig, chosen by the last four Presidents of the United States to sit on the five-member panel, views the agency as a strong inducement to corporate honesty. Though he has no idea how much money is saved by fear of the board, he says that the figure—if known—would dwarf the dollar amounts officially recovered.

The Blue Book shows more companies (20.7 per cent more) reporting profits and fewer companies (20.3 per cent less) claiming losses than in the previous year. Average profit margin of the moneymakers was 4.99 per cent, compared with 4.62 per cent in fiscal 1966. When the "loss" companies are figured in, these percentages drop to 3.53 and 3.02. Although this portion of the board's statistics points to only a slight upward trend in profits, the figures are regarded with a great deal of skepticism by the agency. Profit figures, it is argued, are deflated by the many exemptions and allowances in the renegotiation law. Besides, generalizations about the highly diversified defense industry are said to be hazardous. Where there is a monopoly or oligopoly on a sorely needed military item, the deck is stacked in favor of high profits. On the other hand, corporations are generally willing to take a loss for a few years in order to develop a monopoly item, such as a new weapons system.

Representative Gonzalez was perhaps not the first Congressman to discover the Renegotiation Board and its significance for the Vietnamese War, but he was the first to find something to say about it. Last March, he introduced a bill that seeks to return the board to its Korean War strength. Despite a number of speeches on the House floor, he had a difficult time winning attention to his cause until a series of articles appeared last January in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. It was this newspaper which first exposed the Pentagon's "comprehensive lack of compliance" with the Truth in Negotiating Act—a conclusion reached by the Joint Economic Committee—and which has since taken an interest generally in the subject of war profiteering. After the articles appeared Gonzalez won an important ally in Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D., O.), who joined him as a co-sponsor of the bill. Vanik is a member of the Ways and Means Committee; Gonzalez is not. Other Ohioans, including Reps. William E. Minshall of the defense appropriations subcommittee and Jackson E. Betts of Ways and Means (both are Republicans), have been aroused.

The Gonzalez-Vanik legislation has two major provisions to bring more Defense Department purchasing under the jurisdiction of the board. It would require any corporation holding at least $250,000 in renegotiable government contracts to file annually with the agency. This, the Korean War figure, was subsequently raised to $500,000 and then $1 million. (Some lobbyists speak of boosting the exemption again—to $5 million.) The bill also would repeal the so-called standard commercial article exemption that after the Korean War drained away much of the authority the board could have exercised despite the raising of the floor. This dispensation excuses from renegotiation proceedings the purchase of certain products when it can be shown that the contractor sells at least 35 per cent of the item to customers other than the government.

The legislation also would make the board a permanent agency. No longer would it have to implore Congress periodically for authority to survive, for one or two more years, with the lobbyists sharpening their knives in advance. Even should the Vietnamese War end, Gonzalez and Vanik argue, unsettled world conditions and competition in the cold war will sustain a high level of defense and space buying. They cite the impending anti-missile race with Russia as an example.

Even today, the agency has enough staff and other resources to strike at the giants, like Boeing. Measured in terms of large dollar amounts, it is among the top defense contractors that most of the excess profits have been found. But when the number of separate cases is recorded, more instances of profiteering turn up in the less exclusive group just below the giants, where prices may be proportionately just as bloated.

In fiscal 1967 the board examined sales totaling $33.1 billion. The new legislation would permit the board to thumb through an additional $6 billion to $7 billion a year in defense and space contracts. The bill also would triple the number of contractors that come under the board's scrutiny, the figure then shooting up to 11,300 annually. A large share of the board's new "customers" would be subcontractors, now enjoying a boom with the escalation of the war in Vietnam. Because subcontractors, especially on the lower tiers, do not deal directly with Pentagon procurement officers, their pricing policies are not open to the Defense Department, but they would become visible to the board.

Business protests that such legislation would make an octopus of the board, giving it tentacles that would choke what the corporation spokesmen are pleased to refer to as "small business." At a time when the government should be encouraging more competition for defense contracts, the smaller corporations would become strangled by red tape flowing out of costly and pointless confrontations with the Renegotiation Board.

An answer to this argument was given as far back as 1948, when a special Senate investigating committee headed by the late Sen. Owen Brewster (R., Me.) confessed an "error" on its part. It had recommended boosting the filing floor from $100,000 to $500,000 and its proposal was adopted in 1943. "The committee now feels in view of our wartime experience in the administration of the renegotiation laws that this recommendation was a mistake," the panel reported. It explained that most of the complaints received about profiteering during the war were directed at contractors with less than $500,000 worth of contracts, adding: "It was damaging to war morale. . . . It frequently happened that contractors about whom complaints were received were located in small communities where it soon became common knowledge that the contractor was profiting excessively."

Chairman Hartwig told a House appropriations subcommittee last year: "There have been instances where the board has found salaries unreasonable. Our statute ties in with the Internal Revenue Code. We must allow those costs which are good tax deductions. Internal Revenue, of course, can disallow excessive salaries. And so we have on occasion disallowed salaries." Hartwig also warned about the need for keeping track of satellite corporations. He asserted: "Otherwise, an individual could organize four or five companies, each with less than $1 million in renegotiable business (the present minimum required for board review), and escape renegotiation. . . . Chasing down affiliates and subsidiaries is not an easy task, and certainly requires the staff we have. We are down to the bare bones with only twenty-two people in that office."

Congress last year gave the agency the budget requested for it by President Johnson. The President and Ways and Means Chairman Wilbur Mills (D., Ark.) are the two persons most likely to determine the board's future. Representative Gonzalez sometimes hitches a ride when Mr. Johnson flies to his ranch in Texas. Should the President side with Gonzalez and Vanik, he would find himself in the company not only of some liberals but even a few conservatives—such as hawkish Chairman L. Mendel Rivers (D., S.C.), of the House Armed Services Committee. Defending the board's sniffing on the trail of Defense Department purchases, Rivers once advised the House that the renegotiation agency doesn't "deal in chicken-feed."

"The contractors and subcontractors are big men," he said. "They hire the smartest people on earth to come down here to Washington to sit across the table with some little colonel . . . who may not know exactly everything about a computer. These people can steal you blind, if they want to. That is a fact of life. I know what I am talking about, because I have a subcommittee that looks into this."

ARE INTELLECTUALS OBSOLETE?

J. P. NETTL

Mr. Nettl, formerly on the faculty of the University of Leeds, is now professor of Sociology and Political Science, University of Pennsylvania. He is the author of Rosa Luxemburg (Oxford University Press), Political Mobilization (Basic Books) and The Soviet Achievement: 1917-1967 (Harcourt, Brace & World).

The question has been asked before—in fact it is asked whenever the literate and politically involved community is at loggerheads with the powers that be. Either those in power don't listen, whereupon the intellectual community decamps from Washington, back into the comforts of contemporary academic salaries where available. Such an exodus has taken place since Johnson succeeded Kennedy; a steady, consistent trickle, it is true, rather than a concerted rush, but effective nonetheless. Like all refugees these intellectuals, from Hilsman to Schlesinger, spend their time and brain power telling us how much better things were then than they are now, and how they all left of their own volition when conscience dictated. Or, alternatively, the model of democracy (which at best is always much more a model than a reality) is found wanting. The public, besotted with television and consumer goods, refuses to heed the warnings of the intellectuals. We get gloomy prognostications about the decay of culture and the hedonism of the age.

In both cases, the issue is one of influence. Intellectuals are not bureaucrats; their raison d'être is to influence people, to bring about consciously directed change. They tend to dissent when they are not serving the government; cyclically, a new government often sweeps yesterday's dissenters into the positions of influence. Even when a more radical, even total, opposition to existing policies is called for, as with the Vietnamese War, those like Noam Chomsky who address themselves specifically to the conscience of their colleagues have little doubt as to whom they have in mind when they talk about intellectuals: all those who exercise influence over people's minds, who market preferences and choices. Though social scientists have made various attempts over the last hundred years to define the nature and quality of an intellectual, these have usually proved barren conceptual exercises, primarily of interest to other social scientists. We know what a worker or a capitalist is, an academic, a writer, a political activist; but an intellectual is in a way only an occasional phenomenon, not a permanent part of the social scene—something between an ascription of mental excellence and a caricature of impracticability.

Two years ago R. A. Nisbet produced the most recent sociological definition in Commentary (December, 1965)—a disinterested pursuer of knowledge, a scholar—and Nisbet contrasted him with academic bureaucrats and wheeler-dealers "who have so profound a distaste for the classroom and for the pains of genuine scholarship or creative thought that they will seize upon anything . . . to exempt themselves respectably from each." Intellectuals at least reckon to have no difficulty in recognizing one another as a self-conscious community—and as long as they recognize one another the main purpose of definition is served. As with the Jews, it is self-recognition and mutual recognition that properly establish the community, not the outside opinion of gentiles. This last is anyhow likely to crystallize only in case of hostility. Most of the argument with and among intellectuals concerns attitudes, not the membership of the community. Hardly anyone really questions the existence or relevance of intellectuals, any more than in the past.

I think we should, though. The problem of the intellectual in contemporary America and in other highly industrial and technological societies no longer relates to his position, status and influence but to his very existence. It may be that the intense, even raucous concern of intellectuals with the present state of affairs, in the United States as much as in the Soviet Union, is not primarily dissent from particular policies but dissent from a society which is pushing them into the margin of irrelevance, and eroding the very basis of what intellectuals are and do. For one of the most significant factors of the present situation is that intellectuals have no alternative to propose. They are "alienated"—unhappy word that increasingly comes to carry connotations of mental illness instead of the original Marxist meaning of separation leading to failures of perception. As Raymond Aron, a prominent critic of the intellectual masquerading as a critic of ideology, puts it: "Radical criticism has abandoned the attempt to rethink the world or to change it. It is simply content to condemn." The point is that this reduction of function is not the fault of intellectuals (the usual accusation); it occurs because certain types of society, among them the modern technological variant, cannot accommodate that complex of roles and attitudes that constitute an intellectual. In this view, an intellectual is no longer to be defined by what he does or even by any psychological disposition toward ideological or utopian modes of thought but by a particular social role which is being destroyed in a modern society.

One can of course simply define intellectuals as those who work with their brains. It is interesting that Soviet and American definitions over the last two or three decades converge in that direction, providing us with an intelligentsia, the existence and extent of which is directly related to education. By transposing intellectuals into intelligentsia, the problem of social role, function or attitude is wiped away; they are simply people with certain qualifications and engaged in given professions, and never mind about their views. It is true that in certain societies of the past the intelligentsia were intellectuals. In czarist Russia, as well as Imperial China, there was a close identification between the intelligentsia as an objective social group and the intellectuals as a subjective community distinguished by its critical views and attitudes; but as the educated strata became bigger and society more complex, this identification disappeared. In America and in the Soviet Union today the intelligentsia are by no means necessarily intellectuals, and the intellectuals are sometimes not to be found among the intelligentsia at all.

There are three main components to the definition of an intellectual. In the first place, his concerns tend to be universal. He is not a specialist but one for whom any specialist activity always relates to a whole. He thus necessarily trades in generalizations—at least his views and statements are always intended to be capable of generalization. Here the idea of the intellectual as the conscience of society becomes relevant, for conscience is always universal, does not tolerate contradiction, and lives badly with the qualification of "ifs" and "buts." Second, his concern, and therefore the validation of his activities in the eyes of others, is cultural. He is concerned with the quality of life. This is particularly important in specifying the audience he addresses and their reaction to him. As a rule, people will not accept cultural statements by bureaucrats, lawyers, engineers, or even politicians as authoritative, but they will accept them from "intellectuals"—including, if necessary, such scientists, engineers, lawyers and even politicians as qualify for intellectual status. Most don't, a few do.

Finally, an intellectual is always strongly concerned with social and political matters; better, his is a socio-political role. This again has only in part to do with himself as a person, and much more with the expectation of others (that is what defines a role). In some societies intellectuals are prominent and important simply because writers and poets as well as politicians and journalists are understood to be involved with political matters quite irrespective of whether or not they specifically intend to address themselves to such matters. In Russia and China the whole context of poetry is traditionally political—which explains the puzzling preoccupation on the part of the authorities with the real meaning of what to outsiders appear perfectly harmless historical allegories or references, as well as the incessant bad habit of putting writers on trial. In England, the opposite is true. Since the English don't have intellectuals (they have the type of person but not the role) they tend not to recognize them when they see them, or to see intellectuals when they aren't really there. On its gossip back page, that pseudo-intellectual broadsheet for the Sunday literate, The Observer, wrote in December, 1967, about Walt W. Rostow, "an intellectual to his fingertips (he was visiting professor at both Oxford and Cambridge) . . . the nearest equivalent to Dick Crossman in American political life. . . . Johnson now calls him 'my type of intellectual' . . . a shrewd comment by a State Department colleague [states] Walt to be 'an intellectual who desperately needs to prove he has hair on his chest' . . . he's been called the Rasputin of the latest world empire." No wonder that even the most determined political intention on the part of writers such as Arnold Wesker still does not insure him the slightest political influence. England appears to be one of the societies traditionally inimical to intellectuals, at least since the 18th century—which is why there has been hardly any discussion of the problem of intellectuals or even awareness that there is a problem.

Intellectuals cannot accordingly be defined by any particular professions, attitudes or positions. In some societies poets are intellectuals while politicians are not (the present Soviet Union). In others, both poets and politicians can be intellectuals (the early Soviet Union and France). In yet other cases intellectuals form a distinct and cohesive social group with generally similar political attitudes, as in the United States. In America it is senseless to speak of any professions or activities as qualifying automatically for intellectual status; we have some poets as well as scientists who are intellectuals, others who are not.

Being an intellectual is a composite role, or rather a complex of individual roles. His concern with universality is directly opposed to the solid boundaries of professionalization in modern societies, where it is more and more accepted that no one can speak with authority on any subject other than his own—and must present impersonal evidence of qualification to boot. In modern industrial society culture itself is no longer a total entity accessible to all those who matter but has been subdivided into high, middle and low cultures, each with its own values and autonomous means of supply and gratification. Hence the intellectual must necessarily lose the cultural validation his role requires. Above all the professionalization of politics, with democracy coming to mean little more than a process of formulating different group interests and eventually adjudicating among them, severely inhibits the intellectual's influence in that area. Who cares about universal generalities when the whole is merely an abstraction summarizing the different parts? The word "ought" has little meaning nowadays except when backed by powerfully organized demands.

It is a sociological rule that complexity of social or economic organization is reflected by differentiation of roles and functions and that this in turn leads to specialization. Sociologists as far back as Comte and Durkheim predicted that societies would become "modern" in the sense of existing in the abstract view of the observer rather than in the consciousness of the members themselves. For the well-known shift from community to society implies a less well-known shift in consciousness: from a sense of common identity with a perceived whole to an impersonal bond tying individuals to an abstraction, membership in which has increasingly to be specified by laws and asserted by symbols like Thanksgiving Day or flag-waving week. In Europe this march of abstract modernity still struggles against the deeply embedded tradition of cultural homogeneity and social continuity with the past, a continuity and a homogeneity that have not been lessened by periods of severe political and social conflict.

But in America there is no such tradition to struggle against; even many of the conflicts of American history had and have an air of random collision in a vacuum. Every large-scale political unit in America is an artifact, defined primarily by its laws and its government, rather than by cultural cohesion or community; not least the United States itself. American society is an abstraction. That is why the American intellectual has had to create a group or community of intellectuals for himself if he is to survive at all in the absence of a valid cultural community within which to exercise his persuasive talents. And that is why only in America does a situation arise in which intellectuals as a group are either with (or in) the Administration or against and outside it. Bureaucratization is as great a threat for intellectuals in America as it was in the Soviet Union, though for very different reasons. In the Soviet Union, the party even today must still do battle against a deeply embedded tradition of intellectual influence. It bureaucratizes the intellectuals with a mixture of rewards and threats. In the United States the absorption process has been much easier. For bureaucratization always means particularization, the destruction of universality and utopia, the substitution of power for influence. In the words of Lionel Trilling, "In the American metaphysic, reality is always material. It is always material reality. It is hard, resistant, unformed, impenetrable and unpleasant. And that mind alone is felt to be trustworthy which most resembles this reality by most nearly reproducing the sensations it affords."

The dilemma of the intellectual is simple but complete. He can accept integration as some kind of specialist into a society too complex to be explained, understood or predicted as a whole. He may be taken in and used as some kind of professional—scientist, writer, poet or whatever—or even as an intellectual. In that last capacity modern society expects him self-consciously to deal with cultural minutiae and to have access, whether academic or via the mass media, to limited, high-culture audiences (the Third Programme in England serves precisely this function of "taking in" intellectuals qua intellectuals). Or if that solution does not attract, he can reject modern society as a whole without necessarily being able to posit an alternative. This means rejecting not one community for another, one policy for a different policy, one ideology for a counter-ideology, but denying the validity of modern scientific and technological society altogether. With the first alternative the intellectual accepts the reduction or melting down of his role to something much humbler, smaller and more precise: membership in the intelligentsia pure and simple. If he chooses the second, he puts himself outside the mainstream of modern development and makes himself appear eccentric. Above all he risks becoming isolated and irrelevant.

These two alternatives approximately describe the plight of American as well as Russian intellectuals today. The situation of the last three decades or more in the United States, when intellectuals on the whole supported and worked for Democratic administrations, while opposing and withdrawing from Republican ones, now no longer applies. A much more profound cleavage has opened up between intellectuals and modern society. The Vietnamese War has been an effective but not essential factor in this process of polarization; it would have happened anyway, albeit less dramatically or suddenly. Whether intellectuals are situated in universities, edit journals, or even run scientific laboratories, the choice is between dissenting from or supporting modernity as mirrored—give or take a little either way—by contemporary American society and its extension into Europe and elsewhere. What makes it so hard is the fact that in either case the decision is "anti-intellectual" in that it melts down the vital combination of the intellectual's role, the very basis of his social existence. Silence is a possible alternative, but silence for how long? A silent intellectual is a loser in any case.

The fact that a modern society critically poses the question of the intellectual's very existence can be demonstrated by reference to two areas in which he has always been intensely concerned. The first is that of social analysis. It has always been the intellectual's task graphically to characterize the society in which he lives, to separate essentials from trivia, and to arrange these essentials in some kind of meaningful order. To dissent one needs to know what to dissent from and why. Even at a time when specialization in the economy was growing apace (and the idea of it certainly dates back to Adam Smith in the 18th century, if not beyond), the analysis of society was still primarily the task of intellectuals seeking universal explanations. It is significant that modern, particularly American, society has created a substitute to fill this locus classicus of intellectual activity—sociology. The peculiar American contribution to sociology was to transform an essentially critical approach with strictly universal reference, as practiced in Europe, into a pragmatic and above all professionally specialist discipline that seeks to measure itself, not with the great philosophers of the past but with the methodologically qualified professions of the natural sciences a block away in the same university.

By grasping the traditional subject matter of intellectual concern and making of it yet another professional specialization, sociology offers a direct challenge to the intellectual. Its claim to be “value-free” is interesting, not so much because it succeeds or fails but because it is the only road to legitimation as a science. Much sociology is of course frankly parochial and concerned with minuscule phenomena. But even its more wide-ranging theoretical perspectives are increasingly based on the reinterpretation of reality in scientific or systematic terms. The fundamental nature of modern reality is less and less in dispute, and attempts or claims on the part of sociology to change it do not even arise. Prediction in modern sociology has no longer anything to do with the counterposing of alternatives which might be attained by conscious action, but consists merely of extrapolating existing trends on the assumption that the future is simply more of the present. American sociology is thus exceedingly supportive of the here-and-now, which it characterizes as modernity. The fact that it deals in abstract societies rather than real communities, in abstract functions rather than real actions, in variables rather than alternatives, and in structures rather than relationships, demonstrates that the modern reality which sociology underpins is itself abstract rather than tangible, scientific instead of desirable, but no less effective for all that. Modern society and its scientific handmaiden sociology state their own terms of reference to such an extent that arguments can be discussed only in the context of their own abstractions; to reject them and return to older, more ethical methods of discourse is to be accused of rejecting modernity itself.

There is much critical debate within sociology as to whether it should be so directly supportive of modern bureaucratic control, whether it should not seek major changes by emphasizing dissatisfactions, strains and conflicts in modern society. But in spite of these considerable differences within the profession, the area of possible dissent has become substantially narrower than it was before social scientists began to replace intellectuals as social analysts and critics. For one thing, all discussion of the future—the very heart of intellectual concerns—is based on an immediate future rather than a distant one, pragmatism rather than utopia. For another, continuing technological change and scientific advance are accepted by all sociologists as inevitable and irreversible; the better a sociological analysis can accommodate the impact of technology and science on society, the more seriously it will be taken. Thus the problem of choice in sociology has been greatly reduced. Whether critics or supporters of given policies or administrations, social scientists in any case put themselves forward as the direct heirs of the intellectual tradition; indeed they often tend to regard themselves as today's intellectuals. As Edward Shils has stated (“The Intellectuals and the Future,” Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, October, 1967):

The critical and solicitous care for the whole in the proximate future must be the charge which American intellectuals take on themselves, if American society is not to become the victim of the parochial preoccupations of specialized technological experts. If academic social scientists and free-lance publicists or amateur social scientists are not critics on behalf of the whole society over the reasonably foreseeable future, no one else will be.

Social scientists have become institutionalized (hence bureaucratized) to an extent that makes effective dissent quite difficult. In Europe this institutionalization was itself traditional (i.e., “pre-modern”) and did not coincide with the boundaries of influence of the universities. A German professor might lose his job through political deviance but there was usually a political group to accommodate him instead, while in France the academic establishment has traditionally almost been reserved to the political opposition, over the last forty years specifically to the Communists. In any case the European combination of cultural community and conflict-ridden unintegrated society over the last hundred years did not entail any contradiction between academic attainment and the strongest political and social dissent. Exile—the traditional refuge of the dissenting European intellectual—did not inhibit opposition but facilitated it.

In the all-embracing cosmos of a modern society, on an American or Russian scale, exile is virtually impossible and politics no longer a viable alternative to academic position. The very institutional autonomy of American universities within society modifies and decreases the effectiveness of dissenting academics. What happens within universities does not spill over into society at large as easily as in Europe, where academic institutions are far more directly controlled and integrated. Besides, it is quite difficult to dissent fundamentally in the present liberal atmosphere of American universities, on a high salary and with easy access to research funds which gush from the rich earth like oil. The restrictions seem painless: say what you like, write what you like, but don't be fool enough to try to roll back modernity. No wonder intellectuals accept the honorable pension of specialization as scientists and institutionalization as professors, and quickly turn against the students when these move on from denouncing Washington to criticizing curricula and faculty authority. “At this point,” says Nathan Glazer, “the university brings nothing of its own to the discussion and understanding of our problems. Students merely become propagandists and recruiters.”

But the future does not look wholly bleak for these intellectuals turned social scientists. In the United States sociologists are beginning to voice demands to participate in the setting of goals as well as the selection of means, in the processing of information and not only the humble gathering of data. As the history of Project Camelot showed, the stirrings of conscience (and they are only stirrings at present) about the sponsorship of research is very much part and parcel of a concern over the use of, and control over, the interpretation of research findings. Of course this demand to participate takes place well within the framework of an unquestioned, fully internalized modernity. Even though intellectuals are being replaced by social scientists in the role of authoritative analysts of society, this role change does not in itself prevent the individual intellectual from becoming a social scientist—providing he accepts the thinning out and limiting of his role. What he may lose in the process, however, is the respect of the embattled community of surviving intellectuals, fighting its rear-guard action to uphold intellectual standards like the Byzantines against the Turks; no profession is held in as much contempt among intellectuals as sociology.

The other area of traditional intellectual concern is social action. Here the intellectual is being outflanked, if not indeed directly replaced. I have long believed that the distinction between men of intellect and men of action is almost certainly false; Christ and Lenin between them have disproved it over a span of nearly 2,000 years. The chances of effective action by intellectuals depend more on circumstances and social situation than on any natural predisposition or psychological make-up. In most revolutionary situations intellectuals have been prominent; even when, like Robespierre, they have not themselves been activists, they have prescribed the parameters of action. The real difference is between intellectuals and bureaucrats, between men of ideas and men of hierarchical power.

But in a situation in which dissent tends to become the negation of abstract modernity, of modern society as such, without any alternative, action loses its remedial purpose, becomes a means without an end. Instead of the clash of ideological alternatives, we now have limited social or political action directed to particular demands and issues—which hardly merit the name of intellectual dissent—or else we have action per se. And though there has recently been a good deal of action per se in the United States and Germany (to mention only two societies) it has significantly not been accompanied by any intellectual expression or support. It is action without benefit of ideology, without any detailed exposition of a case, based on antipathy alone. D. G. MacRae, a well-known if entirely self-appointed interpreter of intellectual attitudes in England (also, incidentally, wedded to the misconception that an intellectual must be a “neutral” scholar and preferably a sociologist) laments the retreat from “the written word” by those who no longer “wish to learn what economics, political science, etc., genuinely have to give” and “repudiate them for passionate commitments.”

Even those few who speak for the rejectors of modern society do so without offering alternatives:

In many ways the situation (but not the political theory) of the Russian anarchists at the turn of the century prefigures the contemporary situation. Then the world of Russia seemed like the whole world but there was, strictly speaking, an alternative beyond the borders of Russia . . . today there is no alternative. The world is a single unit and it has become intolerable.

The writer is John Berger, and his thoughts were triggered off by reflections on the death of Che Guevara. The only form of dissociation from the intolerable modern world, Berger suggests, is the deliberate risk of death—with your eyes open:

His envisaged death is no longer the measure of a servant's loyalty, nor the inevitable end of an heroic tragedy. The eye of death's needle has been closed—there is nothing to thread through it, not even a future (unknown) historical judgment. Provided that he makes no transcendental appeal and provided that he acts out of the maximum possible consciousness of what is knowable to him, his envisaged death has become the measure of the parity which can now exist between the self and the world; it is the measure of his total commitment and his total independence.

The intellectual is reduced, not only to action per se but to the attainment of independence only by such an individual commitment to self-liberation. And how few intellectuals can take this particular path.

This is a curious irony. Those who for the last ten years have triumphantly proclaimed the end of ideology have really deduced a disinterest in revolution from the absence of valid revolutionary ideologies; the end of ideology is essentially a quietist doctrine of popular satisfaction. Though these prophets may have been correct as regards ideology, they have been wrong as regards action. There may be quietism but there is little or no quiet. But not only these supportive sociologists were wrong; the intellectuals were left way behind. A recent commentator on Germany has firmly chastised the intellectuals for their inability to cope with the current activist scene:

What we are faced with today [in Germany] is not communism but revolution. . . . It was not the writers who narrowed the alternative down to such an extreme . . . it was not the writers but the students who first faced up to the alternative and who bear its scars. In the Berlin police pogroms in the summer of this year [1967] the first nuclei of a revolutionary-minded opposition were formed, and it is the students who have begun to build up a political underground press. . . . As for the intellectuals, who for the past twenty years have felt themselves to be the exponents of a radical opposition, the majority of them have a long way to go before they realize the extent either of their defeat or of the political demands which will be made on them in years to come.

In the United States one finds the same widening gap between intellectuals and activists. Neither student protest in American universities nor the militant movement among the urban Negroes is capable of “intellectualization” in the classical sense. It appears that these movements do not seek intellectual support or articulation; that is why the exponents of black power or the student leaders are so difficult to argue with—though the latter at any rate still claim to be seeking verbal confrontation. To refer to them merely as alienated, however, makes no sense either, since to be meaningful alienation posits a notion of eventual and significant reinterpretation. The question should rather be whether the non- or even anti-intellectualism of these phenomena is due to the nature of the movements (as most conservative and Pop sociologists claim), or to the failure or inability of intellectuals to carry out their function of articulating dissent. If the latter, is this a personal failure on the part of a particular generation of intellectuals (as so much liberal intellectual self-criticism suggests), or is it a deeper generic problem connected with the nature of modern society, as I believe? In any case it would seem that the action component of traditional intellectual dissent is being filched away from intellectuals, as also their function of social analysis. The students who flourish Régis Debray's Revolution in the Revolution? carry, not a thoroughly up-to-date version of Marxism but a technical handbook on how to win (or not to win) guerrilla warfare in the South American jungle. What they ask for is not a blueprint for an American utopia but an equivalent handbook for urban North America—at least for purposes of discussion and study.

Everything changes over time: there is no reason why we should necessarily lament the passing of a social type or role in a changing society. The all-purpose intellectual as the conscience of society may have come to the end of his historic role; a complex abstraction does not possess a conscience. Dissent concerned with individual issues and group interests will of course continue; protest, disagreement, competition and demands will not grow less in quantity. But can modern society continue to bring forth dissent based on universal perspectives which carries conviction and has popular appeal whether or not it can be accommodated to existing parties and translated into going social terms? Above all can such dissent be related to action?

The first of these questions is the crucial one. If the classic intellectual type, with his essentially humanistic background, ceases to be socially meaningful in an increasingly scientific or technological society, may we not expect a new generation of critics to emerge from within the scientific community itself? Science has its own universalities; a scientific revolution, like a social or political revolution, consists of the overthrow and replacement of established systems. Hence there is a possibility—to put it no higher—that a scientific society will produce its fundamental scientific dissenters. This is no mere tautology. Hardly any of our politicians, writers or intellectuals—nor even social scientists, for that matter—have the slightest idea what science is about. They all criticize and discuss it from without. But this solution would produce its own problems. We know that economics, the most scientific of the social sciences, is called dismal precisely because its “iron” laws subordinate people and their wishes or needs to the eternal acquisition of scarce values. On the other hand, we also know that some of the most unregenerately and determined humanistic perspectives, like those of Marx, have arisen from within economics, by taking its laws at face value and going on from there. It may well be that some of the social and political dissatisfactions expressed from time to time by scientists indicate not a retreat from scientific perspectives but a nascent impatience with the unscientific or pseudo-scientific application of science and technology to and within society.

Sociology may have a crucial role to play here. The fact that at present the scientific status of sociology is directly related to its support of what is as though it could be no different, may be merely a sign of its immaturity as a discipline. When (and if) we reach a genuinely transformative sociology, a universal critique of existing society may become possible for sociologists. It will have to be based on an understanding of both science and technology—not as dark presences before which to bow like primitive worshipers of lightning and water but as manipulable variables capable of control in various directions. The level of choices would then be upped from small and particular decisions to great and universal ones; societies must be shown to be capable of fundamental reordering in terms of their existing and future technology. Above all, the abstract society will have to be retransformed into a new form of cultural community to which people belong by virtue of a feeling or perception of participation, instead of the present residual membership which consists of holding a passport and reading about oneself in sociological analyses as some kind of social unit.

Translating the dissent of such neo-intellectuals into effective action will require changes in our political and social processes, the nature of which it is quite beyond me to predict. At the moment politics in modern societies are drifting among the exigencies of external and internal demands, with no indication of purpose or direction. It seems to be part of the modern political condition that our rulers prefer to exaggerate the sense of helplessness, thus making legitimate the inexorable demands which the objective situation forces on us, rather than to face the need for disagreeable choice. According to President Johnson, peace in Vietnam entirely depends not on the most powerful society of the world but on one of the smaller, weaker ones. The logic of modernity in that case implies that the weaker one is, the more choices one apparently has—for one has less to lose. But I suspect that political and social processes can always be found to express existing needs, given sufficient pressure. We need a replacement for the almost extinct role of the humanist intellectuals before we need to worry about their means of making their influence effective. Even if they fail in this, their very existence will pose a continuing threat to their society as it has always done in the past.

Of course none of this need happen. We may well continue to drift; instead of a firm chorus of intellectual dissent there will be only isolated and conflicting squeaks which will cancel one another. But in that case we must not be surprised if what is increasingly called anomic action, based on wholesale rejection of the present, continues to suppurate among the young, the poor, the underprivileged. What characterizes this action is lack of ideas. The recommendation to be constructive, with which so-called decent and reasonable people are forever bludgeoning the dissenters, the protesters, the sitters-down and the brandishers of torches, may buy off the intellectuals, but it will not buy off the activists. Hence the liberal canon of more of what we have at present cannot solve their problem.

THE FACT-FINDING CHARADE

SHERWOOD ROSS

Mr. Ross is a Washington public relations consultant, and author of the forthcoming Gruening of Alaska (Popular Library).

Washington

On the night of July 27—at the height of last summer's tragic urban rioting—President Johnson gravely informed the television audience: "We have endured a week such as no nation should live through: a time of violence and tragedy." Then, to "prevent or contain" future disasters, he named his eleven-member bipartisan President's Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

In terms of "containment," Mr. Johnson also instructed Defense Secretary McNamara to post new riot-control training standards to the National Guard, whose performance in Newark was needlessly brutal. And, to strengthen prevention, he set aside the following Sunday as a national day of worship.

The President's concerns were well founded. From Newark to Watts, the ghettos were ablaze—and more fires were to come—107 outbursts of varying intensity in just one summer. Detroit, portions of which resembled bombed-out Berlin, contained $1 billion worth of charred, ruined property, and the dead numbered forty-three. In Newark, twenty-six died, 1,200 were injured, 1,300 arrested and property damage amounted to $10 million.

To head his panel, (promptly dubbed the "riot commission") the President picked the loyal, amiable Democratic Governor of Illinois, Otto Kerner. New York's Republican Mayor John Lindsay was named vice chairman; four other members were drawn from Congress, and one each from labor, business, state government, law enforcement and the civil rights movement. Two of the group, Sen. Edward Brooke (R., Mass.) and NAACP Executive Secretary Roy Wilkins are Negro moderates.

Even before it went to work, the commission was attacked by responsible Negro leaders who grumbled that the White House already knew the "why" and "how" of riots and had only to invest its treasure on an unprecedented scale. (As early as 1963, the National Urban League had appealed for a domestic Marshall Plan to remake "seething ghetto cauldrons" into habitable communities. This prophetic warning of unrest went unheeded, as did later appeals by A. Philip Randolph for a "Freedom Budget" and two like requests made at the June, 1966, White House Conference on Civil Rights by CORE's Floyd McKissick and NAACP's Herbert Hill.)

It was the White House conference, widely scorned as a semantic exercise, that produced the first public disenchantment of black leaders with the Administration's sluggish anti-poverty pace. Their suspicion that the new riot panel would be another do-nothing body was increased by a New York Times report alleging that Mr. Johnson had tried to talk Mayor Lindsay and Pittsburgh's Mayor Barr out of convening the first "Urban Coalition" meeting in Washington, lest it take the play from the Presidential board. The mayors denied the tale but, as one NEA dispatch noted, Negro leaders felt the President's "institutionalized efforts to deal with racial turbulence, through first the White House Conference and now the Commission, are designed mainly to take some of the political heat out of the issue."

Even though President Johnson told his panel, "this matter is far, far too important for politics," the business press early raised cries of "manipulation." The Wall Street Journal hinted that Governor Kerner did not operate unguided by Chicago's powerful Mayor Richard J. Daley, and quoted one Kerner detractor who branded him "a namby-pamby cream puff." Other voices, overlooking the appointment of sociologists to do commission staff work, criticized the White House for failing to name a sociologist to the board, calling it too inexperienced, too unresponsive and incapable of a blue-ribbon in-depth investigation."

Ignoring these slurs, the commission set up shop. David Ginsburg, a liberal attorney with good marks as a Johnson booster, was made executive director. By September, his hastily assembled staff of ninety-eight professionals and half as many office helpers was packed into a narrow government building just up 16th Street from the White House. Difficulties quickly beset it, some deriving from instructions given it to present an interim report by March 1, 1968, and a final report by July 29.

These deadlines did not allow time for careful selection of personnel. Black and brown faces were noticeably absent from policy-making jobs. Ginsburg and his deputy, Victor H. Palmieri, worked hard "but they just don't know Negroes," one veteran government observer mourned. On one occasion, Palmieri (on leave from the presidency of a land development company) told a California Tomorrow conference that Negroes should be resettled in "new black suburban towns." This gaffe, which might have come from the editorial page of Muhammad Speaks, was slapped down by another panelist, Negro Assemblyman Willie Brown, who said he preferred San Francisco, thank you.

Lack of time was also reflected in the quality of staff work. A six-man team spent just three days in Dayton quizzing city officials. After spending ninety minutes with the group, Mayor Dave Hall remarked, "They're just groping for answers as we are." Persistent reports say staff investigators got nowhere in their talks with militants, who dubbed it "the fink commission." Instead of using the findings of the FBI, Ginsburg's staff recklessly ate up time and money retracing old ground.

Obviously unaware of these goings-on, Katherine Peden, Kentucky Commerce Commissioner and a member of the President's commission, told an audience in her state, "the commission feels no need for additional research," but would take what had "already been done to provide a program of action." About the same time,

Lindsay pledged that the staff would use "every research device known to man." And, even though J. Edgar Hoover last August 1 scotched rumors that a nation-wide conspiracy underlay the riots, Kerner hired CIA veteran Milan C. Miskovsky "to supervise inquiries into whether planning or conspiracy was involved." Not only did Ginsburg's gumshoes, by Kerner's admission, fail to find any plotting but their main contribution as to causes was the same tired record of "jobs, housing and education." This prompted Kerner on September 25 to tell the Chicago Tribune: "I've listened a lot and not heard anything new."

The manner of its funding was a third brake on commission performance. Lacking a budget of its own, it got a $100,000 dole from the President's Emergency Fund and contributions of $150,000 each from six federal agencies. This was hardly "all the support and cooperation" which the White House had led it to believe it would get.

In mid-December, morale was rocked by the firing of nineteen academicians who had thought they were retained for a year. Simultaneously, forty other staffers were told that their services would be terminated February 1. Commission press officer Alan Spivak put out the word that the dismissals were routine "administrative phasing out," but it was a fact that Ginsburg, struggling to pare costs, did not have to request a supplemental appropriation.

Some of those dropped claimed that Ginsburg had swung the ax because of their political views, not from budgetary concerns. Precisely what happened is the subject of some dispute, but the best information is that those cut had favored a strong condemnation of white racism and had urged sweeping and costly proposals to rectify ghetto ills, including a guaranteed annual wage. Such views were set forth in a 180-page staff paper,

"Harvest of Racism," by Harvard sociologist Gary T. Marx and others. It conceded that riots had a positive aspect if all legitimate channels of expression were clogged by racism and if the violence goaded municipalities into overdue reforms.

To reporters' suggestions that Ginsburg had suppressed "Harvest of Racism" on White House orders, Kerner bristled, "I don't know how the White House could ask us to tone it up or down—they haven't seen it." But the New York Post reported that his staff had checked in with White House Press Secretary George Christian and special aide Joseph A. Califano, Jr. Scoring the Administration for "phasing out the panel before its work is completed," Rep. William F. Ryan (D., N.Y.) insisted:

The commission's staff has reached the conclusion that vast sums of money must be expended to even make a dent on our impacted urban problem, and that this is viewed as politically inopportune. . . . The expenditure of $30 billion a year on war has created a climate where a Presidential commission must be muffled, lest it recommend a national effort of equal importance.

If far-reaching solutions to the riots seemed to be foundering, the commission early made public two recommendations of the "crime in the streets" variety: it urged the desegregation and beefed-up training of National Guard units, and a series of high-level parleys on riot control for city officials, particularly police chiefs, conducted by the Justice Department. Ghetto dwellers began to feel they were getting the message and soon branded the "riot commission" anti-Negro. Thus, when Mayor Lindsay and Senator Harris arranged to meet fifteen Black Nationalists in a top-secret session in a Midwestern slum, their conferees arrived dressed in African shirts, togas and neck amulets, refused to shake hands, and accused the two commissioners of "wasting our time." Predicting that the next riots would spawn guerrilla raids on public utilities and urban expressways, the group stalked out.

To improve their grasp of the urban crisis, the commission heard in closed session no fewer than 130 witnesses and amassed a pile of testimony higher than a tenement roof, much of it painfully familiar to sociologists. Illustrations: Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., pleads for $20 billion a year for twenty years from Washington; Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty dubs federal grants "the quickest way to avert urban disorders"; historian Lerone Bennett accuses America of "a double standard of justice"; Mayor Thomas Whelan of Jersey City pins the riots on "agitators"; University of Michigan sociologist Albert Reiss says Northern slum cops can be bigots; Omaha black militant Ernie Chambers says the cop is "a paid and hired murderer"; AFL-CIO President George Meany calls for a million federal jobs (but bristles when counsel Merle McCurdy asks him about Jim Crow in the building trades); Father James Groppi says Milwaukee federal aid should be cut as long as racist housing persists; and Mayor Maier, who knows sacrilege when he hears it, labels Groppi a "grandstander."

From the closed hearings, reporters were leaked the hardly sensational tale that "the unresponsiveness of city governments," not conspiracy, had triggered the riots. Though Spivak branded the leaks "speculative" and "premature," the panel, willy-nilly, pinned the tail on the municipal donkey. (Newark is "a dead city," one newsman was told; but Kerner's ally, the Mayor of Chicago, was hailed for "a first-rate job" of getting block captains to hear grievances.) Incidentally, few will bet that the commission's March 1 report will come down as hard on the "unresponsiveness of the federal government." Instead, the Administration's shortcomings are apt to be passed off with Kerner's cliché about "making federal aid more effective." New York Times correspondent Tom Wicker summed up the "leak" neatly:

The commission's inquiries have left no doubt that the Negro ghetto is at the end of the line in every respect. Its garbage is collected least efficiently and often, snow remains longer on its streets, the police are less solicitous of its residents and their security, much less their civil rights and liberties, its schools are the worst and its housing is abominable.

Armed with this belated intelligence, the commissioners could not agree on meaningful corrective steps. However, Kerner disclosed that owing to the "urgency" of the urban crisis, the commission would combine the "interim report" and the final report (it had been planned for release in May) into one combined effort to be issued March 1, "ahead of schedule."

Skeptics charge that, issued in March, the "final" report will come too late to influence the Presidential budget for fiscal 1969—splattered as it is with red ink for Vietnam. They say the March date comes early enough to shower cooling promises of relief on ghetto dwellers, but fear that such pledges are unlikely to carry price tags that might upset white taxpayers in an election year.

Just how far the commissioners will go toward the shaping of concrete, dollars-and-cents proposals remains conjecture. Reportedly, they split along liberal-conservative lines over whether (1) the government should become the employer of last resort; (2) money should be put directly into the hands of the poor; (3) ghetto public schools should be decentralized; (4) "community corporations" should be set up to let ghetto dwellers govern themselves; and (5) the white suburban housing noose should be loosened by federal edict.

These items are being worked on at the eleventh hour to avoid a minority report. Spokesmen for the Congressmen on the panel vigorously affirm their freedom to act without Presidential constraint, and one booster of Mayor Lindsay, who has led the liberal wing in the deliberations, has said: "He isn't in anybody's pocket. He'll say what he likes." However, under the direction of consultant Kermit Gordon, president of the Brookings Institution and a "Johnson Fellow," the final draft is said to have been watered down to a dilution acceptable to conservatives Peden, McCullough and Thornton.

Washington observers believe that whatever its philosophic view and educational value, the panel will have little, if any, immediate effect on riots. They say the nation requires more than the "education" which staffers claim the report will provide. The hot summer, they note, has already dawned—three students were killed and thirty-four other persons injured during February riots sparked by attempts to integrate a bowling alley snack bar in Orangeburg, S.C.

Moreover, the commission failed to denounce the elaborate preparations under way in many police departments to suppress new riots with armed cars and guns that fire explosive bullets.

In the hope of warding off such violence, which the President on February 12 conceded is unavoidable ("all we can do is the best we can with the resources we have"), Dr. King is mapping a massive, nonviolent crusade to tie up Washington next April. King's goal is to win for the anti-poverty war the critical sums which the advisory panel is liable to overlook. He sees his drive as the last chance to douse smoldering rebellions through affirmative steps. If the Presidential panel prescribes such remedies, and Congress swiftly implements them, fewer clashes might erupt this summer. But it is a slender hope that the commission will recommend a massive plan of action. As columnist Clayton Fritchey observed, the commission's real purpose has been "to stall while giving the appearance of doing something." If that was what the President wanted, he has succeeded admirably. Added to the heaps of recommendations left over from the White House conference of 1966 will be the slapdash multi-phased generalizations of the riot commission of 1968—President Johnson's $1-million charade.

Coming Next Week

JAPAN AND THE UNITED STATES

The third round of an international misunderstanding
by Walter LaFeber

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Portrait of the Artist in Middle Age

GIACOMO JOYCE. By James Joyce. Edited by Richard Ellmann. The Viking Press. 64 pp. 4 full-scale facsimilies, 12 reduced facsimilies. Limited edition. $10.

ANTHONY BURGESS

Mr. Burgess is an English critic, novelist and author of many books of which the latest published in the United States is The Novel Now. He is also the author of Re Joyce, a study of James Joyce (both W. W. Norton.)

To Joyce a name was always a kind of hat—the soft kind a low comedian might wear, to be pulled down over the ears, bashed, battered, karate-dented, feather-duster-plumed, inverted, colandered with bullet holes. In Ulysses, Bloom becomes Boom, Stoom, Bloohoom and a whole paragraph of anagrams. In Finnegans Wake, Shem the Penman (the author himself) is everything from Shun the Punman to Shame's Voice. When, in his Trieste days, James temporarily became Giacomo, it was no mere chameleon-assimilation to his background: there was always a comic point to the onomastic madhatterdom. Ever since Giacomo Casanova, a Giacomo has been an extravagant or pretentious lover. In the middle of the road of his life, the expatriate Irishman, proved author but not yet famous, pseudo-husband and genuine father, teacher, toper and ragged dandy, conceived a sad passion for a pretty girl. It was a passion not to be discharged in the respectable Trieste of 1914: its only catharsis was a literary one. Hence this tiny book.

It is late in being published, but we cannot complain. It is not really a part of the serious Joyce oeuvre—an essay in private onanism, rather, and at the same time one of those portals of discovery that Stephen Dedalus talked about, ten years earlier, in the Dublin National Library. It is no mere scrapbook, however: Joyce wrote it out fair, and the meticulous holograph is reproduced in this volume. He evidently saw much merit in it, but not enough to save it from his own pillaging. Its literary, as opposed to biographical, interest lies in its being the source of some of the ironical fine writing in A Portrait and Ulysses. Richard Ellmann, who has edited it and given it a perceptive, though certainly overlaudatory, introduction, shows in his notes how far Joyce drew on it for his great public literature. This was the middle of one road, but it was the start of another. Giacomo Joyce is indeed the "discovery of a new form of imaginative expression."

In his superb biography of Joyce, Ellmann gave us a few fragments of this small work, together with a considerably full account of the palpitations which occasioned it. Joyce earned his living in Trieste by teaching English, and the unattainable beloved was one of his pupils. He went to her house on the Via San Michele to give her lessons, and any shy man who has worked as private tutor to an attractive girl will know the special tantalizings of such a relationship—the nearness and farness, the opportunities for hopeless physical contemplation, the piquancy of desires which are near incestuous, the intimacy which touches everything except the erotic. Experto crede.

Joyce describes her, and his own feelings, in hot, quick gushes of poetic prose, separated by ample blank spaces which suggest the languor of recovery after self-indulgence. "Who? A pale face surrounded by heavy odorous furs. Her movements are shy and nervous. She uses quizzing-glasses." She is Jewish. "Rounded and ripened: rounded by the lathe of intermarriage and ripened in the forcing-house of the seclusion of her race." The preoccupation with Jewesses, exotic, mysterious, promising a voluptuousness far beyond the meager bestowings of suburban Catholic colleens—this is a theme that goes back to "A Little Cloud" in Dubliners and achieves a reconciliation with availability in Molly Bloom, who is both exotic and home grown. Joyce's observation has a kind of delirious acuity: "The long eyelids beat and lift: a burning needleprick stings and quivers in the velvet iris." But fancy supervenes (the fancy of Bloom in Nighttown) in "Papa and the girls sliding downhill, astride of a toboggan: the Grand Turk and his harem." The reality of desire is purged in mock romanticism, even in mock Wardour Street: "There is one below would speak with your ladyship . . . Hillo! Ostler! Hilloho! . . . Nay, nay, be not afraid!"

Is the mockery of middle-aged lust sufficient? Hardly. Its enclosure by the gentle derision of the title and the Dedalus sneer of the envoi—"Love me, love my umbrella"—is not appropriate to the mezzo del cammin; they are, in fact, relevant only to the awkward, arrogant young man of ten years earlier. Nearly all the pillagings are for him. Meeting his beloved's father, Giacomo says: "Ignatius Loyola, make haste to help me!" and so does Stephen in the National Library. Trieste "wakes rawly" and "Belluomo rises from the bed of his wife's lover's wife" only to become, and

KEEPING THE LIGHT OUT

When lines went down we camped in the kitchen, nailed blankets to the walls and doors;
bedding down on the frozen floor was cave dwelling: woodstove for heat and light; red things that flickered on the walls were real shapes rampant every night.

The storm went on hissing, snow hungry over windows upstairs, a dangerous country:
toilet bowls cracking apart, banking snow sifting through plaster and board and we heard every night white shapes moving in overhead and each day we sank deeper underground.

When neighbors broke in they found us shy, suspicious, a small tribe blinking, packed in the closed dark.
They told of a hot sun that burned for days, how the land for miles was glazed thick over lakes of snow outside.

DOUGLAS LAWDER

be transferred to. Stephen's Paris of 1903. Bloom and Stephen come together only in a rapture of sensuous disgust—"sour reek of armpits, nozzled oranges, melting breast ointments"—which proclaims that both are sexual adolescents. Blazes Boylan, who buys "shamefaced peaches" for Molly, streaks across in "shameful peaches with torn leaves." And the reconciliation of adolescent and mature man is effected in scraps of poetry which, used in Pomes Penyeach, could as well have been used in Chamber Music: "A flower given by her to my daughter. Frail gift, frail giver, frail blue-veined child."

What James Joyce was learning as Giacomo was a prose technique suitable for the Stephen of Ulysses. This Stephen is in many ways younger than the mature voyager of the final pages of A Portrait. He has learning ("Che coltura!" cries the beloved's classmate, hearing Giacomo hold forth on Stephen's favorite authors —from Swedenborg to Joachim Abbas), but he is emotionally upset. He has lost a mother and disowned a father, and a Jew called (like Giacomo's beloved's father) Leopold must come along and, as the "new womanly man," supply the office of both parents.

Giacomo, in his 30s, no longer feels an orphan, so he must fabricate a new kind of loss. He pretends to be too old (and him only 31) to pay court to a buxom, shortsighted Jewess: what follows is romantically extravagant enough for a young poet with a floppy tie and a Hamlet hat. At the same time he looks forward to his ultimate hero, Earwicker—genuinely married, genuinely middle-aged, and genuinely dreaming of incest. What is that scraping noise? It is the sound of sharpening pencils. The index cards are being shuffled, the next load of theses aches to be realized. This very slim volume is going to have a lot to answer for.

since discarded as incurably evil; there could only be education for a future in which the word "I" would be replaced by "we."

Primarily a thinker and teacher, Brecht demanded that the writer entertain while he instructs. Ewen, also a born teacher, has enthrallingly carried out this dictum, and without any of the embroidery or gossip that so many biographers consider indispensable. By themselves, the public facts of Brecht's odyssey, as Ewen presents them, make one feel that he has come into a fortune. As remarkable as his scholarship is the modest manner with which he conjures it out of sight, enabling us to enjoy quite effortlessly the distillation of his years of study and reflection.

In a few masterly pages at the beginning he describes the German universe of the mind in which Brecht's meteor appeared. He does this so simply, yet so vividly, that all at once connections appear between phenomena that may have seemed only adventitiously associated. A veil is lifted: the constellations of the last century—political, philosophical and literary—gave rise in their shifting orbits to the basic mental attitudes that underlay fascism and anti-fascism. The contradictory role of Nietzsche here is fascinating, for he was an ancestor of both. Brecht's contemporary, the poet Gottfried Benn, found his way, Ewen tells us, straight from a Wilhelmian "heroic" nihilism to the somewhat less heroic nihilism of Hitler. "He fused Nietzsche, the macabre elements of Baudelaire, and the anti-rationalism that ran like some mysterious underground stream throughout German thought."

There is a startling similarity between Benn's much quoted, "Oh, that we were our first ancestors, a lump of slime in a warm swamp!" and Brecht's cry in Baal: "O you, who have been driven both from heaven and hell—you murderers, whom great ill has befallen, why did you not stay in your mothers' wombs where it was quiet, and one slept, and was?" The difference is that Brecht wrote his "hymn to dissolution" (as Ewen calls it) when he was 20; at 28 he was studying Das Kapital; whereas the mature Benn's quest for Nirvana "was not to be satisfied until he heard the call of blood and soil, and could bury his weary head in the bosom of National Socialism."

One of the many virtues of this biography is a choice of quotations so felicitous that a lazy reader might easily imagine he now knew all about Brecht and could dispense with the actual works. Another reader, encountering such samples as this dialogue from The Visions of Simone Machard, will be restless until he has got his hands on a complete edition of Brecht. (A play of the French

The Restoration of Brecht

BERTOLT BRECHT, HIS LIFE, HIS ART, AND HIS TIMES. By Frederic Ewen. The Citadel Press. 573 pp. $10.

EDITH ANDERSON

Miss Anderson lived for many years in both parts of Germany, and was until recently Berlin correspondent for the National Guardian.

Ever since 1956 when, being dead, Brecht could no longer defend himself, two extremist groups of disciples have been presuming to immortalize him in their own image. The ferocity of their academic tug of war brings to mind Aesop's fable of the man with two wives, a young one who pulled out each new gray hair as soon as she espied it, and an old one who jealously snatched out the remaining black ones.

Was Brecht's true self the wild, nihilistic youth with piercing eyes whose rebellion against society, as expressed in his first play Baal, took the form, to quote Frederic Ewen, of a "fecal and erotic anti-humanism"?

Or was the real Brecht the mature Marxist who in his last years made Socialist Germany his headquarters and attempted to rework his early plays in the spirit of his later convictions? Was the political Brecht thereby doing violence to the Olympian Brecht who, with Shakespeare, would transcend the judgment of his times? When some of his plays were sharply criticized by the Socialist Unity Party, did Brecht regret having elected to live in the German Democratic Republic instead of in Switzerland or Austria (West Germany, with its unreconstructed Nazis being obviously impossible)?

The great thing about Frederic Ewen's luminous biography is that it gently frees Brecht from the bear hugs of the bigots and restores him to us as a whole man, his youth contained in his age, his age in his youth, as is the case with all of us. "Don't goggle so romantically," said the placards he had posted in the Munich theatre where his second play Drums in the Night was put on. There had never been a starry-eyed Brecht who could crash to disillusionment, but only—as early as Drums in the Night, when he was 24—the realist who aimed to dispel emotional fogs and stimulate revolutionary thinking through a dramatic method he called Verfremdung, variously translated as "alienation," "estrangement" (Ewen's word), and "de-familiarization" (used by Brecht's co-worker Elizabeth Hauptmann).

True, Brecht had hoped on returning from exile to make his theatre a bridge between the two Germanys, but in the total political cleavage that followed World War II he soon recognized that such a hope had become illusory. Undeniably he had his heartaches and was impatient, as Ewen writes, "with the survival of so much of the old in the new state . . . Again and again, he returns to his favorite exhortation: Teachers, learn from your pupils! Leaders, learn from the people! Do not strain the truth too greatly, and listen while you are speaking." For Brecht there could be no return to a capitalism he had long Resistance little known in the United States, Simone Machard is the story of a deformed young girl, slavey in an inn, who fancies herself as the Maid of Orleans and tries to save her town from the Germans).

SIMONE (to the Angel). Shall we still fight on when the enemy has already won?

ANGEL. Will the wind blow in the night?

SIMONE. Yes.

ANGEL. Is there a tree in the yard?

SIMONE. Yes. A poplar.

ANGEL. Do the leaves rustle in the wind?

SIMONE. Yes, distinctly.

ANGEL. Then one must fight on, even if the enemy has won.

Does this sound like Verfremdung? Scarcely. On the question of the master's frequent neglect of his own dramatic theories, Ewen has much to say that is new and refreshing. His appreciation of Brecht's "epic" theatre and style of "estrangement" does not prevent his considering the Stanislavski method equally valid, although Brecht rejected it outright. He quotes Brecht himself as saying, "The devil take it! Naturally we must have on the stage of a realistic theatre live, rounded, contradictory people, with all their passions, their direct expressions, and actions. The stage is no herbarium or a zoological museum with stuffed animals."

In his chapter about the epic theatre Ewen also introduces some insights of his own on tragedy, which compel him to find a new category for Brecht's plays. Tragedy in the classic sense, seeing man as "caught up in an ineluctable struggle with transcendent forces," is generally alleged to be defunct today. Ewen would redefine it as that form of dramatic art that displays the frustrated search for freedom in an unfree world." On the other hand, the German philosopher Ernst Bloch has written that pity and terror are replaced today by defiance and hope, and by an element of "joyfulness" in the discovery of the new, the creative, the socially useful, no matter what the cost. In this light, Ewen feels that none of Brecht's plays can be regarded as tragedies; he prefers to define even the most devastating ones, such as Mother Courage, as "serious comedies."

Ewen has a way of presenting happenings that were young decades ago so that we relate to them in a flash, feeling them in their historical context as we feel (because they are we) the happenings of our own day—which is, after all, only a later and more agonized stage of Brecht's. Here is an evening in Augsburg on the banks of the Lech, when Brecht was young, described by his friend, H. O. Münsterer:

orange, and finally violet. Below us, We sat on the ground, Bert, Otto Müller and I. The sky is high up, wide and gorgeously blue, slowly turning the glass-like, white-spumed river and far away the dark silhouette of the city with its towers and gables. The grass is wet with dew. Brecht sang.

"There they sat, dreaming of the Ganges," Ewen adds quietly, and says no more about it. Without belaboring the point, Ewen has made us visualize our

Princess of the Underground

THE DIARY OF ANAIS NIN. Edited and with an Introduction by Gunther Stuhlmann. Harcourt, Brace & World and The Swallow Press jointly. Vol. I: 368 pp. Vol. II: 357 pp. $6.95 each.

DANIEL STERN

Mr. Stern is a novelist and critic whose most recent book is After the War (Putnam). His new novel, The Suicide Academy, will be published in the fall by McGraw-Hill.

The main problems of modern art have not changed since the 19th century. Realism or some form of anti-realism—this is still the question at the center of the artist's choice of method. From Zola to William Burroughs, how to deal with an experience grown increasingly monstrous and fantastic remains the heart of the matter.

One way to seduce ourselves into a method is to deify Experience. If the twenties exalted the imagination and the unconscious there is no doubt that in the fifties and sixties we elevate raw Experience. This is what happened, we say, not what has been merely imagined. Reality not fantasy. We have learned to distrust inventions, artificial constructs, artistic conclusions drawn from experience rendered as if it were fact when the reader and the writer both know it is a fiction—therefore false.

This has led contemporary writing into a double dead end. On the one hand there has been a flowering of nonfiction that has spilled over into fictional art, giving us the so-called "nonfiction novel." On the other hand there are the new Grotesques—books that have a close kinship with the surreal writing of the twenties. Here reality (experience) is acknowledged as simply untenable and is replaced by a landscape as imaginary as an early Chirico painting. (I am ignoring the overlay of what has been called Black Humor—because that is about as new as Gargantua and Pantagruel or Tyl Eulenspiegel.)

Such problems are as classic as the problem of the adjustment of human own long-haired young friends poring over Indian philosophy, sitting at the feet of Ravi Shankar and Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, dreaming with kaleidoscope eyes of love in a world of hate. Perhaps with the help of this biography some of them may wonder whether the Ganges is really where it's at; for if anyone closed the generation gap it was Brecht, who never ceased to be a rebel, even against his own pronouncements.

personality. Every child must choose how much reality and how much fantasy to use in his sense of the world—and in his attempts to overcome it by work, art, love and/or neurosis: in short by his life style.

The history of style in art has similar roots. I suggest that the easy out of the nonfiction novel and the self-indulgence of latter-day Surrealism are both false solutions in today's terms. A unique demonstration of this is to be found in the artistic and spiritual journey of

NATIONAL COUNCIL TOURS 1968

Tour 1 April 18-May 9
$825—all inclusive.
Leningrad—Moscow—Kiev
Tbilisi—Yerevan

Tour 2 July 18-Aug 9
$995—all inclusive
Leningrad—Moscow—Irkutsk
Lake Baikal—Novosibirsk
Bratsk—Akademgorodok

Tour 3 July 18-Aug 9
$795—all inclusive
Leningrad—Moscow—Kiev
Volga River Trip to Rostov
Ulyanovsk and Volgograd

Tour 4 Sept 18-Oct 9
$850—all inclusive
Leningrad—Moscow—Kiev
Baku—Yerevan

Tour 5 July 16-Aug 6
$825—all inclusive
Leningrad—Moscow—Kiev
Riga—Copenhagen

Write to Travel Committee
NATIONAL COUNCIL OF AMERICAN-SOVIET FRIENDSHIP
156 FIFTH AVE. N.Y. 10010
(212) YU 9-6677

Anaïs Nin, whose recently published Diaries (Vols. I and II) are landmarks in the century's struggle to deal with its experience and with its art.

From the early thirties all the way through the fifties Anaïs Nin was the Princess of the Underground long before there was such a glamorous and dubious cultural stratum. Her five-volume novel Cities of the Interior is a prose/poetry dream; a lyrical celebration of the inner life and the images it evokes. Springing from the roots of the experimentalism of the twenties they are tender, lyrical and possessed of a feminine vision raised to the highest power. Once, in conversation, Miss Nin said to a friend: "In my books I have built a wall between the reader and myself. In the Diaries I have broken that wall down." This is a modern statement. Breaking those walls down is, after all, what so much of modern writing is all about.

Another reason why the impossible word "modern" applies is that these Diaries are involved with that most modern of drives: obsession. But the obsession is not a matter of describing obsessive material. The obsession is the Diaries themselves. For most of her life, starting when she was 8, Miss Nin carried these Diaries with her everywhere—her other self. At first, as with all addictions, it was pleasant and harmless. But by the time she was living in Paris and enjoying a very special vie de bohème of the early thirties with such pals as Henry Miller, the Freudian rebel Otto Rank, the mad genius of the modern theatre, Antonin Artaud, the Diaries had swelled to thousands of pages—and were struggling with her other "artistic" work for her attention. For—some of her friends believed—her very soul.

At the end of Volume I we read: "This Diary is my kief, Hashish and opium pipe. This is my drug and my vice. . . . I can turn away from reality and into the reflections and dreams it projects, and this driving, impelling fever which keeps me tense and wide-awake during the day is dissolved in improvisations, in contemplations. I must relive my life in the dream. The dream is my only life. . . . Otherwise life shows its deformities and homeliness becomes rust. My drug. Covering all things with a mist of smoke, deforming and transforming as the night does. . . ."

The conflict is always between reality and the dream—between the ice-clear day and the mists of night. But one of the great charms of reading these Diaries is the discovery that the artist has made another choice than she thinks. While adoring the night and its special magics she has created the clarity of time (from 1931 to 1939), the lyrical but utterly specific poetics of place (Paris, New York, Louveciennes, the French suburb where she made her home, Tangier—The Villa Seurat where she found an apartment for Henry Miller—the Seine houseboat on which she made her home in the late thirties), and best of all she has created one of the most magnificent sets of characters to appear in any contemporary work of art.

None of these is presented with the distortions, the derangements of sense that characterize the "night works" of the surreal. Yet she has undoubtedly "created" Henry Miller, in her reading a kind of latter-day François Villon who steals razor blades and cares only about writing and his first wife, June—who, in Miss Nin's delineation is worth a book all to herself: mercurial, beautiful, allergic to truth, insistent on being loved. (Her presence and absence dominates the first volume as the presence and absence of Albertine dominates those transformed Diaries of Proust.) There is Otto Rank and Dr. Allendy, the tormented analyst she consulted and who, like the others, tried to wean her from her obsession with the Diary. All of them—time, place, character—are presented in a supple and evocative prose. Both volumes are sprinkled with superb set pieces. Even a minor encounter is treated with style and illuminates. As, for example, the author's visit with Zadkine, the sculptor of wood figures:

We went to his little house behind an apartment house in the Rue d'Assas. There are two small houses with a garden between them. In one he lives with his Russian wife; in the other are his sculptures. . . . The different qualities of the woods, the grains showing, the various tones, weights, make one feel there is much of the tree left in them. . . . Women carved out of bamboo . . . faces cut in two by the sculptor's knife, showing two sides forever separate, eternally two-faced. Truncated undecagonal figures, in veined and vulnerable woods, fragments of bodies . . . armless and headless. . . . In the center of these figures, Zadkine, small, rosy-skinned, with a round face like a boy, hair tousled, always laughing, joking, mischievous.

His small, quick gestures, his ironic expression, his red cheeks, give him something of a handsome clown, a handsome monkey. His humor and joy are so strong, tinted with philosophy, he says gaily such profound things, his sculptures so ponderous and haunting, that one seeks in vain for the affiliation between his carving and his delight . . . he carves prisons yet he himself laughs within them as if they were part of a game.

Thus a portrait of a man and a Portrait of the Artist. In fact, Miss Nin is so much the novelist that the "others" in her Diary are as real as the "I"—a rare occurrence in such documents. Antonin Artaud, the original theoretician of the Theater of Cruelty, with whom Miss Nin had one of the strangest love affairs possible: her father, the pianist and composer who deserted her and her mother and returned, years later: subtle portrait of the Artist as Peacock—of a man who was never meant to be a father struggling with belated fatherhood. All of them have the density of fully imagined characters—none of the thinness of "mere" life. The artist has here tampered with reality; and reality has been the beneficiary.

Throughout both volumes there is the struggle of two styles. Night versus day; inner versus outer. She even turns Henry Miller onto a new dream style which he eagerly takes up. And there are numerous entries that are loose and lyrical in the pejorative sense in which the word "feminine" is sometimes used. But these are always balanced by a taut sense of reality—and an elegance of diction which never allows her to become sentimental. The inner and the outer, the day and the nighttime style of living and of feeling are, at Miss Nin's best, merged. And her best is characteristic of most of the Diaries. In them she has solved some of the most pressing problems of the modern artist. How real must reality be—how does one deal with the dark side, the surreal side of living (which is present as much in Homer as it is in Norman Mailer)? After a brilliant scene in which she and a friend observe a psychiatrist questioning recently admitted lunatics, the author and her friend stroll away from the Palais de Justice and she muses: "Would human beings ever learn the

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 3-4-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

meaning of symbolism? Poets and dreamers and madmen, using a language that was clear, clear. . . . A language necessary to the life below our consciousness."

In her life work, these Diaries (15,000 pages long in their entirety, from which these 700 or so pages have been culled), Anaïs Nin has answered that question of long ago. It is a question, by the way, that in 1937 seemed very much ■■ urgent, contemporary one. And, after something of a respite in the forties and fifties it is again being considered as central.

What these Diaries teach us is that the way to the subterranean caverns of the spirit may be approached by the artistic manipulation of our daytime language. Reality is never as real as we think. Nor is dislocated language necessarily illuminative. (On the contrary, the road opened by Ulysses is still wide open while Finnegans Wake was never anything but a magnificent dead end.) There is something to be learned as well as enjoyed in reading this Odyssey of a young Spanish Catholic girl whose father deserted her and who went on to ■ richly textured life as ■ writer, a psychoanalyst, as well as companion and spiritual midwife to some of the finest artists of the century.

We learn that the world of the grotesque and that of the proportionate may meet in the medium of elegant and accessible language. We learn, too (as perhaps the author learned), that magic happens while coffee is being drunk; that the dream is coeval with the bright sun at noontime; that an obsession with recording reality need not be at odds with the creation of other worlds; that we need give up neither reality nor fantasy in our lives nor in our art—if our imagination has enough of the necessary courage. It is precisely that imaginative courage that shines through the artistic achievement of these monumental Diaries.

Hitchcocks." Truffaut objected, "That's not what I was getting at. I hoped you might defend the picture." "Impossible," Hitchcock remarked. "I don't feel that strongly about it."

These conversations provide ■ lively exposition of the filmic art. We share a problem with Hitchcock and Truffaut, consider how it might be solved, remember how Hitchcock solved it, and wonder whether he was right. We might disagree with his answers, especially if we have seen them on the screen, but will surely find pleasure in seeing how he jigsawed a movie into a coherent unit.

According to Truffaut, Hitchcock has created a film form that is also his film content. While his cinema is not necessarily "exalting," Truffaut notes, "it invariably enriches us" through "the terrifying lucidity with which it denounces man's desecrations of beauty and purity." More than likely, however, what Hitchcock does is supposed to justify itself because he does it so well so much of the time.

Through Hitchcock's good-natured candor in responding to Truffaut's inquiries, we become aware of the imaginative precision that a director needs in rendering a mood concrete. Little touches are vital. To make a supposedly poisoned glass of milk become the focus of audience attention, he highlights the drink with a bulb hidden inside the glass. To warn us that a train is bringing a murderer home to his unsuspecting relatives, he arranges for heavy, devilishly black smoke to pour from the locomotive and engulf the station. To climax a passionate moment between the hero and heroine in the sleeping car of another train, he uses the train as a "most impudent" phallic symbol rushing into a tunnel.

Opposed to motion pictures that are "photographs of people talking," Hitchcock believes that a movie is a failure if a dramatic weakness can be overcome

The Shriek & the Sheik

HITCHCOCK. By François Truffaut (in collaboration with Helen G. Scott). Simon & Schuster. 258 pp. $10.

VALENTINO. By Irving Shulman. Trident Press. 499 pp. $6.95.

JACK LEAVITT

Mr. Leavitt is a practicing attorney in the San Francisco Bay Area and a member of the Mystery Writers of America.

In the same year that Alfred Hitchcock converted a Jack the Ripper novel into his first "true Hitchcock" film, Rudolph Valentino's business associates were perfecting a more specialized art form, that of transforming the corpse of the once vibrant sheik into box-office bullion. Ever since that year (1926), Valentino's ghost and Hitchcock's victims have remained in the public eye. Needless to say, the eye is a receptacle for motes as well as beams. The ballyhoo about these men often has no relationship to their achievements.

With Hitchcock, we have the printed record of a dialogue between two renowned film directors—Truffaut and Hitchcock—who are both critical admirers of Hitchcock's work. Culled from a tape-recorded interview that lasted for fifty hours over several days, the text deals incisively with each of Hitchcock's fifty-six directorial efforts. Anecdotes are plentiful—and pointed—as the pair describe the circumstances under which the films were conceived, the directorial problems offered by the productions, the preparation and structure of the screen-plays and Hitchcock's assessment of how the commercial and artistic results matched his initial expectations. Supplementing the narrative are approximately 300 black-and-white photographs, taken chiefly from the films under scrutiny to illustrate moments of action.

As a moviegoer who has been bored with many Hitchcock films, I wondered how the two professionals would avoid or excuse the cinematic failures that were bound to intrude into their questions and answers—more properly, their comments and countercomments. Their technique was simple. When, for example, Hitchcock finished a stern analysis of a work that "wasn't my kind of picture," he shrugged, "Well, let's file The Wrong Man among the indifferent

SANDY DENNIS · KEIR DULLEA · ANNE HEYWOOD
AS ELLEN MAMIN

Between Ellen and Jill came Paul...

IN D. H. LAWRENCE'S
THE FOX
...symbol of the male

Screenplay by LEWIS JOHN CARROLL and HOWARD KOCH · Produced by RAYMOND STROSS · Directed by MARK RYDELL
Color by Deluxe · From CLARIDGE PICTURES

VICTORIA / THE festival

B'WAY & 48th ST. · JU 8-6040

57th St. at 5th Ave · LT 1-2323

A WALTER BEADE THEATRE

only by dialogue. Claiming to be unconcerned with "plausibility," Hitchcock has said, "Some films are slices of life. Mine are slices of cake." With such an attitude, he delights in "pure" cinema much as Marie Antoinette must have delighted in pure monarchy. Each tried to minimize a limitation by exalting it.

To reach his goals of heightened emotion, Hitchcock uses two major tools—the manipulation of time on the screen and the contrapuntal juxtaposition of dialogue and visual images. Time can be controlled because a motion picture is a mosaic of celluloid strips, each representing some five to fifteen seconds of screen action, which are pieced together to unfold ninety minutes or more of continuous entertainment. (An average of 600 sequences is used in a ninety minute film; for The Birds, Hitchcock used 1,360 sequences; for Rope, he used sequences that took ten minutes each, approximately nine shots for the entire film.) Hitchcock can create and intensify suspense by raising a fear in our minds that something will happen and then delaying the actual event for a perilously long time. Once he has established a reason for a woman to hate her husband, he projects a frame of the woman carrying a platter of vegetables to the table. From the platter he focuses on a carving knife lying on the table. Then, with precise framing, on her hand, her eyes, her hand, her eyes, her hand, her eyes, her husband absently chewing his food, and finally her hand and the knife in the same frame.

With similar shifting of perspective, a director can establish a conflict between words and images. At a table set for three, for example, an elderly husband will be saying grace over the meal Providence has granted to himself, his young wife and a handsome stranger. As the old man gives thanks, the eyes of the wife and the stranger meet. She glances down at a newspaper on the table and sees his photograph. He is wanted for murder. Their eyes meet again. The husband continues to say grace.

This strength of Hitchcock's is also his weakness. When I reviewed The Man Who Knew Too Much in 1956, I noted that the minor ingredients were served up with such a grand show that the main theme became "merely another corn flake in the cereal bowl." So pleased with his selectivity, Hitchcock overburdens his films. His main theme is too often a trivial one, regardless of its life or death implications, to keep us from wandering into the byroads of engrossing trivia. Along toward the end of his conversations with Truffaut, Hitchcock summarized his goals by announcing:

My main satisfaction is that the film had an effect on the audiences, and I consider that very important. I don't care about the subject matter; I don't care about the acting; but I do care about the pieces of film and the photography and the sound track and all of the technical ingredients that made the audience scream. I feel it's tremendously satisfying for us to be able to use the cinematic art to achieve something of a mass emotion.

How noteworthy it is to find the intellectual efforts of Truffaut-Hitchcock more appealing than Hitchcock's synthetic emotional effects.

With Irving Shulman's Valentino, we encounter a biography written in five acts, forty scenes and a few asides. Dull in conception and execution, the work originated in Shulman's concern with the Italian film star as "an authentic socio-cultural phenomenon." This sentiment was endorsed with dignity by his publishers, who footnoted the book's academic virtues in full-page advertisements: Valentino's arrest and indictment during a white slave investigation; Valentino's bizarre marriages, when wife number one locked him out of their bridal chamber on their wedding night and wife number two shared him with his leading lady during a lavish European holiday; Valentino's first theatrical job as a gigolo for rich, unescorted women in the titillating cabarets of Manhattan.

With some 12,000 books published each year, the odds are fair that a discerning reader can avoid Valentino. The book, however, does have an indirect and unintentional impact that should be noted here. Bothered by today's headlines and frightened by what may appear in tomorrow's special editions, we should be uncomfortable to realize that New York City streets once were battle fronts in a bloody testimonial to Hollywood myth making. Spurred on by a press agent who once had the Statue of Liberty scrubbed clean with Bon Ami soap powder, thousands of Valentino's admirers determined to see the actor as he lay in state:

Shrieking defiance, they pressed in against the police, who stood with arms locked and clubs at the horizontal to ward off the first shock of contact. As the mob struggled to break through the police line, a troop of mounted policemen rode out of the side streets to take the crowd from the flanks and rear.

Men, women and children scattered, for they were neither prepared nor organized to resist such cavalry maneuvers. Thrown into panic, the crowd broke and raced across Broadway. . . . There they were repulsed by another double line of police officers, who engaged them as the mounted officers rode in to scatter the disorganized forces.

Men are mad enough to riot over dead actors, over live actors (as in the Astor Place riots, where thirty-one were killed), over cartridges greased with animal fat, over tolerance for Catholics, over closed shops, over open shops, over farm prices, over taxes on tea, over taxes on whiskey, over war, over peace, over the right to riot. We all seem to be capable of finding something to cherish as an excuse for destroying everything else.

Nation Book Marks

IN THE BALANCE. By M. E. White. Harper & Row. 218 pp. $4.95.

THE EDGE. By Page Stegner. The Dial Press. 250 pp. $4.95.

SHEEPER. By Irving Rosenthal. Grove Press. 304 pp. $5.95.

SARA BLACKBURN

Mrs. Blackburn, a former book editor for a New York publishing house, is now a freelance writer.

Two of these three first novels are about falling apart in California, and it would be nice to think that Miss White's, a jarringly good one by a new writer who matters very much, will get a proper share of attention. For various reasons—including the degree of attention being given to each by their respective publishers—it will probably be Mr. Stegner's which gets noticed. Like any plate of leftovers, it is familiar enough not to be dangerous.

In the Balance is about Baylor Irish, a college girl-actress who is flipping out, losing or gaining her mind, around the time of her graduation. Continual flashbacks to her earlier life parallel these current events and give the novel a circular form, so that by the time it ends we are up to date, and convinced, through a kind of nightmare logic, that Baylor's mind is exactly where it has to be—blown, and in a state of utter isolation. To put it another way, Baylor would have to be crazy not to go crazy. Many of the scenes in Miss White's book—Baylor's experiences with a maniacal "underground" movie troupe run by a famous Hollywood type, her relationship with her superficially hip but really not-there family, her desperate high school encounters with the drag-race in-crowd—are terribly funny, but they are funny in a brutal way that keeps the reader constantly on the brink of real tears. In accomplishing this, Miss White uses a lot of surrealism, but, like many other devices here, it blends so absolutely into the novel as a whole that it is, as any successful technique should be, barely noticeable.

Readers who find the book masochistic (Baylor, looking for 'contact, is engaged in systematically letting herself be punished and isolated into that worst of no-contact oblivions) might find it exasperating, but this seems unlikely; the point is that Baylor is wide awake, and saner in her own brand of madness than those locked into the more conventional/acceptable forms of madness which pass as the everyday world. (I know of at least two New York psychiatrists who have been troubled recently by the fact that certain of their patients are "over-excited" about the continuation of the war in Vietnam. Who's crazy?)

I can't remember reading another book that conveys with such piercing accuracy the sense of beauty and ruin of growing up in turned-on, middle-class America. Miss White writes so well that it is eerie. And, reprint publishers please note, if ever there was a novel to be read avidly by people under and over 30, it's this one. In the Balance is a shocking, beautiful and important new novel.

Page Stegner is the same age as M. E. White (about 30), and his hero reminds me of the rich Hollywood dropout in her book who is excitedly producing underground movies. The Edge uses a lot of hip references and what used to be called "experimental" techniques in becoming just another very conventional American novel, a warmed-over version of earlier books by other writers.

What is most annoying here is that occasional sections are good enough to make us wonder why the rest is so pre-tentiously bad or, simply, so predictable. Mr. Stegner's protagonist is also flipping out; his name is Ryan, and he has (through a series of betrayals and irresponsibilities that come from not knowing how to love anybody) ruined his marriage and his academic career, and is responsible for the death of his small son (who falls off a cliff while Ryan is making love to someone he doesn't care about). The novel is generally about how Ryan got that way, but it is almost as if Mr. Stegner doesn't want it to work. This is probably because Ryan, a kind of perennial adolescent who spoils every relationship he touches, specializing in the last-minute letdown, just isn't interesting or substantial enough to be concerned about; one feels vaguely throughout that he rather deserves what he gets and that, at bottom, Stegner himself so dislikes him that's he's stacking his prose against him. There is something petulant about the book and reading it is a little like watching a good trial lawyer defend a client about whose case he is obviously skeptical and slightly embarrassed.

Irving Rosenthal's novel is, as they say, something else. Sheeper is more or less an explanation of what it's like to be an elaborately disguised novelist named Sheeper, writing Sheeper. "There is nothing I want this memoir to resemble more than a skin disease," is a fairly typical Sheeper-statement, and a very accurate example of the novel's flavor. Rosenthal wants his reader to react with all the annoyance and distaste that such a nasty and precious assault provokes, but then he wants to show him color-slide blow-ups of the skin disease and, surprise! the scales look like webs of lace that are somehow alive, and the scabs and welts are of dazzling colors and wild shapes. This method is applied in Sheeper to things like writing, taking drugs, making love (men making love to one another; Sheeper hates women most of the time, doesn't want them to read his book, keeps telling them not to), the pain of not making love, and remembering a grotesque childhood.

About writing: "The sentence must be clanked. You have to start with a sentence and clank it."

"All this is Ancient History to poets, and any prose writer who has ever been exposed to an Eisenstein montage and still hacks out Story ought to be hacked into the bits of hamburger I am supposed to sprinkle on the fruit salad I feed my lizard."

"Words glow because of the underlay of sex. . . . Do you like this book enough to press it to your crotch or breast? Kiss me."

Most of the characters in Sheeper are writers and junkies (they overlap), and most go about in the novel under their own names, which gives Sheeper's journal-novel a gossip-column quality; no effect in this "memoir" is uncalculated. The novel is a record of Sheeper's thoughts as he grows up as an American writer and homosexual whose sense of perfection as an artist and whose pride as a lover make his life in both roles agonizingly difficult and lonely. It is also a brilliant lecture on style by a crotchety and demanding teacher who loves his eccentricities. Sheeper is a novel to be delighted, moved or maddened by, and even readers who fall squarely into the last bag will have to agree that its cumulative effect is weirdly beautiful. So is the book's physical appearance; the design, by Dave Haselwood, and the paper and binding are rare phenomena indeed in the current American publishing scene.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

The possessor of considerable pictorial talents, a representative of the heroic Abstract-Expressionist period in American art, Adolph Gottlieb nevertheless elicits certain qualms or aesthetic resistance, which his current Guggenheim Museum retrospective does not work to overcome. Something vital has always seemed to be missing from the creative make-up of this well-known painter, an absence that has little to do with his measurable contributions, or the respect to which his historical position entitles him. I might make a stab at locating this failing by saying that it appears to arise in a contradiction between his rationalistic procedure and the emotive framework of his art, between an appeal to primitive sensation, even ancient memories, and a complacent execution. Yet, if Gottlieb falls short of his self-projected stature, he does so impressively, and not always. The equivocal nature of his vision can neither quite be indicted nor quite dismissed. It is worth serious consideration, even as it is the subject of some regret—regret over the presence of enough potential for one to see that it has not been realized.

To be brisk about it, I could summarize my objections by quoting those of a colleague, Sidney Tillim, (Arts; November, 1962) on Gottlieb's then current show at the Janis Gallery:

Frankly, Gottlieb had long seemed to me an artist who was no more than ■

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A
critique of American Foreign Policy
in the Cold War by David Horowitz
(Hill & Wang, $6.95) ~~$8.95~~
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by
Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose
Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ PRISON NOTES by Barbara Deming
(Grossman, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by
Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders
should be made payable to THE
NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

3-4-68

engaging satellite of the generation that includes Rothko and Pollock, whose presences, along with others, are felt in his work. In my student years his pictographic style was part of the then exhilarating mosaic of the avant-garde, and when he entered his period of Miróish suns and moons contrasted with frowsy puffs and dripping abstract calligraphy, I marked him off as another of those pilgrims who had transferred their twentieth century worship of the archaic to the Far East, where one could vegetate in evocative atmospheres that did the work of the imagination and which invoke space by calling up associations with Japonized Chinese art, having its "look" rather than a substance.

The most accurate word for me, here, is "look." Gottlieb arrived sufficiently "on time" to participate authentically in the revival of primitive graphic signs in American World War II art; was close enough to their source to be an original exponent of the big scale and the flat plane, and he even early accomplished the switch to a color field, or rather, image painting by the late fifties, thus falling in step with the chromatic developments of the sixties. But in every instance, his intimate accord with such phenomena did not prevent him from purveying an infinitely stronger rendition of their "look" than a sense that they were genuinely propulsive agents in his art. With Gottlieb, the innovational spark and the assimilative faculty are, through some unexplainable process, made to seem the same thing. Though a first-generation artist, he tackles his problems with all the generalizing ease permitted only to the second. As a result, he often appears to be an idea consumer rather than a producer. Paradoxically, however, the force, or better the color, of his personality is so vivid that everything he does is unmistakably Gottlieb—has his flair, his style. Under the circumstances, this has made him an isolated, even "homeless" artist, more than it has granted him the status of a unique figure.

In the beginning, however, his eclecticism was on a par with that generally prevailing among his ambitious fellow artists during the forties. In Baziotes, Stamos, Motherwell, Pollock and Rothko, there was a sign language—half biomorphic Surrealist, half African or South West Indian—comparable to Gottlieb's more tabular, and hence more overtly Cubist, arrangement of the same imagery. Insisting on its pictographic character, compartmentalizing it in staggered grids formed by a white, linear scaffolding, Gottlieb created his niche. If, for his contemporaries, these mythic squiggles and mandrill faces augured an imminent release into a pre-rational gesturing with paint, or hemless effusions of steamy chroma, for Gottlieb they were the pegs upon which to construct a piquant decorative scheme.

To be sure, there is a forties' looseness—if not outright brushiness—to the pictographs at the Guggenheim. Their surfaces are politely scored, glazed, smeared, scumbled, lightly or heavily touched. Their archaic scrawls and oscillating spaces, when tautened by a play between large arabesques and dotted punctuations, can come off effectively ("Recurrent Apparitions," 1946, "Man Looking at a Woman," 1949). But largely these pictures are burdened by two flaws, easy to perceive, if harder to articulate.

The first is that Gottlieb's expressive paraphernalia has an only approximate relationship to his imagery. One feels about his surfaces that they are a "good guess" at, rather than an intuitively felt revelation of, the tactile and emotional load that his processing should bear. It is as if he knew enough to be "interesting," but was incapable of making that interest an organic vehicle of form, that is, a self-justifying, rather than merely a sensuously appealing enterprise. Concomitant with this, is another dilemma. Signs, in Gottlieb, become heralds of shapes in such a manner that the former lose their meaning, while the latter are inhibited too restrictively in extension and behavior. The resulting hybrid is the effect, not of willful ambiguity but of an unintended irresolution in the function and syntax of his elements. Had he given himself over to the discovery of shape, he might have become an "action" painter; had he conserved the sign character of his forms, he might have presaged the emblems of the sixties. As it was, Gottlieb opted for a pared-down symbolism, a kind of earth-sky, and then later, sun and burst typology, writ large, elemental and fulsome, to which he has remained more or less loyal to the present day.

The immediate trouble with this idiom is its contrived dramaturgy. With their jagged, swabbed and spattered edges, these flat "bursts" (Whitney) are not only programmatically contrasted with the sun or moon shape above them but are the opposite of that spontaneity implied by their form. Both shapes are put into relief on the basis of their assigned roles of containment and explosion, near and far, Apollonian and Dionysiac. Yet this iconic arrangement is neither obsessively nor structurally keyed—but rather an archetypal format, almost a trademark, whose overly explicit metaphysical assertions are not to be taken seriously.

What is to be so taken, on the other hand, is Gottlieb's attempt to shore up the increased vulnerability of the new work in the area of color. In the Guggenheim paintings, the upstaged graphic system shunted color into the secondary but adequate role of a pastel addendum. Later, in the bursts, graphism is beside the point, and the many of their number executed in black and white—or sometimes a red sun—look only half-baked. But by 1959, Gottlieb in "Aureole" and "Una" achieves such a warmth of transparency and vibration of hue that they constitute a blossoming of his art. The first picture, all varying shades of ochre cut by a sharp alizarin sun; the second, a vast façade of light blue barely opened by a lone gray moon, indicate an unprecedented dynamic in his work. For one thing, the dialogue between images

AS I READ MY GOOD FRIEND'S BOOK

his words make choochoo trains that derail themselves on each other. My eyes vaguely go searching for corpses in the wreckage: same old cadavers: you can hardly tell them from the wooden ties.

I must gather my thoughts—I look at them sticking to my fingers lying in a puddle of brain damage. I wish my friend well and close his book. It will not lie flat; it shudders under my touch. The Red Cross hands out stale crackers to the survivors. In a caboose on page 48

*a palsied conductor plies
the wireless: the
S.O.S. blitters out from* between stanzas, strophes. I pretend not to hear.

On the shelf my friend's thin book

staggers the row, throws covers into upheavals.

I pretend not to notice.

I think of him at home, his thoughts oozing out his ear, my words steaming on the tracks before him. I think of shaking his scars as he shakes mine next time we meet,

our clasp sticky, our glances sliding in and out of each-other's kindly eyes.

LEWIS TURCO

and ground is amplified by the internal space generated through sheer sensory effect; for another, the close or sudden color changes redetermine the pictorial scenario, the result of surprising jumps of temperature, immaterial color baths or shock-welded optical contrast. It was put very well by Tillim who noted with pleasure in the same 1962 article that

"Expanding" sets ■ large puff of powder blue slightly above a calculated splotch of burnt orange and by color tensions anneals them to ■ green ground which has more yellow in it than blue. The powder blue is close in value to the green, and so loses its contour provocatively while the orangeish splotch is like an opaque fist clutching the green aggressively. . . .

It is all the more pity that Gottlieb realized so few comparable pictures in the spiritlessly capering, safe, decorative acreage he has produced since then. For a brief instant he seemed, and was, larger than we thought.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

As far as I am concerned, Neil Simon's Plaza Suite (Plymouth Theatre) is not the author's evening (deft as he may be) nor Mike Nichols' (adroit though he is), but Maureen Stapleton's. The three short plays, the action in each case being situated in the Plaza Hotel, all belong to that remarkable actress.

The first play—and the only one that can appropriately be so designated, the other two being "sketches"—is about a failing marriage which reveals itself dramatically in that light a day before its twenty-third anniversary. Karen Nash is a wife of childlike devotion to her husband, a woman of good will, romantically attached to the illusions of her past, maturing with a sense of the hardening arteries of her husband's affection, and slowly developing a humorous but nonetheless substantial resentment against his male torpor. Her husband, a successful businessman, (well played by George C. Scott), seems chiefly interested in keeping his waistline to the required athletic club measurement. He has become an efficient mechanism of the American way of life whose only tremor of sensibility reveals itself in a banal affair with his secretary and an uncertainty as to the meaning of anything he does or his eventual behavior.

In the usual Neil Simon prescription, this design is rendered as hilarious as possible; but whatever success he achieves in this respect is far less important than the warm poignancy of Miss Stapleton's acting. She brings to everything she does an unforced comic charm which is not so much a technical gift as the expression of an innocence, a human helplessness, and an honest realization withal that her limitations are part of an endearing femininity which nothing she can or ever desires to do will mitigate. Every word Miss Stapleton utters, every move she makes in this, the opening panel of the evening's entertainment, is fresh, funny, lovable. If there is a more genuinely and profoundly rich womanhood or ■ more natural actress on our stage I cannot think who she might be.

In the second bit, Miss Stapleton plays a silly little housewife who answers the call of her school days' beau, now become a hot-shot Hollywood producer on a brief visit to New York. By plying her with liquor, confessions of unhappiness over the emptiness of his career and the mesmerizing use of great movie names who are his intimates he seduces the goose.

Here Miss Stapleton's characterization is somewhat more stressed in its wide-eyed and tremulous candor. Her performance in this scene gives clear evidence of Mike Nichols' helping hand. The directorial key in this and the following piece is reminiscent of the shrewd Nichols-May spoofs of yesteryear.

Miss Stapleton's final appearance in a masterpiece of a hat occurs in untrammelled farce about a couple's efforts to get their bride daughter out of the bathroom into which she has locked herself, and from which she refuses to emerge, while all the wedding guests wait for her to come down to the marriage ceremony.

This slice of cute hokum is brilliantly served by Miss Stapleton's wonderful discombobulation which once again communicates a complete absence of guile or malice. She is never anything but unself-consciously adorable. George Scott's extravagant exasperation as her husband has the quality of the wild and somehow appealing absurdity which makes one recall the old-time ham actor. (Mr. Scott might make a dazzling Svengali in either a straight or burlesque Trilby: with very little difference between the two.) From the moment when the husband tests his strength by trying to break down the bathroom door, and finds that he can only come near to breaking his arm, Mr. Scott does his best acting of the show.

Neil Simon upholds a great tradition: he writes sure-fire comedies for the big audiences everywhere in the United States—our national Broadway. His insights are conventional—they match the audience's preconceptions—and his comedy technique is firmly set in the theatrical line of which he is the one steadily practicing heir. His writing covers the structure of his slight plots with a bright patina of canny wisecracks which invariably produce the expected laughs, although one can hardly remember them shortly after they have exploded. The formula is a pillar of show business.

There is health and youthful buoyancy in The Grand Music Hall of Israel now at the Palace. The show, in Hebrew, Yiddish and momentary English, is extremely simple in song and dance with nice taste and delicately varied color in the costumes. Even the admixture of night-club jazziness very much in ■ Tel-Aviv vein (suitable to an

A DISTINGUISHED STAR!
A BRILLIANT FAUSTUS!

COLUMBIA PICTURES
presents
THE BURTONS PRODUCTION DOCTOR FAUSTUS starring
RICHARD BURTON
and
ELIZABETH TAYLOR
THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY DRAMATIC SOCIETY
Music Composed and Conducted by MARIO NASCIMBENE
Adapted to the Screen by NEVILL COGHILL
Produced by RICHARD BURTON and RICHARD MCMURTER
Directed by RICHARD BURTON and NEVILL COGHILL Technicolor
AMERICAN PREMIERE NOW
THE Baronet A WALTER READE THEATRE
59th St at 3rd Ave - EL 5 1863-4

Ed Sullivan show) is sweetened by the basic Israeli friendliness and good nature. The men are men, the voices generally agreeable, and the girls exceptionally pretty.

At the Village Gate at 161 Bleecker Street young folk especially will appreciate Jacques Brel Is Alive and Well and Living in Paris, a rendition of

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION

P.O. Box 1413

Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

PERSONALS

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

TYPING WORRIES??? Expert Typing, Reasonable Rates. Manuscripts, doctoral and masters theses our specialty. Call (201) 667-5145

"LBJ DARTBOARD GAME." A giant 14" solid cobra construction dartboard with LBJ's face as the target (or Reagan, Bobby Kennedy, Sigmund Freud, Nixon, Nasser, Wallace and DeGaulle) is yours for only $3.95 postpaid. Three precision brass darts imported from England are included for your bull's eye accuracy. Send check or money order to: TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-V, Chicago, Illinois 60690

PEACE IS A HUMAN RIGHT. Metal License size A Make Love—Not War $1.25, 2/$2; Get Out of Vietnam (Dayglow) 25c, 12 kinds/$2; Peace Pencils, 7 kinds, 25/$1.00 Plentyism, Box 115 Edison, Miami 33151.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

BUTTONS — POSTERS — WHOLESALE
Hundreds of titles: anti-war, sex freedom, psychedelic, humorous. Also posters, bells, zodiac pendants, bumperstickers, psychedelia. One dime brings free mailorder catalogue airmail. FREE SPEECH, INC., Dept. N, 111 St. Marks Pl., NYC 10003, planet earth.

"McCarthy in '68", "Reagan & Lassie in '68", "Dump Johnson in '68", "LBJ for Ex-President", "RFK in '68", "The Governor of Alabama is a Mother", "Draft Beer, Not Students", "Kill for Peace", "Stop the War", "Ban Napalm", "Give LBJ the Bird", "Make Love Not War", "Studying Causes Cancer", "Legalize Pot", "Incest Begins at Home", "Chaste Makes Waste", "Hands Off Tim Leary", "Make War on Poverty, Not People", "Sex Before Finals", "Apple Pie Makes you Sterile", "Melt General Hershey". King-Size bumperstrips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-N, Chicago, Ill. 60690

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

Jacques Brel's songs in English devised by Eric Blau and Mort Shuman, neatly arranged for the stage by Moni Yakim, accompanied by a pleasing musical combo.

The original songs were usually delivered by the composer-writer alone; they are now presented by four sympathetically committed performer-singers—Elly Stone, Mort Shuman, Shawn Elliott, Alice Whitfield. Brel's music has a different sound from that which we associate with ordinary French popular tunes; but then he is Belgian. Social themes are strikingly prominent and are voiced in harsh rather than sentimental tones. Nearly all the songs are virulent with disillusion and possess a gruff assertiveness of protest. The target is the falsity, disarray, misery of the moral, political and street scene of our day.

Brel, whose songs in French I do not know, struck me in translation as a tougher Jacques Prévert, but I am told by those better informed that Brel is a true poet whose work has more "guts" and anger than does that of the wistful and humorous Prévert. Be that as it may, the occasion made me feel that the time for crying out should be abbreviated—it has become habitual—and a time for positive thought and action should take its place. But I was glad to note the warm reception given the Brel songs in the cellar of the Village Gate.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Shelagh Delaney wrote the screenplay for Charlie Bubbles; Albert Finney directed it and plays the lead. These two Britishers rose fast and far out of their working-class origins; the thesis of their collaboration is that fame and riches are as the Dead Sea fruit. With due respect for their right to speak from first-hand experience, they do not make a convincing case.

It can be said in their defense that the case is one very difficult to make in dramatic terms. Since the revulsion is entirely subjective, displaying itself externally in morbid indolence and estrangement from normal contacts, it belongs perhaps better to the short story or novel. The overt spectacle of fortune's darling languishing under a torrent of gold and adulation does not elicit much sympathy from an audience—a likelier reaction being "isn't that too damned bad?"

But the odd thing about Charlie Bubbles is that two such astute chroniclers as Miss Delaney and Mr. Finney should be so apparently oblivious of the inherent problems. Bubbles has come down to London from the north of England; he has been writing novels, one guesses, for some seven or eight years, and has amassed a sum of money that should make his tax inspector thoughtful. He drives a custom-gadged Rolls-Royce, lives in a town house equipped with room-to-room television surveillance, employs a very superior couple to care for him, and harbors a young American girl (Lisa Minelli) as a disciple-secretary.

The thirty-six hours of Charlie's travail opens on a drinking bout with an old friend Pickles (I failed to decode the nomenclature of the picture), touched off by a food-smearing scene in the current fashion. From this, Charlie moves on to an all-night drive north to visit his divorced wife (Billie Whitelaw) and young son, takes the boy to a football match, endures a good deal of rough contempt from his former spouse and a parallel dispassionate observation from his son, collapses (finally), and is put to bed. Next morning he departs the picture in a captive balloon that has been moored in the back garden. The film runs the gamut from Blow-Up to Around the World in 80 Days.

During this episode—I cannot see that it ever becomes a story—Finney expresses deep malaise by somnambulating. His eyes are barely open; he rarely utters more than a monosyllable; he's beat! In the day and a half, he runs into a fair number of acquaintances, all of them strikingly less successful than he, all expressing a nasty mixture of sycophancy and envy. He's aware of the reaction, but too sleepy to attend. Does he love the American kid; does he still love his tough and lusty ex-wife? Is he a good novelist or a fraud; is he suffering from writer's block or has he perhaps contracted mononucleosis? There must be a story somewhere in all this chrome and rubbed-walnut portentousness, but if so, it goes off with Charlie in the balloon.

There is a lot to look at in Charlie Bubbles—it is one of those fashion-page decor films, full of interesting objects and expensively picturesque extras that now seem to dominate the British studios—the Ipcress-Accident console model in augmented color. But the central proposition—that a half-dozen successful novels will deprive a man of family, friends, inner resources and the will to live—is a generalization that will not hold up without some degree of specification. If you want to know what was really eating Charlie, you will have to write a note of inquiry to Miss Delaney or Mr. Finney. Or you may decide—perhaps I do at least understand his name—that Charlie Bubbles is an ectoplasmic scapegoat; that his creators are paying a ransom of induced melancholia to their own munificent but not entirely credible fairy godmothers.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1239

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 7 down Between flights, stumbles on places where one might expect a comedown. (7, 6)
- 5 Spend time casually in the club. (6)
- 10 It might go on top of the number above. (5)
- 11 Passes something along, but isn't smart in the process. (9)
- 12 Where the surrounding territory could cause problems. (7)
- 13 Iron-worker, perhaps. (7)
- 14 Doesn't hit little girls, at least! (6)
- 15 Did one follow the Pied Piper as a way to rise in the old Navy? (7)
- 18, 24 and 30 Gift mail-order house, perhaps, not counted when making general derogatory remarks? (7, 7, 8)
- 21 Ties in more than one race? (6)
- 24 See 18 across.
- 26 The teacher may have one in the class, if you are. (7)
- 27 An experimental flower? It should be ornamental, at least. (9)
- 28 A trace of it shows something missing. (5)
- 29 Set twice as confused as part of a sonnet. (6)
- 30 See 18 across.

DOWN:

- 1 Beaten, but not necessarily tongue-lashed. (6)

- 2 The number of your dentist? (9)
- 3 Encroachments marked "no exit"? (7)
- 4 How the light goes out next to the curb?
- 6 Not tired of the money saved? (7)
- 7 See 1 across.
- 8 Puts yesterday's roast out for those who might be called up. (8)
- 9 Spoil, perhaps. (6)
- 16 Those who can, have more than one tongue. (9)
- 17 Not regular TV fare found in supermarkets occasionally. (8)
- 19 A bad name consumed, as might come out shortly. (7)
- 20 Looking for meeting places? Let's examine ways shortly to get them. (6)
- 21 A worker takes a little time with something to cut a stock disease. (7)
- 22 A superficial integument. (7)
- 23 Acted like Mr. Bok. (6)
- 25 Ground corn and whole wheat for breakfast and dinner? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1238

ACROSS: 1 Paterfamilias; 10 Grant; 11 Recherche; 12 Overrates; 13 Hesse; 14 Parsimonious; 19 Green peppers; 22 Norms; 24 Stone-deaf; 25 Sonneteer; 27 Shapelessness. DOWN: 2 Abates; 3 Entertain; 4 Foretaste; 5 Mocks; 6 Leech; 7 Ancestor; 8 Aglow; 9 Decease; 15 Mopboards; 16 Norwegian; 17 Agonist; 18 Retrench; 20 Debars; 21 and 26 Afterimage; 23 Sheep; 24 Spell.

PUBLICATIONS

BOOK BARGAINS!! Both new and used. Free lists. Also free search elusive titles. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032

FROM PEKING & HANOI: Mao Tse-tung's "Quotations" & "On People's War," both famous little red books for $1.00. Ho-Chi-Minh's "Prison Diary," 75c. Subscription to Peking Review, 52 weeks, air, $4.00. Subscription to Vietnam Courier, 26 weeks, $5.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929-24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

DEBATE THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE—pros and cons on the deployment of the ABM: 11 articles prepared by military and political experts. Pp. 169. Paper, $1.50; Hardbound, $5. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 5201 Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois 60615

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor says that, not to win, but to fulfill his mission as First Symbolical World President, he has announced that he will be a lifelong candidate for the presidency of the United States.

SENTINEL—Lively, informative Newsletter that lets chips fall where they may on law enforcement, civil liberties. Read by Journalists, Policemen, Students in seventeen States. Six months, $1. HABER, 1245 Avenue X, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11235

CANCER: You May Be Next! Stop Smoking! New Book reveals Medical and Psychological method. Money Back Guarantee. $2.00. Texas Western, Dept. 6, Box 2053, Texarkana, Texas 75501.

CONFERENCE

VOCATIONS FOR RADICALS CONFERENCE, March 8-10 in Cambridge, Mass. For information contact: Ken Frisof, 27 Myrtle Avenue, Cambridge, Mass. (864-0920). Registration begins 6 P.M. Friday, MIT Student Center.

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Why we won't be campaigning for ABJ this year

No. He might turn out even worse.

The NATION on Vietnam before it became Vietnam:

This feeling at present runs most strongly against the United States, which is suspected of being opposed to a cease-fire on account of its illusory evaluation of the Vietnamese domestic situation and the requirements of its grand strategy against communism.

Ernest L. Zaugg, "The Vietnam War at the Front," May 8, 1954

The NATION about aggression before they invented "escalation":

It is widely known that one purpose of our engagement in Vietnam is to perfect the new American method of war for possible use elsewhere—perhaps in Africa or Latin America.

Chandler Davidson, "America's Dirty War," Nov. 2, 1964

The NATION on a new war before the President acknowledges it:

"I see a pre-Vietnam. I see napalm. I see Green Berets, and I'll continue to scream about it. I am opposed to it. I am not infallible, but I will not sit by." Father Bonpane, Maryknoll priest expelled from Guatemala, quoted from the National Catholic Reporter (see editorial this issue)

The good fight is now in

THE NATION

—why not join now?

We're not supporting ABJ (Anybody But Johnson) for President.

Just being against gave the world Caesar, Napoleon and Hitler. In fact, by a fateful twist, it gave us Lyndon B. Johnson. (Weren't we all against someone else? Remember?)

Being against can mean you buy some frightening fors. President Johnson is for everything and everybody. He needs the whole world for the Great Society.

And that need led straight to using napalm to disinfect foreign bodies, riot guns to target in on social problems. As a result, Americans today are bad friends to the world, bad friends to themselves.

The election-year prospects don't cheer us up much either. We read prophets who forecast the conventions, pollsters who feed us answers to improperly phrased questions. (Just when do you get a chance to vote against a war you never voted for?)

We're against the pre-packaged election, if you like. That's why The NATION's election-year reporting won't be dominated by prophets and pollsters. It's responsive rather to the need of thinking Americans to know and act for America.

Look at the column to the left, and you'll see why we think we've earned a rather special right to claim this. What we're campaigning for is for more Americans to know and to act on a better choice for America—before the country reaches that final turning point which will find us with no choices left at all.

Join us for the year ahead:

- ☐ I'll sign up for the year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me, free, one of the following books (check one):
 - ☐ LBJ LAMPOONED, intro. by Jules Feiffer
 - ☐ AIR WAR: VIETNAM, by Frank Harvey
 - ☐ HOW TO GET OUT OF VIETNAM, by J. K. Galbraith
- ☐ I'll try you for a half year (24 issues). I enclose $6.

NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

Send to:

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

N 3-4

THE OFF-DUTY GUN KENNETH G. GROES

THE

NATION

BURLINGAME
MAR 13 1968
LIBRARY

MARCH 11, 1968 35 cents

Fifty-Year Effort

OUR ILLUSORY AFFAIR WITH JAPAN

WALTER LAFFER

The Real Crime of Dr. Spock

JEAN CARPER

Rhetoric Is Not Enough

Michigan Democrats in Disarray

DOUGLAS CHASE

THE CHILDREN

ROBERT COLES

CHANDLER BROSSARD

Troyat's Tolstoy by ANITA M. LERNER

5-21-68 PL 5-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
-LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

puzzled

Ithaca, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I am, I suppose, a Concerned Democrat, but this year I don't want to be attached to any party. I shall be voting in November, but before then I shall have to take a stand on various issues. I am sure that many of your readers are as puzzled as I am. A sharing of thoughts might help. Here are a few of the things that have been bothering me:

(1) Lyndon Johnson. I voted for him in 1964. I thought he was honest, if crude, and ever so much better than his opponent. His domestic program has been pretty good, and his blunders in foreign policy should not be allowed to obscure it. Lyndon Johnson is a small man with an oversized image of his place in history. He may go down in history as a good President, but not as a great one. He should now be allowed to retire.

(2) Vietnam. The muddle we are now in is not Johnson's fault, nor was it Kennedy's or Eisenhower's. We muddled our way into it blindly and stupidly, and now we cannot find a way out without losing face. But it is clear that we must get out, and we should be prepared to lose face in the process. But how are we to do it, with the least injury to innocent people? Just "getting out" is easy to talk about, but not so easy when one thinks of the tremendous dislocations involved. Mary McCarthy may blandly leave all this to the military, but, having been a sort of soldier myself, I don't trust the soldiers to be dependably intelligent.

(3) Eugene McCarthy. I am supporting McCarthy, with no hope that he can get the nomination. Stevenson tried twice, and failed; but I still think he was worth supporting. McCarthy, like Stevenson, voices the enlightened conscience of the nation. But isn't there something more that concerned Americans can do?

(4) Nixon, Rockefeller, and the other Republicans. Nixon and Reagan are lower than Johnson at his crudest. The unknown is Nelson Rockefeller. Rockefeller's record in New York is good, and in his earlier days he did well with our Latin American cousins.

As of this moment, I would vote for Nelson Rockefeller as opposed to Lyndon Johnson; but I need the counsel of other puzzled citizens.

Robert B. MacLeod, Prof. of Psychology
Cornell University

magic or massacre

New York City

DEAR SIR: Shaun O'Connell's review of The Man who Cried I Am [The Nation, Jan. 29] overstates the minor weaknesses of the book and almost completely overlooks its clear-cut strengths. . . . The dialogue [is not] "consistently implausible." It would be miraculous indeed in a novel of 403 pages if the author's ear did not betray him occasionally. But in general the dialogue is crisp. . . . And the King Alfred plan [to exterminate the blacks] is not nearly so preposterous as Mr. O'Connell asserts it is. As Williams himself has pointed out elsewhere, during World War II German-Americans sang Nazi songs and gave Nazi salutes in Yorkville, openly and contemptuously, while Japanese-American farmers peacefully attended to their affairs. Who was rounded up and driven into internment camps? The yellow man or the white man, even though one was palpably more dangerous to our security than the other? The suspicion against Americans of other pigmentation is

(Continued on page 345)

EDITORIALS

Romney Bows Out

Governor Romney's withdrawal sharpens, and dramatizes, the fight for the Republican nomination. Fortunately his decision to bow out comes far enough in advance of the convention to permit the liberal-moderate elements to mount a strong campaign for the nomination of Governor Rockefeller. Sooner or later Romney would have withdrawn for the reason he so candidly stated: his candidacy had simply not caught on with the party rank and file. Faced with the deadline for filing in the Wisconsin primary (February 29), he wisely decided to retire now.

Governor Romney is not entirely responsible for the fact that his candidacy did not catch on in New Hampshire. Governor Rockefeller's consistent and warm support placed Romney in the position of appearing to be a front-runner for the New Yorker. The more firmly and frequently Rockefeller denied his own candidacy, the more widely the impression came to be accepted that he was in the race. Voters do not rally round a candidate whom they regard, correctly or not, as a stalking-horse.

As an aspirant for the Presidency, Romney exhibited obvious shortcomings; he lacks political perception and finesse. Even so, his political ineptness might not have been fatal if he had started with a sound conception of the position he finally decided to take. In New Hampshire, he soon realized that Vietnam was the dominant issue. But it was not until mid-January that he began to talk sense about the war. The campaign booklet issued on February 15—"A New U.S. Foreign Policy for the 1970s"—was a good campaign document, but should have come out much sooner. In recent speeches, Mr. Romney has been saying what he should have said from the outset: "Our containment policy is outdated. The basic policy of negative reactionary containment is what is leading us to World War III" "I never thought we should have gone in there in the first place" In Vietnam, "we are going right down the road to World War III," etc. But while all of this was said convincingly enough, it managed to sound as though it were a position taken in a desperate last-minute effort to overcome Nixon's lead. The belated espousal of the position—not the position itself—was the source of Romney's trouble in New Hampshire.

The Republican race now narrows down to Rockefeller and Nixon. What happens will largely depend on whether the liberal-moderate elements are able to overcome their fatal indecisiveness and mount a strong campaign for Rockefeller. They have the resources: they control a large bloc of delegates and they can get the added delegates they will need. But too often in the past they have acted as though they were waiting for another Ike or some miracle-worker to appear on the scene and do for them what they should do for themselves. For example, the Republican governors recently decided that Gov. Raymond Shafer should be co-chairman of the platform committee with Senator Dirksen, but they did nothing further about it—nor did Shafer—and so they lost out. Will they now decide that Rockefeller, with his fine organization and vast resources, will give them a free ride to victory, or will they unite to secure his nomination and election?

Nixon was genuinely surprised, and no doubt disturbed, by Romney's sudden decision to withdraw. He continues to say that his is the "center" position, with Rockefeller to his left and Reagan to his right. But Nixon can no longer play the man in the middle. Reagan, given his misadventures in California, will not be the candidate of the right wing at Miami, however much they may cheer his name. That Reagan is not really their choice is shown by the fact that much of the money for the Wallace campaign comes from Birch Society and kindred sources.

Goldwater makes the real situation quite clear by saying that he hopes Wallace will now withdraw so that the Southern electoral votes may go to Nixon. But Wallace is not likely to back out this year as he did in 1964; his position, as the spoiler, is much too strong, and by now he has a sizable investment in the campaign. In brief, Wallace and Nixon are the right-wing candidates and, as such, will split the right-wing reactionary vote.

With Wallace in the race, Nixon is the weakest nominee the Republicans can put forward, however great his strength may be with the party apparatus. Ray Bliss pointed out recently that the Republicans must concentrate on winning ten big states that have 255 electoral votes; Nixon carried only three of these states in 1960. Bliss also pointed out that to carry these ten, the GOP must make inroads on the Negro, Jewish and Catholic votes. Nixon is the least likely. Rockefeller the most likely Republican nominee to attract these blocs.

Nixon is gambling on Johnson's unpopularity, but he is distrusted and disliked almost as much as Johnson. Independents and disaffected Democrats will not vote for Nixon; they will not vote. On the other hand, Rockefeller can draw more independent and Democratic votes than Johnson drew disaffected Republican votes in 1964. If the Republicans want to win, they will nominate Rockefeller.

A National Tragedy

Senators come and Senators go, and usually no one cares very much except their personal following and the members of their own political families. But when Thrus-ton B. Morton (R., Ky.) called a news conference in Louisville and announced that he would not seek re-election this year, there was consternation in Kentucky, in Washington, and all over the country. The Senator would say only that he was stepping down "for very compelling personal reasons"; those reasons must be compelling indeed, for the country's need of him verges on the desperate.

One of the major political developments of recent years has been Senator Morton's valiant effort to talk sense to the Republican Party—on a variety of issues, but most urgently on the war in Vietnam. He is a "centrist" in the best sense: that of the man of reason. He is a conservative according to the definition of the French Socialist Jaurès: one who wants to preserve from the still-glowing embers of the past not the ashes but the vital flame. He has had the courage and integrity to step forth and say he had been wrong about Vietnam and urge a different course.

"It is known," the New York Times report said, "that

IN THIS ISSUE

March 11, 1968

EDITORIALS

322

ARTICLES

- 327 The Real Crime of Dr. Spock Jean Carper
 330 Fifty-Year Flirtation:
 Our Illusory Affair With Japan Walter LaFeber
 338 No Port for the Phoenix George Lakey
 340 Rhetoric Is Not Enough:
 Michigan Democrats in Disarray Douglas Crase
 344 Cops and People:
 The Off-Duty Gun Kenneth G. Gross

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 347 "A Billy Goat Pining for Purity" Anita M. Lerner
 348 Really Bad Off People Robert Coles
 349 Gambits on the Shore Frank J. Donner
 351 Youth & Age in Chile Oliver T. Myers
 352 Poetry:
 The False Scorpion David Galler
 The Walls of Snow Phyllis Rose
 Whiskey Creek Bridge William Pitt Root
 353 The Child's Style of Learning Chandler Brossard
 354 Theatre Harold Clurman
 356 Films Robert Hatch
 358 Television John Horn
 359 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 11

if he decided to step down it would mainly be for reasons of health." Mrs. Morton is quoted to the same effect. If this is the reason for Mr. Morton's withdrawal, one cannot press him to change his mind. He has devoted nearly twenty-seven years to public service, much of it on the national level and—the more so after his reconsideration of our policy on Vietnam—he is at the height of his influence. He does not need a seat in the Senate to round up an audience: there is not an intelligent citizen who will not listen carefully to whatever he has to say on the vital issues of the day. If he can do that with less strain and wear and tear, so much the better.

There have been reports also that Mr. Morton is exhausted spiritually rather than physically. He has been depressed (as which of us has not?) by the war to which he can see no end and by the absence of national political leadership adequate to the tasks that must be performed. He is said to feel that the coming summer will see a renewal of urban rioting, and he cannot but feel some degree of discouragement at the way in which the outmaneuvered Republican governors were deprived of a co-chairmanship with Senator Dirksen on the platform committee. That Nelson Rockefeller is not the front-running Republican candidate for the Presidency may be another factor in Senator Morton's outlook.

In The Saturday Evening Post of April 6 (on the newsstands on or about March 23), Senator Morton will have a piece titled "Why Only the GOP Can Get Us Out of Vietnam"—with the qualification, of course, that the GOP offer the electorate a ticket that wants to get us out. In the meantime, The Nation can only express its deepest regret at the Senator's decision, and hope that perhaps it is subject to change.

An Appeal to the President

In the April 6 Saturday Evening Post article referred to above, Senator Morton will make what may be the most important point of all. He has said in another connection that the country is "hung up on the outdated dogmas of the cold war," of which he feels the President and Secretary of State are prisoners. In the SEP article, Senator Morton will add that, for the good of the country, Lyndon B. Johnson should not seek re-election. This may be disagreeable advice for Mr. Johnson to read, but more is at stake than the pride of even so proud a man. The Nation, after supporting him in 1964, has admired neither his words nor his actions in the international field, but it has never accused him of lack of patriotism as he sees it—nor does it bring any such charge against him now.

The facts are all too evident. In the Vietnamese War Mr. Johnson some time ago passed the point of no return. He has become wholly preoccupied with the military aspects of the war. He must now deal with the recommendations (which are in effect demands) of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for still more manpower to be thrown into an increasingly hopeless battle. It is hopeless because the people of South Vietnam are not with us. The fighting at Hue was a revealing instance. George McArthur of the Associated Press cabled on February 27: "When Communist forces virtually overran Hue four weeks ago, the city's official structure vanished . . . One harried American said, after a day of frustration, 'They are leaderless and gutless.'" The reason is simple, and the outburst was not quite fair to the Vietnamese government officials who disappeared. It is the Americans' war, not theirs.

But that is not the worst of it. Not only are the Vietnamese not dedicated to the war: the American people are in the same situation. In his latest monologue, Mr. Johnson exhorted us not to "buckle" but to stand up like men for our principles. That is just the trouble: the principles are on the enemy's side. Mainly for that reason, the Vietnamese War has divided the American people, and not even the hawks are filled with the proper martial spirit. The majority just want to get the damned thing over with.

As for the Administration, it is in a truly alarming state. It may be that on the part of the President there is no failure of will, but there is an increasingly palpable failure of reason. Irrationality spreads through Washington like a contagion. The nerves of key officials are frayed. They are no longer thinking, only reacting, and their reactions are mechanical and predictable. Amazingly indiscreet things are said and done. A high government official asked a group of newsmen on February 9: ". . . whose side are you on?" The remark was not to be subject to direct quotation, but it flew around Washington and finally Alan L. Otten of The Wall Street Journal revealed that the official was Dean Rusk. Under date of February 23, the Associated Press commented that this question, and a long discourse that the Secretary delivered, "indicates tension and unusual sensitivity to criticism at the highest levels of the Johnson Administration in the days following the Communist offensive . . ."

But Mr. Rusk was only following in the footsteps of his master. Their troubles are bound to multiply, for both are prisoners of their own views, of the outdated and inapplicable dogmas of the cold war, and of the war in Vietnam in which they have invested so improvidently and recklessly that they can no longer see a way out.

The President is jeopardizing not only the country but his own party, even while he keeps insisting that only the Democratic Party (with himself at its head) can save the country. But when it comes to nominating people who have the capacity to strengthen the party—people like Adlai Stevenson III or Morris Abram—the President can think only of whether or not they see eye to eye with him on Vietnam.

Johnson wants to run against Nixon, regarding him as an easy mark, but Nixon has the same idea in reverse and perhaps with more logic—he wants to run against Johnson. They are creating a real danger of a Johnson-Nixon-Wallace hangup, with the by no means negligible danger of throwing the election into the House of Representatives, where the one-state-one-vote rule would be in effect. The consequences of such an impasse are incalculable: Wallace would be in the blackmail seat, and the country would have to endure weeks of excruciating, and perhaps dangerous, uncertainty.

The fact is—and now it must be obvious even to President Johnson—that he himself is the divisive issue in the country, and matters have reached a pass where nothing he can say or do will change the situation.

He is more keenly and universally disliked and distrusted than any President in modern times. Franklin D. Roosevelt was indeed hated, but there were millions who loved him. Who loves Johnson?

Senator Morton wants only to help the country; he is retiring and presumably has no political motive for making his admittedly harsh suggestion. Responsible organs like The Wall Street Journal have turned against Mr. Johnson. The President should listen to such counsels as these. He can plead ill health or whatever will make the pill less bitter to swallow, but he should take the medicine that thoughtful and patriotic men prescribe.

Passing the Biological Buck

The most prestigious scientific organization in the world—certainly in the United States—is the American Association for the Advancement of Science, with its 110,000 membership of run-of-the-mill scientists and a goodly sprinkling of Nobel laureates. Yet some scientists are more human, if not more scientific, than others, and two years ago at the annual meeting Dr. E. W. Pfeiffer, professor of zoology at the University of Montana, supported by other concerned ecologists, pushed through a resolution for an AAAS study of chemical and biological agents that affect the environment. The particular environment at issue was, of course, that of Vietnam, and the debate lined up the AAAS hawks against the AAAS doves. At the 1967 meeting, during the Christmas-New Year's holiday, the resolution bore fruit in the form of a Committee on Environmental Alteration.

The evaluation group consisted of four members. Two resigned almost immediately: Dr. David R. Goddard, provost of the University of Pennsylvania and Athelstan F. Spilhaus, president of the venerable Franklin Institute of Philadelphia. The remaining members, Barry Commoner of Washington University in St. Louis and Rene Dubos of Rockefeller University, lashed themselves to the mast. Their specific task, with two replacement members to be appointed at the quarterly AAAS board meeting in March, will be to evaluate a 369-page study report concocted by the Midwestern Research Institute (MRI) under a $68,000 Defense Department contract.

The AAAS has enlisted the aid of the National Academy of Sciences and the National Research Council in this delicate task. Frederick Seitz, president of the Academy and also chairman of the Defense Science Board, the Defense Department's highest advisory body, passed his organization's share of the hot potato to an Academy review board headed by A. Geoffrey Norman, a botanist who is vice president of research of the University of Michigan and chairman of the NAS-NRC biology and agricultural division. A possible count against this eminent authority is that from 1946 to 1952 he was a biochemist and division chief at the Army Chemical Corps Biological Laboratories at Fort Detrick, Md.

Much of this information comes from D. S. Greenberg's editorial in the February 23 issue of Science. Greenberg occasionally introduces a waspish note into his comments, and in this case he remarked that the urgency of the NSF-NRC-AAAS review may not be too urgent, since "it is likely that Vietnam will be depopulated before it is defoliated." The sequence may not matter: the review, which has already been summarized for the press, is not of a critical nature. MRI is said to have done a creditable job of "collecting, correctly abstracting and citing much of the relevant published information, although under the circumstances, the report could not be expected to cover in a truly comprehensive way so vast a literature." It is conceded that the literature, perhaps because it is so vast, "provides markedly less factual information on the ecological consequences of herbicide use and particularly of repeated or heavy herbicide application." In short, Vietnam is not in a state of toxicosis now, but the ultimate effects are not assessable.

The political aspect, with which the AAAS-NSF-NRC team is not concerned, is that the U.S. taxpayer provides some $300-$400 million a year for research, production and use of chemical-biological weapons, with something like $100 million going to Vietnam for defoliation and de-junglification. Thus the door has been reopened on what used to be called gas warfare, which accounted for a million casualties in World War I. This made some of the belligerents a bit squeamish, and they signed the protocol of 1925 outlawing poisonous and asphyxiating gases. The United States was not one of the signers. Nevertheless, the belligerents in World War II decided it would not be to their advantage to ignore the protocol, and they limited themselves to TNT, flame throwers, incendiary bombs, and finally the atomic bomb.

Where we stand, then, is that the United States is experimenting with C/B warfare—on a modest scale so far, and only against an Asiatic population whose hearts and minds we don't seem to be winning anyhow. And what we are learning may prove to be useful for the restraint of recalcitrant populations at home.

A Time for Double Talk

Last month may have set the record for self-refutation by prominent Americans. General Westmoreland simultaneously downgraded the Vietcong offensive and begged for more men. Secretary McNamara, who had testified in 1964 that the Maddox and Turner Joy were on "routine patrol" at the time of the North Vietnamese "attack," now admits that those patrols were precisely as "routine" as were the patrols of the Liberty and Pueblo. And Lyndon Johnson continues his massive refutation of the 1964 Democratic Platform: "Peace should be the first concern of all governments, as it is the prayer of all men." While claiming that there was no man he would rather follow into battle than Westmoreland, the President was content to dispatch others. He cut graduate school deferments, thus declaring a moratorium on training Americans to do anything but kill (except for doctors to amputate and chaplains to render last rites). Johnson then went through the hand-shaking routine with the latest 10,000 to be consigned to Westmoreland.

Few Americans, however, achieved the self-refutation of that veteran campaigner, Richard M. Nixon. No longer running for "President of California" (as he had blurted in 1962), Nixon topped the efforts of even Lyndon Johnson. An interviewer in Rhinelander, Wis., asked Mr. Nixon whether the United States should try to outlast "Asian patience" in Vietnam. "No," replied Mr. Nixon, "this nation cannot tolerate a long war. The Asians have no respect for human life. They don't care about body counts, whether the count is nine or ten to one against them."

Mr. Nixon does not ask what Asians do care about. What is it, he does not ask, that makes those fighting against us so willing to die? With characteristic myopia Mr. Nixon forgets that he is a citizen (and hopes to be President) of the nation which has made the body count—that measure of our respect for human life—part of the every-hour-on-the-hour American heritage. He reveals again the arrogance which has made America the least-loved nation in the world and which makes Mr. Nixon so abhorrent a candidate in this War Year of 1968.

Kicking Uncle Sam

Without exception, Uncle Sam's allies have him where they want him. They are his indispensable comrades in the world-wide crusade against communism, and when they cry and threaten he must strive to pacify them. Just now the Thai Government is yelling the loudest. One reason for this is that we are not winning in Vietnam, a state of affairs which the Thai rulers did not reckon with when they became our loyal allies. Or perhaps they just want more fringe benefits for allowing us to bomb from the bases we have built on their sovereign soil. Whatever the reasons, Sydney Gruson reports in The New York Times from Bangkok that many Thais resent the American military and economic build-up in what is after all their country (or used to be) and that this resentment is "exploding" into the open.

The present level of American strength in Thailand is 43,000 military men and about 7,000 civilians on a more or less permanent basis. Another 5,000 American soldiers come for rest and recreation each month. As Kipling said, single men in barracks are not plaster saints, and by recreation our men, even like Kipling's, mean girls. This is one cause of friction, since male Thais have much the same urges as male Americans, and think they should have priority in their own country.

Biological sensitivity is probably exceeded, at least in official eyes, by journalistic and economic penetration. A book by Louis Lomax, The War That Is, The War That Will Be, has given grave offense to Thai officialdom. It implies that Thailand is ripe to become another Vietnam and allegedly insults King Phumiphol Adulet. An item in Newsweek is also regarded as impugning the King's courage on a visit to the northeastern insurgency area. Violent anger has been expressed on these and other grounds by a respected Thai journalist, Kukrit Pramoj, who blames the Americans for practically every evil in Thai social and economic life and concludes, "You American beasts, return to your holes."

That is a little harsh, but there is some substance to the charges of economic penetration. According to U.S. News & World Report, American investment in Thailand was about $100 million a year ago. Now well over 100

U.S. firms are on the scene, and most of them are operating "quite profitably." We are by no means alone, however. Almost half of new investment in Thailand in recent years comes from Japan, and Taiwan also comes ahead of the United States.

But Uncle Sam has the largest rump for kicking, and the Thais are not neglecting the opportunity.

The Integrated Auction

By the usual standards of journalism, the auction was just a local affair. Yet both The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal had reporters on hand, and Charles B. Camp of the Journal sent in wordage (and had it printed) that would have befitted a summary of the annual report of a billion-dollar corporation.

There was human interest in this auction, and the memory of tragedy. The auctioneer was Detroit Police Lieutenant Fred Hotchkiss, and the goods being sold were part of the loot recovered by the police after last summer's riot. It was stuff that no one had claimed and that was untraceable. This auction comprised only furniture and linens. This month there will be another two-day sale of TV sets, radios and record players. (That one should be a really colossal event.) There will be two auctions a week for at least the next five or six weeks. At the first auction the crowd was half black and half white, and the races got along fine. There were quite a few disputes, but color had nothing to do with them.

The police had warned that only the first 300 persons in line would be admitted, but 450 stormed in when the doors were opened. Later the soft-hearted cops let in another 100 who had been standing outside with their faces pressed against the windows.

All sales were unconditional. When a beat-up freezer was put up, the auctioneer warned: "You ought to know the condition of this—you won't be able to call up a service man later and have repairs made under a warranty." Nevertheless, a bargain hunter paid $125 for this treasure, which an amazed expert said was worth $18, top. The auctioneer probably lost his footing on that one, because his policy was to stop the bidding when an item was going beyond its obvious value.

The Detroit loot, both the part that was sold and the stuff still to be auctioned, is a strange miscellany. Besides the usual items—liquor, electronic equipment, clothing and the like, there were such things as stacks of dinette sets, commercial meat slicers and twenty rolls of carpeting, including one which weighed half a ton. "Some of these guys must have figured they were going to go into business for themselves," Lieutenant Hotchkiss commented.

But a good time was had by all; even the occasional fights over who had placed the highest bid were entertainment. A reasonable deduction is that hostility between the races is not inherent, but we knew that before. At an auction there is true racial equality, with all present lusting for a bargain and everybody at liberty to make a fool of himself. The situation is hard on the Detroit police property office, however. Ten men have had to be added to Lieutenant Hotchkiss' squad, and he is still undermanned. "If we have another riot," he said, "I'm sunk."

THE REAL CRIME OF DR. SPOCK

JEAN CARPER

Miss Carper is the author of Bitter Greetings: The Scandal of the Military Draft (Grossman).

The indictment of Dr. Benjamin Spock and four others on charges of conspiring to counsel young men to avoid the draft is a critical point in a struggle of historical consequence: the ever-intensifying war between the U.S. Government and the draft resisters. The indictment is more than a mere crackdown on an annoying rabble: it is the beginning of a test of power. It is an unprecedented recognition by the government of the growing strength and threat of the anti-draft movement in this country.

And the Administration has every reason to be concerned over the challenge to its power to coerce young men to die at the bidding of their leaders in a war considered immoral by many. Anyone in Washington with a grasp of history can see that the current anti-draft resistance is no ordinary uprising that can be put down in the traditional way by intimidating or imprisoning one by one those young men who refuse to go.

